They were all men and women of high ideals, whose word of honor did not have to be reduced to writing to stand the test of honesty and fair dealing.

These early pioneers, who struggled and toiled, have all passed on, but they have left their impress for good in the community in which they lived, and many of their children remain who are worthy of the heritage of their good fathers and mothers.

Mrs. Huff has lived in the community to see them all go, the last survivor of the older generation, in the community in which she lives, there not being a person now living in the township who lived there when she was born.

Her life has not been in vain, it has been a life well lived, a life of honesty, and commanding the respect of every person in the community.

By hard work and saving she and her husband accumulated a fine farm of 300 acres, and after the death of Mr. Huff, some twenty years ago, she still carried on and helped to manage the farm, which is one of the many good farms of Volinia township. Of a kindly disposition she has many times pect of ever being repaid for the same.

During all of these years Mrs. Huff has retained her keen intellect and her memory is now even better than many people much younger.

William N. Wright, one of the successful farmers of Volinia township, is a brother, and although past seventy-five years of age he is able to do his own farming. Mrs. Paul Schoetzow, also of Volinia, is a sister.

Mrs. Huff has one daughter, Mrs. Amy Rutherford, who lives on the old home farm with whom she makes her home. Also one son, Otis Huff, of Marcellus, six grandchildren, one granddaughter, all of whom were present, together with Mrs. William Wright, except her sister, to help her celebrate her 90th birthday.

OLD PAPERS

These comments are from old Decatur papers brought to the office by Luther Sly. He found them in the house owned by Clarence Wood of Kalamazoo. Luther and family once lived there and probably Mrs. Sly found the papers.

We first pick up a copy of the Republican of October 31, 1912. The feature of this paper is the large oval picture of Congressman Edward L. Hamilton of Niles.

A campaign was on. Election was the next week, and Congressman Hamilton was re-elected. We have forgotten his opponent, but probably he was Roman I. Jarvis, who has been the Democratic candidate something like 19 times.

Hamilton was a capable congressman. He was affable and capable and tried to be fair and just to all of his party lieutenants. They all liked him until some of the more persistent ones became disgruntled over post office appointments.

The power of appointing post masters has always done the congressman more harm than good, and we cannot see why some of them are so anxious to retain it.

This issue contains a letter from Judge David Anderson on "Woman Suffrage." This must have been the time of the campaign for the nineteenth amendment.

The Judge favored woman suffrage because he thought his mother, his wife and the mothers and wives of other men with whom he is acquainted are as capable of exercising the right of franchise as the men.

He said in closing, "I believe there is work that women ought to do in our political life and that they have escaped their duty in this regard long enough."

This paper says that John H. Frye died October 24, 1912, at the age of 78 years. He was Charlie's father, and Charlie would be just like him if he could remember a few more good stories. Charlie is a chip off the old block, but there could be only one block in the Frye family, and that was the father. He was so good natured and funny that everything blue took on a rosy hue when he looked at you.

John Frye spent three years in the Civil war. The Johnnies got him once and kept him six long months in their terrible Andersonville prison. When he got out he weighed only 65 pounds but his bump of good humor was not reduced an ounce. When he got home again among friends his weight came back, and he helped to build many houses in Decatur after that. This world is greatly in need of more John Fryes to put joy and good will among men into it.

Well, here is another Republican. It is dated October 24, 1912, the week before the copy noted above. We should have picked up this copy first. The best story in this paper is that Decatur is going to have a big celery day November 23, 1912, with $100 in prizes given away. The merchants raised the money for the event and put the show on in the town hall. We remember it. It was a great display of celery and attracted crowds of visitors.

The men along the street have talked the past year about some such fall event for Decatur, and here is the proof that 25 years ago it was done successfully.

The paper is full of politics, the Republicans again putting up a bold front in the face of probable national defeat. It was the campaign in which that wild Bull Moose Teddy kicked over the traces and helped the Democrats to elect President Wilson.

The Editor of the Republican was at that time holding the commission of postmaster of Decatur, but he did not hold it long after that election. Mally Carney took over the keys to the office the following spring.

How Jack Haithcock Shot Himself

"Did you ever hear how Jack Haithcock shot himself with a revolver?" asked Jimmie Cotton when he was groping through the cobwebs of his gray matter in search of something that would be interesting for the paper.

Wise as we are to the lore of this locality the Haithcock tragedy had escaped the vigils of our memory and Jimmie proceeded forthwith to unwind the yarn:

It was a long time ago, but I was growed up—about forty years ago, I reckon. Myself and half-brother, Frank Worix and Isaiah Brown were going over to Clarence Lindsley's to cut wood when we met old man Wilson with his team.

He stopped and told us that Jack Haitchcock had shot himself with a revolver held back of his right ear, and was dead as a door nail. The old man Wilson had started out to notify the neighbors and he wanted to know if we would go over and stay with the women people till he could make the rounds and git back. He said the women was pretty badly frightened and didn't want to stay there alone with the corpse.

We went over and stayed with them till the old man got back. When he had notified the neighbors he went on to town and notified the officers.

It was about nine o'clock in the morning that we were notified and it was just about daylight that Jack fired his last shot.

He roomed and boarded at the Wilson house which is about four miles northwest of Decatur, and it was upstairs in his room that he did it. The old man Wilson and his son Ed. were out to the barn doing the chores and his wife and daughter were in the kitchen getting breakfast. They all heard the shot and got pretty excited about it. The men ran to the house, climbed cautiously up the stairs and peeked into Jack's room, and there he was on the bed, dead.

Doctors Rose and Maxwell and a coroner came out from town and they had an inquest. My dad, Josh. Cotton, and Jake Simpson, Clarence Lindsley, Joe Mahoney, Isaiah Brown and John Graham were on the jury. The doctors got the bullet out and I saw it with my own eyes.

The jury gave a verdict that he died by his own hand by a bullet shot from a revolver, self-inflicted.

Jack Haithcock was a widower about 60 years old. He had a wife once, but she had left him and was living in Volinia. She wouldn't have anything to do with him and would not come to the funeral.

It was a cold wintry day when they had the funeral. It was at the Wilson home and the family and two or three neighbors were all there were to it. I don't think they had a minister but somebody prayed. They buried him in Harrison cemetery and that was all there was to it.

THIS WEEK

By Arba N. Moulton, Editor

Thanks to Postmaster H. H. Creagan for a list of the members of Company G. 35th Michigan Infantry, who left Decatur for the front on that memorable Fourth of July, 1898. They were Richard Abrams, Will Labadie, Will Fox, Henry Mahoney, Robert Oaks, Will McIntire, Will Pike, James Hall.

The captain of the Company was Nathan F. Simpson of Hartford, who later served as representative in the state legislature and as warden of the state prison at Jackson. The first lieutenant was a stranger locally, and the second lieutenant was Bret H. Cocket of Decatur. Lt Cockett was a natural born soldier and popular with the men under him. He married Florence Palmiter of Hamilton township and practiced law in Decatur for several years. He received an appointment in the state tax department which he held until his death when residing in the township of Keeler.

Information concerning Michigan's part in the Spanish-American's part in the Spanish - American War is hard to find, but there is much to read about the participation of the United States in that war.

The war had been brewing for almost a century. Cuba was held by Spain and her rule was somewhat despotic. The United States, controlled as it was in the first half century by the slave states of the South, desired to annex the island, after the Civil War the South had no interest in the slaves of Cuba. But by 1895 the government was ready to do something for the island through sympathy.

When President Cleveland stepped out of office on the fourth of March 1897, he said to his successor, William McKinley, "Mr. President, I am about to turn over to you a War which has long been in the making." It came in the following year. The "Maine" was sunk and the sinking was laid to the Spaniards, although it was determined later that the sinking was due to natural causes. The war followed, and it was mainly naval.

The Americans under Admiral Dewey opened fire on the Spanish squadron. His order to his captain was, "Fire when you are ready". Gridley was ready at once and the result of that firing foretold the loss of the war to Spain. It was a victory that went round the world and made Dewey one of the greatest naval heroes of all time.

This reporter's lines were published in the Topeka Capital Daily on May 3, 1898:

"O Dewey was the morning
Upon the first of May,
And Dewey was the Admiral
Down in Manila Bay
And Dewey was the Regent's eyes,
"Them" orbs of royal blue!
And Dewey feel discouraged?
I Dew not feel we Dew."

A Lincoln story now and then is relished by the most of men. Have been reading an autobiography of Shelby M. Cullom entitled, "Fifty Years of Public Service." Cullom was a citizen of Illinois. He was born in 1829 and his public service began in 1855. The book was written in 1911 at the close of an eventful career in the public offices of city attorney of Springfield, in the state legislature as governor, member of the national house of representatives and the United States senate. He knew well the history and public men of his time and was a fluent writer.

Take the town of Gladwin, up among the stumps, and surrounded by a forest of second growth pine, where the deer come down to the fountains and the hunters hunt in the fall. The last census gave Gladwin a population of 1,248.

Our townsman, Thomas Mahoney, owns a lot in Gladwin, a village lot. How he got it 'gord only knows,' but he has it and it is liable to make him a millionaire. We expect to see him coming down to the Gem Cafe some day wearing a silk tile and purple coat and carrying a cane.

Read the Gladwin paper's story of the Gladwin boom and then let your imagination soar till it shows you a bigger boom in Decatur:

OIL

Oil, oil everywhere . . .

Thirty wells brought in in one week and only one dry . . .

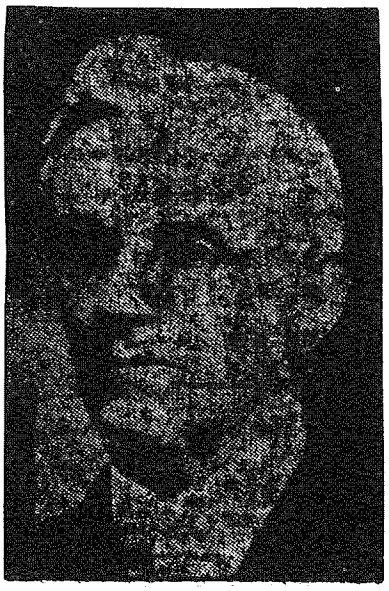
Excitement and wealth such as poor folks never dreamed of . . .

Strange stories come out of the oil fields around Gladwin and Beaverton where labor has gone up to $1.50 an hour and a room may cost $15 a week.

There's the story of the groceryman who took in a 10-acre plot of ground on a small bill years ago. He got $3,000 in oil royalties in three months recently.

And the story about a farmer about to lose his place. He had just existed for years, and was headed straight for the poor house. Then they drilled an oil well. It was a gusher. He received $700 in royalties the first week.

And the story about the farmer whose neighbor owed him a $100 note which was paid by the widow who deeded the note-holder a number of acres of sand land. Three weeks ago the land was sold for $3,700 when the oil boom reached the spot. The miracle happened when the new owner of the land gave the poor widow half of the sale prices.



FRANK WHITE

Frank White learned his trade in New York when a boy and at the age of 30 the desire to roam overcame him. He set out for the far west and in the summer of 1887 drifted into a shop in Battle Creek. There he learned that George Thompson of Decatur needed a helper. He came here at once and the next day was presiding at the second chair in the Thompson shop. A few years later he was married and in 1893 he and Mrs. White began house keeping in the pleasant home on West Delaware Street in which he died.

He was a man of decided views, honest to a penny, Democratic in politics and liberal in religion. He had been financial secretary of the Modern Woodmen from the time of its establishment here. In the days when the Knights of Pythias lodge was a flourishing organization in Decatur he was one of its most active members. When this lodge went down he gave his full allegiance to the Masonic order.

He served the township several years as clerk and that was the only political office he ever sought.

He had the reputation of being a lightning barber. An old story concerning his speed with the razor is that a Decatur doctor going to Chicago stopped for a shave just as his train was whistling at the three milecrossing. "Can I get a shave and catch that train?" inquired the doctor. "CLimb into the chair," replied the Deacon. As the doctor leaned back in the chair the lather was applied, as the train was slowing down at the station the doctor, shaved, was running through the park. As he hopped aboard the conductor signalled the engineer to go ahead, and an event in history awaited this day to be recorded.

Frank White set the price for hair cuts and shaves here for many years. Twenty and ten were his prices and not even the pressure of the state Barber board could make him change them. For a long time the other shops went along with him, and then they got up their courage and raised their prices, and all of the shops retained their customers just the same.

But Frank White did have a line of customers from far and near who went out of their way to patronize him because of his low prices. A number of traveling men made it a point to stop at his shop to be barbered, and farmers came from distances of eight or ten miles to patronize the Deacon. One Decatur citizen said Monday that he had been a resident of this village for 26 years and in all of that time only twice had anyone else shaved him.

Now the good Deacon is gone, the shades of his shop are drawn, the world moves on, and in a little while he and his day, and the street as he knew it, will be forgotten. It must be better so, for a wiser hand than ours shapes the course of men and nations, and we are told and believe that "His mercy endureth forever."

PASSING OF MISS IDA TROWBRIDGE

Miss Ida J. Trowbridge passed peacefully away at her home on East Delaware street at about three o'clock Sunday morning, May 2, after a short illness of pneumonia.

She had been identified with Decatur since childhood and was one of our most highly esteemed citizens.

She was the youngest of seven daughters of William E. and Louisa Hoyt Trowbridge. The family moved to Decatur in about the year 1860 and for years Mr. Trowbridge was one of the leading business men of the street. Miss Ida was the last survivor of the family. Her sisters who grew up, married and passed away before her were Mrs. Nearpass, Mrs. Wheeler, Mrs. White and Mrs. Stewart.

Miss Trowbridge graduated from the Decatur High school and then learned telegraphy under Franc Castro Rogers at the Michigan Central station. She took an office in northern Michigan where she remained until called back to Decatur to teach in the public schools. This was the beginning of her career as a teacher covering a period of more than forty years. She became known as one of the best primary teachers in the state and received tempting offers to go to larger places, but she was loyal to her home town and remained here until her retirement.

She was Decatur's first kindergarten teacher. The little children loved her; they would run to meet her as she went to her daily work and a half dozen or more of them would surround her and walk with her on the way home. Thousands of men and women now residing in Decatur and in all parts of the United States carry in memory loving thoughts of the bright, painstaking, sympathetic, kind and capable teacher who taught them their first lessons and guided them to a good start upward through the grades and high school, and out to meet the responsibilities of an exacting world.

Early in life Miss Trowbridge became a member of the Presbyterian church and a large part of the time held church offices and taught in the Sunday school. She was also an active member of New Star Chapter O. E. S. and held the office of Chaplain.

Funeral services were held at 10:30 o'clock Tuesday morning in Newell and Son's funeral home, Rev. L. F. Cooper officiating, and burial followed in Lakeside cemetery.

FIRE IN THE THREE STORY ROW ON MAIN STREET

Poore Block - Decatur, Mich - July 23, 1937

STARTED IN THE VACANT POORE BLOCK, MAKING ITS RUIN COMPLETE. THE TWO BUILDINGS ON THE SOUTH DAMAGED

Stock of Beek 5c to a Dollar Store Made Valueless by Fire and Water. The Fox Gamble Store Stock Badly Damaged.

Fire caught in the abandoned Poore block on Main street last Friday afternoon, partially destroying the building and damaging the two buildings to the south of it.

The building adjoining suffered the most damage and the large stock of the 5 cent to a dollar store which occupied the first floor and basement was ruined by fire and water. This store was owned by W. T. Beek, who by hard work and exceptional business ability had built up a prosperous trade. The building is owned by Earl L. Burhans of Paw Paw.

The next building to the south, also three stories, was known as the Carney building. The first floor was occupied by the Gamble store, conducted by D. J. Fox. His stock was badly damaged by water and smoke, but some of it was saved by spreading canvas over it.

The loss from the fire falls heaviest on W. T. Beek, whose stock is practically ruined and next on the Gamble store. These two places of business were among the most up-to-date and enterprising on the street.

Origin of Fire

The afternoon was calm and peaceful. Peace and quiet hovered over the village. The hot sun beat down on Main street and the crops were calling for rain. The farmers were in the fields and the merchants were waiting on straggling customers and marking time.

H. H. Benjamin of East Valley broke a tug and brought it in to Frank, the harness man, to get it mended. To the north of the Poore block is the Potts house and to the north of the Potts house is Frank Lanning's harness shop.

Frank mended the harness and stepped out on the street to notify Mr. Benjamin that the job was done. It was about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. His attention was called to the shed attached to the rear of the Poore building where he saw fire through the hole that once was a window. It was blazing furiously against the wall of the Beek store building.

Frank let out one of those Comanche Indian yells he learned out west, which sounded unmistakably like fire! He rushed into the two stores and repeated the alarm and gave another for good measure on the street.

Fighting the Fire

Maynard Southworth, fire truck driver, of the fire department, was in the Gamble store. In one minute he was at the fire station, in two minutes a dozen firemen were rushing out the fire equipment, in three minutes the boys were pouring water on the blaze.

But the fire had caught in something highly inflamable, the shed was built of wood and it was as dry as powder. It was soon evident to Chief Woolfe and his assistants that it was too big an order for one company. Distress calls were sent to Paw Paw and Dowagiac. Paw Paw made a quick run and was on the job within twenty minutes of the time the call went in. Dowagiac firemen with their fine new truck were coming at high speed when the rear axle broke and put them out of commission. Some of the firemen caught rides to Decatur and helped the other companies.

The fire crept up the side of the Burhans building, spread through the partitions, under the roof and over to the Carney building, and occasionally would break out in a large blaze. The firemen climbed the fire escape, spread over the roof and poured water from very direction. Sometimes it seemed as though they went into extremely hazardous places, but fortunately no one was injured. Once, when the rear wall of the Poore block crashed to the ground a cry of apprehension went up from the spectators but the firemen got away from the danger in time.

It was two hours before the fire was really under control. The Chief then directed the work of pulling down the walls of the old building, and to accomplish this the boys worked till late into the night. At six o'clock Saturday morning fire broke out again in the charred timbers and when it was subdued the men completed the work of razing the building.

At one time the Potts house, which stands within a rod of the Poore block, was in grave danger of destruction but fortunately there was no wind to throw the blaze that way and it was saved. Many people were concerned for the safety of the big elm near the burning building. It is the largest and most stately tree in this section of the county, towering far above any other in the village. The branches nearest to the blaze were scorched but the tree was not seriously injured.

THE POORE BLOCK

The three story brick building known as the Poore block was the oldest building standing on Main street. It was built by Charles N. Poore in about the year 1856. The village of Decatur was then only eight years old, having been located and named when the Michigan Central was built through to Niles in the fall of 1848.

Poore married a comely lady from the east and they had three children, Fred, Melvin and Buenna. Buenna was one of the belles of the young village. She taught in the Decatur school in the sixties and sang in the Presbyterian church choir.

Chas. Poore conducted a hardware store in his new building. He also built the house on the lot adjoining for his home. The house, now known as the Potts house, is still standing and outlasts the store building. That Poore block was well built, as the workmen learned when they tore down the walls.

The Chas. Poore family must have left Decatur during the seventies. The old timers who remember them do not recollect the time. Fred and Melvin went to Niles and one of them came back to visit the town some five or six years ago. Chas. Poore's brother, Simon Boliver Poore, resided in Hamilton township about four miles out of the village on the Keeler road. His grandson Melvin is employed in the State hospital at Kalamazoo.

In the Van Buren county Gazetteer of 1869 the Masonic hall, Odd Fellows hall, Good Templars hall, Van Buren County Republican, the John W. Bartlett billiard hall, M. Elchelman, ready made clothing; Nash, Keables and Nicholson, dry good and groceries; Charles N. Poore, insurance agent; are all listed as doing business in the Poore block. That seems like a lot of establishments for one three story building, and Charles Rawson thinks perhaps all three of the three story buildings were known as the Poore block. But only the one building destroyed by the fire was built and owned by Charles N. Poore. Mr. Rawson came to Decatur in 1860 when at the tender age of three and his memory as to the business interests of the village at that time is not clear.

When we first remember the Poore building it was occupied by W. H. Clark, furniture dealer and undertaker. We truly believe that back in the eighties and nineties Mr. Clark had the largest and best stock of furniture in southwestern Michigan. He started in in a small way and gradually built up the extensive trade he enjoyed.

For many years he was the town's only undertaker. He was liked for the pains he took in performing his services, and his reputation for honesty in his deals. The entire three floors and basement of the big store building were packed with furniture and caskets. Frank Smith was his clerk in the early days of our recollection and Sela Eckenberger worked for him four years.

Mr. Clark was Decatur's best proof that a man can succeed best by confining himself to one line of business. He had a splendid furniture and undertaking trade and about all of the work he could attend to, but with other well known pioneers he conceived the idea of developing the big Decatur swamp and from that time on to the day of his death his thought, his time and his ambition were devoted to that work. With his brother Frank he developed several hundred acres of the land and raised bountiful crops of peppermint, celery, onions and potatoes, but his expenses were high and the markets uncertain and he lost a large part of the comfortable reserve he had accumulated in the furniture and undertaking business. He built a big barn on his home lot where Roy Slack now resides, and would fill it with produce in the fall, only to haul it out to the dumping ground the next summer. In the times of his greatest losses he never lost courage or his faith in the muck.

Will and Frank Clark helped to lay the foundation for the wealth that has since come from the rich black soil now so extensively cultivated, and their names should be held in grateful memory by all who are doing well in Decatur today.

W. H. Clark finally sold his Main street business to Howland and Robertson who in a few years vacated the Poore building. It was next occupied by S. B. Southworth with a variety store. He sold, if we remember correctly, to Pearl E. Pritchard who conducted the business under the name of the Racket. Some years later Renne and Gale stocked the place with hardware and implements. Renne sold to Gale and the latter moved to his present location in the three story Stewart building.

Frank Squires last occupied the building with a second hand store. Fire ruined his stock and damaged the building and the building has since stood in partial ruin, only a few old timers remembering it as one of the most pretentious and popular trading centers of the village. Some 15 or 20 years ago the late Mrs. Catherine Carney acquired the property and it was in possession of her estate at the time of the fire.

George L. Roberts remembers the Poore block when the owner conducted a hardware store there. His father, Alanson D. Roberts, moved his family here from Iowa at the outbreak of the Civil War, then left them here and joined the army. George Roberts, who was 80 years old last January, went to school to Buenna Poore. He and Charlie Rawson both remember her as a beautiful girl.

The Poore block was condemned as unsafe by the state fire marshal several years ago, but Mrs. Rudzinski, administrator of the estate, felt that she could in some way rent it and derive some revenue from it, and no order to wreck the building was issued. There was no insurance on this building, we are informed, but the Carney building was insured for $2,000.

Chief Woolfe says that people on the ground watching the fire could obtain no estimate of the damage being done. The roofs of the two buildings standing were burned off and the heavy timbers above the ceilings were badly charred.

The Chief started an investigation into the cause of the fire which he says will take several days to complete. He intends to learn the exact cause of the fire and who were to blame for it.

He has chased young boys smoking cigarets out of the shed and out o' other places in the alleys, taken them home and told their parents that they would cause fires if they did not stop the practice.

Chief Woolfe was in the officer's quarters in the village hall across the way when the alarm was turned in. He immediately assumed charge and remained on duty continuously for 36 hours.

The Paw Paw fire department was called. Dowagiac learned of the situation and started out unsolicited. Lawrence volunteered its services. Decatur greatly appreciates these courtesies.

The Chief wishes also to thank all local people who assisted in controlling the fire and especially the men who stayed till a late hour and helped to wreck the building.

Planty of Water

The man who ran the pumps that furnished the water that put out the fire was the superintendent of the water plant, Jarius Halleck. Alone he stayed by the pumps and they were in perfect working order.

Supt. Halleck said he pumped about 900 gallons of water a minute for two hours and about half that amount the next two hours.

"The demand for water did not bother us at all," he said. "The harder the pumps worked, the better they worked. I never saw them work any nicer. We have three good pumps and it was a good thing we had them."

The man who controls the water distribution said it was not necessary to shut off the water supply during this fire, but he suggested that in time of fire users would show a nice consideration for a hard situation if they would shut off their sprinklers.

Jarius Halleck keeps the water plant up in perfect condition and is ready for any emergency. In his long years of service to the village he has become known as a dependable official.

Perhaps some readers of the Republican can add something to the history of the Poore block as printed here. If so the information will be very welcome.

The building in which the 5 to a dollar store was located has an interesting history which we would like some of our readers to furnish. Our first remembrance of the Republican office was when it was located on the second floor of this building. We remember when Knight and Company conducted a grocery and meat market there and Thomas Mahoney was a budding clerk for them.

It has been the location of the 5 and 10 store for a dozen years or more and has been a popular trading place since the present owner took it over. Mr. Beek said after the fire that he was 'all washed up.' His stock that was not destroyed by fire was ruined by water. This is a loss to the community as well as to the owner and we sincerely hope that this place may be repaired or a better place opened to him without undue delay.

The building has had numerous owners. At one time it belonged to the Copley estate, then William Kimble acquired it and conducted a second hand store there. On his death bed Mr. Kimble willed the building to Frank Conrad in return for faithful services.

Two nieces from South Bend contested the will and through their attorney, Senator Burhans, were successful in breaking it. In the final settlement of the case Mr. Burhans purchased and became the owner of the building.

The building in which the Gamble store is located has had but few owners. It has belonged to the Carney family for many years. M. S. Carney acquired it of the late Theo. Trowbridge.

When the fire broke out W. T. Beek was at his store in Dowagiac. The Decatur store was in charge of Florence Barnhart, with Vanda Taylor and Luella Bascum assisting.

Miss Taylor had been to the back room for stock not five minutes before the fire broke out and there was no indication that a blaze was started on the other side of the wall. The young ladies got a call through to the owner and he was soon here. They removed the papers and cash and did all that they could for their employer in the trying situation.

FIRE NOTES

While the fire was in progress reporters from the Detroit Times and Kalamazoo Gazette were reporting some event at Gull lake. Word came to them to rush to Decatur, the town was burning up. They rushed, but did not find the situation quite so serious.

Three photographers representing daily papers were here taking pictures, but they did not arrive until the wrecking of the Poore block was well under way.

S. N. Eckenberger and Grace Weeks had taken several views while the building was standing and one of the Eckenberger pictures was in the Saturday Gazette.

Estimates of the loss by daily papers vary greatly. One put it at $10,000, another at $20,000. W. T. Beek's loss is placed at $4,000 and D. J. Fox's Gamble store at $3,000. The buildings and stock were insured to partly cover the losses.

Miss Caroline Johnson of Paw Paw, who represents the Kalamazoo Gazette, came over to pick up special news of the catastrophe.

Miss Weeks took some splendid views of the three buildings clouded in smoke and the streams of water playing upon them and they were on sale the next morning.

BARELY ESCAPES DEATH IN FIRE

Decatur, July 24.—Miss Vanda Taylor narrowly missed dropping into a flame-filled cellar Friday afternoon. She went to a back store-room to return a box of merchandise which she and Miss Florence Barnhart, senior clerk in charge, had obtained but five minutes before. Before she stepped, Miss Taylor looked down. The whole floor was burned away and the basement was a mass of flames. When both young women were in the back room before, there was no evidence of smoke or fire, they said.

(The above report went the rounds of the daily papers. It is entertaining reading but Vanda says it is slightly exaggerated. That was what Mark Twain said about a report that he was dead when he wasn't.)

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Steele, who live in the rooms over the Gamble store, have had a pretty rough time of it, and for a time they did not know whether or not they had a home Their rooms were damaged by water, but they were able to remain in them.

L. G. Stewart says the Poore building was built before he came to this county, and he came here with his parents in 1858. He says all three of the buildings were built by Charles N. Poore and were known as the Poore block. The two now standing were built in 1863 or 1864. He said he built them to hold up the first building.

Deputy State Fire Marshal Ray C. Condlon of Lansing has notified Chief Woolfe that he will be in Decatur today (Thursday) to inspect and pass judgment on the fire and condition of the standing buildings. Deputy Condlon succeeded Geo. Low of Bangor whose political complexion was not of the required hue to enable him to retain the commission. But George was a competent, courteous and painstaking official. This firing a competent workmen solely for party reasons is not a creditable feature of the party system, but since the days of Old Hickory, it has been ever thus.

HOW ABOUT IT, FRED

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Steele occupied the apartment above the Gamble store. Their property loss was not estimated although it was believed to reach several thousand dollars.—State Dispatch.

Eddie Woodman came to town Friday afternoon on his big new truck He parked near the post office and when a call went out to haul away some fruit jars belonging to the Fox grocery he volunteered to do it. He is one of the most obliging men we know and his work at the fire was appreciated.

John Smith, we are told, has made an offer to clean away the debris for it. The debris is the property of the Carney estate, which seems destined to be the goat of the catastrophe,—no insurance.

THE TALE OF A BRONCO

Over the hills of Wyoming
And down to the Rio Grande,
There traveled the tale of a bronco,
A bronco with many a brand.

Out of the state of Montana
And down to the Rio Grande,
There came a rider on the trail of the bronco,
The bronco with many a brand.

He heard the tale of this bronco
And why his fame had grown,
This bronco was famous for throwing his riders,
More famous than the Strawberry Roan.

He wanted to see this bronco
And at riding him try his hand;
He wanted to humble this bronco,
The bronco with many a brand.

He chased fast after this bronco
Whose fame continued to grow;
He came close on the trail of this bronco,
Whom how tough he was he soon would know.

They were to meet in the arena at Pendleton
Where the best of the brones flipped tails,
They were to fight in the arena at Pendleton
Where many a brone and his rider started on the long, long trail.

They met in the arena at Pendleton
But the rider was out of luck;
For he rode the bronco at Pendleton
But the bronco wouldn't buck.

So the rider went back to Montana;
The bronco to the Rio Grande;
And there ended the tale of a bronco,
A bronco with many a brand.

Nino Del Pais.

Friendly Obstacles

For every hill I've had to climb,
For every stone that bruised my feet,
For all the blood and sweat and grime,
For blinding storms and burning heat
My heart sings but a grateful song—
These were the things that made me strong!

For all the heartaches and the tears,
For all the anguish and the pain,
For gloomy days and fruitless years,
And for the hopes that lived in vain,
I do give thanks, for now I know
These were the things that helped me grow!

'Tis not the softer things of life
Which stimulate man's will to strive;
But bleak adversity and strife
Do most to keep man's will alive.
O'er rose-strewn paths the weaklings creep,
But brave hearts dare to climb the steep. —Unknown.

DOING WORK FOR THE LORD IN THE WILDS OF VIRGINIA

Leo Lyle, Son of Melvin Lyle of Decatur, and His Faithful Wife, Missionaries at Clintwood, Tell of the Good They Are Doing Through Prayer.

Clintwood, Va.,

August 11, 1937.

Dear Friends and Prayer Helpers:

Six months have rolled by since our last news letter was written and now we believe that the Lord would have us write all of our friends again to tell how He has undertaken for us.

In the first place enough money was sent in to take care of my teeth and now my health is much better as a result. A nice box of song books was also sent in and we are enjoying them very much in our several meetings. Many Sunday school papers have also been sent in and we know that great blessing has come and will come as a result in the lives of those who read them. Send more any time you have them to spare.

The Lord has indeed been gracious to us again this year in making it possible for us to spend one week in Gull Lake Bible Conference in Michigan, and also one week with our parents there. Just last week we were also privileged to attend our Mountain Gospel Fellowship Conference at Hindman, Kentucky. If we really begin to live out half of the things received at these conferences, truly our work will bring forth more fruit. We greatly need your prayers that the Lord will make us more bold in our personal work.

Since coming back from Michigan, the Lord has shown us very plainly that He would have us hold services in a prison camp on Sunday afternoons. The camp is located in an adjoining county and is 16 miles away. There are 97 men in the camp, many for murder and other serious charges.

The meeting is held in a long, low and narrow building with the beds lining either wall. The men sit on small benches in the aisle. An officer sits at either end of the building with a gun in his hands. Between the rows of men there is a space of about three feet where one may walk. About half way down the length of the building is a rudely constructed pulpit where one stands to preach to the men. A chain runs the full length of the building on either side and each man has a four foot chain locked to his ankle and to the long chain. It surely gives one a peculiar sensation the first time he walks between rows of chained colored men. One is reminded of walking between two rows of chained mules. It is wonderful, however, to see how the men respond to a little kindness and also to see how interested they are in the Gospel story.

There has been a change of officials in the local CCC camp and now we are having much better co-operation in holding meetings there.

Recently we changed our Saturday night meeting at Osbornes Gap to a regular Sunday school service at 9 o'clock in the morning, then we go to our Camp Creek meeting at 11 o'clock.

Bad to Worse

The town of Clintwood has been going from bad to worse in a spiritual way and we have felt the need of holding a Bible class for a long time, but could not find a building. Now the Lord has wonderfully undertaken and we have a large building that will seat at least 230 people and the owner is not going to charge us any rent.

The building is in need of three window frames and of course we will have to have some kind of seats right away. We are trusting the Lord to supply these necessary things in His own way.

We have felt the need for a long time of having street meetings in the town here and other towns around, but having no musical instruments with which to attract a crowd we have never started any. Recently we became interested in a loud speaker such as politicians use, except that it has a phonograph attachment and believe that this could be greatly used to the glory of God. We do not know the price of these speakers, but were wondering if any of our friends might know of one that we could get second hand. We would greatly appreciate any help in locating one and also your prayers that God will supply the money to buy one. Loud speakers are a new thing here and attract large crowds.

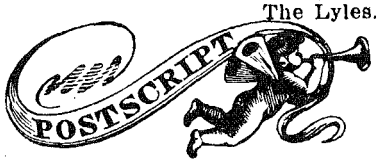
We were only able to hold two Vacation Bible schools this year; one at Camp Creek and one in Clintwood. The grandson of a noted "Hard Shell Baptist" preacher was saved at Camp Creek and also a young girl who learned the required 126 scriptures to earn a Bible. Mrs. Lyle conducted the school here in Clintwood with the help of three other Christian women. Eight of the children in her junior class were saved.

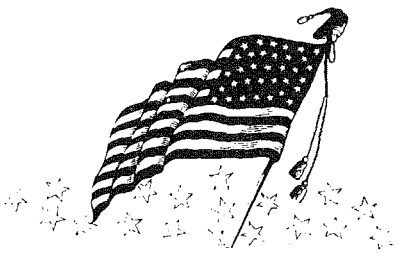
The Lord has given us a very good garden this year and we have been able to can many quarts of tomatoes and pole beans already. There were also many wild blackberries this year and we were able to can many quarts of jelly and jam. We were able to get all of the berries picked by a poor family in exchage for old clothing which friends have sent in.

We are enclosing two pictures; one of the Camp Creek Bible school where there was an average attendance of 42 and the other of our family.

Trusting that all of our friends are well and happy in the Lord, we are,

Yours in Christ,
The Lyles.





AMERICANISM

An Essay That Won a Scholarship and Should Be Read by All Americans.

Award of the annual scholarship of the Elks for the best essay on Americanism has been given to a 16-year-old high school girl who wrote on the subject from compelling experience.

The girl is Sylvia Karjalainen, who was graduated this year from the Weatherwax High school at Aberdeen, Wash., and was winner of the first oratorical contest sponsored by the Aberdeen Elks lodge.

Miss Karjalainen's father is a Communist who gave up American citizenship to go to Russia and who took his daughter with him. She lived in Russia for a year and then decided to return to the United States. Her father is still in Russia, his exact whereabouts unknown.

The prize essay follows:

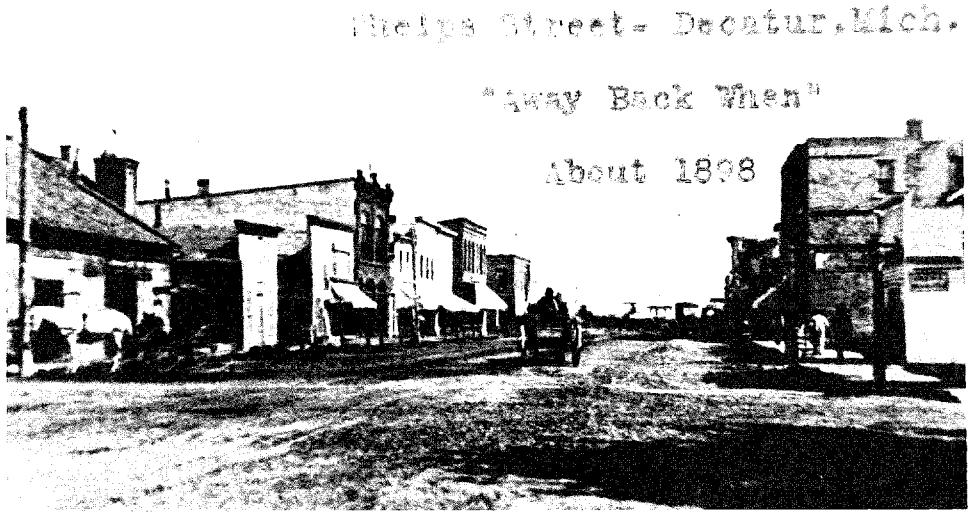
"I find that Americans do not realize what great freedom we possess here in America. Imagine yourself in a country where freedom of speech and press are completely repressed by the government. I have not heard from my father for a year. I know that many of the Finnish groups in Russia are being banished to Siberia. He may be there and he may not. The Soviet union may have taken my father and our wealth and compelled my mother to a life of hard work to bring up her two children. But there is one thing it cannot and will not touch—my American citizenship. That citizenship which grants me freedom of speech, freedom of religion.

"My father will probably never be able to leave the Soviet union because all he earns must be spent during a certain time. Here in the United States of America, I can, if I wish, raise myself to a higher level, or if I wish, I may make a fortune for myself, provided I have the initiative. I may worship my God as I please, while my father may worship none at all.

"When I sit before my hearth I often wonder if my father realizes now what a great deal his American citizenship meant to him. For now while we may enjoy peace and security, he must always be on his guard, never knowing what day he may be exiled for some petty cause. That is why I wish we all would stand up for our constitution and the citizenship it guarantees us, instead of always tearing it down.

"If some American lost his citizenship even for a day, he would become acutely aware of its great importance to his life. My American citizenship is to me a vital living thing that I honor and cherish."

Decatur in the Making



Wayland B. Nicholson, a Resident of Decatur In the Sixties and Seventies, Sends the Republican a Promised Story of the Village as He Knew It.

Minneola, Florida,
August 9, 1937.

To the Republican:

Just received a copy of the Decatur Republican of July 29.

As you have asked for items from old residents of Decatur I will mention a few that happened in my own youthful days.

My father, Julius E. Nicholson, and my mother and four children moved to Decatur the year that the large brick school house was built. Father went into the general store of Ira Nash, with the purpose of entering into partnership if agreeable to both. He was taken sick and died after two weeks of sickness with pneumonia, and was buried in Newberg, Cass county, in the plot of land he had donated to the district for a burying ground and school house.

The Nash store was located on the western end of the park near the warehouse of Lyman Rawson. The store business was later sold to Aaron Hathaway. Later Mr. Nash with Lon Keebles and Eugene Nicholson were located in the brick building later occupied by the Trowbridges, father and son. Still later Keebles and Nicholson formed a partnership and began in the hardware business where I learned the business and the tinner's trade. After four years with this company I left my brother Horace to run the shop and went with E. P. Hill, Mr. Rogers (banker) and Myron Hinkley to Hartford as bookkeeper and clerk in their store and office.

After one year I was removed from duty so that Mr. Hill's son Dana could take the position. At present I believe the only residents of Decatur now there when I first arrived are Mrs. Nettie Russell Huff, George Roberts, L. G. Stewart and John Shaad. Later Carleton Genung, his wife Olivia (my sister) and their two children, Stella and Judge, arrived from near Niles. Later Stella married Frank Lindsley.

Who can remember when the post office was located west of the corner of Main street and the railroad street where was operated by Don and John Rogers a general store? Next west on that street was a harness shop. Then next west was the post office.

I learned to play ball on the green near the M. C. R. R. tracks. Later the first regular baseball club was composed of George Wheelock, pitcher, when balls had to be pitched under hand (not thrown). Hank Teed, harness maker (Mead), Hank Murray, Curt. Botsford, Dell Kurtz, Hod Nicholson, Fred Seymour and others were the players.

My brother, H. W. Nicholson, once owned the double barrel pistol that Mr. Sweet used to protect himself from the powerful swing with a long poker held in the hands of Joe Pierson. It was a double barreled gun and the hammer revolved to strike either cap to fire the shot. My brother sold it to E. L. Hawks for a watch and Mr. Sweet got it from Mr. Hawks.

Who remembers the sailboat that Mr. Hawks made and placed in the water of Lake of the Woods? It was named the "Union".

Who remembers the old distillery located near the bank of Mud lake which was torn down about 1864?

The third one of the stores in the Poore block was run as a drug store by Mr. Leavens and his sons, Charles, Walter and Eddie.

Who remembers the burning of a residence at near midnight located north of St. Mary's street on the site of the old nursery, just north of the Parmenter house? The house was insured but not occupied and the owner was supposed to be in Chicago working as a carpenter. When a few neighbors reached the fire, as there was about 10 inches of snow on the ground and Mr. Holmes, the photographer with office in the third story of the old Poore block, and my brother Eugene, they noticed fresh tracks leading away from the building. They followed them to the M. C. R. R. tracks and on towards Dowagiac. They followed and when arriving there looked into the room and saw their man, the owner of the building burned. They secured the help of the town marshal and he arrested the man. They all three took the next train for Decatur.

As the village had no place to keep their prisoner, Wm. Henry Tucker (lawyer) offered to take him over to Paw Paw to jail. When Mr. Tucker returned to Decatur he reported that his prisoner got away from him at Lawton while waiting for the Paw Paw car and escaped.

The funny thing about it was that Mr. Tucker had the gold watch and chain worn by the prisoner. There were doubts that the owner ever applied for insurance. Nothing was ever heard from the man.

The early name of the Clark furniture company was Clark and Nearpass.

Who remembers the very bad wreck of the excursion train on the M. C. R. R. that occurred about 1868 or '70, in which a large number of people were killed and seriously injured, including Daniel Dimock and Mary Case, daughter of Mrs. Keeler, who resided in the first house west of the M. E. church?

Who remembers the law firm of Cole and Parkhurst? I have a canceled deed to some property in which Hiram Cole had signed as attorney.

Who remembers when Hawks and Thomas were in the hardware business? Hawks sold out to Thomas and began as a jeweler across the street and later Mr. Thomas took in Mr. Quinn as partner, before he moved into his new brick at the corner of Main and Delaware.

Manley and Son had a dry goods store on the west side of Main street near the corner where Frank Potts held out later.

The first professor in the new school was Prof. C. F. R. Bellows. The second was Jerome H. Bishop. I left school about that time. Mr. Bishop located in Wyandotte and became interested in the making of fur clothing and got nicely established and rich before he died.

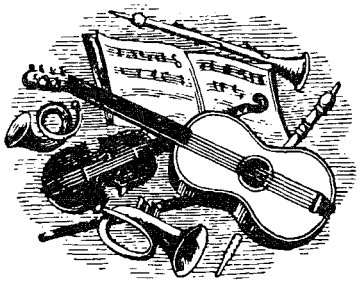
Abbott Brothers were in the dry goods and clothing business at the south corner at Delaware. Tom Brownbridge built the first (and about only) brick residence in Decatur on Delaware street.

Seymour and Hendryx built the large stable on the corner near the Nash store and run the livery stable business a number of years.

I was 10 years old when we moved from Vandalia to Decatur. I am in my 85th year now, taking in the winters and some of the summers in Florida.

Wayland B. Nicholson.

This will fix you up on the promise I made you two years ago to send in another letter to the Press.



MISS LARIDA SCOTT'S FINE WORK IN MUSIC

Miss Larida Scott, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Scott of Hamilton township, is a teacher in the Theory Department of the Conservatory of Music of Olivet College.

She is making fine progress and is happy in her work. The following is taken from the Olivet College Echo:

Miss Larida Scott was given unusual recognition at the recital of the faculty of the Willard Music School in Battle Creek, on February 10. Mr. Schuster, famous cellist of whom Miss Scott is a pupil, played her composition, "To a Church." Upon [illegible] to the platform and charmingly acknowledged the compliment. She has played "To a Church," as a cello solo at various entertainments on the campus, and has but recently completed a complete orchestral arrangement.

The Olivet College trio composed of Miss Christina Schoonmaker, Miss Larida Scott, and Avis Thomas, entertained and were entertained by the Detroit-Olivet alumni on Friday, February 19. The trio furnished the dinner music for the Alumni banquet held at the North Woodward Congregational church, and afterward presented the following program:

Londenderry Air .....Kreisler
Hungarian Dance .....Brahms
Pastorial Dance .....German

The trio was accommodated for the night at the Statler Hotel.

Wild Boys with Native Shrewdness

This letter to the editor of the Cassopolis Vigilant is from Fred Smith, the alafalfa king of Vandalia. We had not heard before the circumstances concerning the wayward boys but the letter has such a pull in it for them and the Starr Commonwealth that we read it twice and then clipped it to copy.

The collector ladies of the Star Commonwealth were here last week. They reported that the home now has about 90 boys. Marshall Starr lived in Decatur when a boy. Our acquaintance with him dates back to those early days, so anything about his home for boys has a special interest for a few old time citizens of the community.

Vandalia, 2-18-'37.

Friend Berkey:

I wondered if you knew the whole story of the boy who ran away from Starr Commonwealth. He and two of his friends stole a car one night and were soon caught by the sheriff who handcuffed them and started to take them in. He soon had to get out for a moment and go in a store, perhaps for a cigar. Then the leader slipped under the wheel and ran away with the sheriff's car.

They drove it till it ran out of gas near Bair lake when they entered a cottage and found a file with which they rid themselves of the handcuffs. They then walked to Min Wagner's and very nearly got away with her car before she noticed them driving west with it. She hastily called the sheriff who got to the G. T. R. R. crossing in time to head them off.

It would seem that a boy who could steal three cars in one night and come as near as he did to getting away with them is worth saving if you can get him switched over to the right track.

And Min Wagner will not contribute to the Starr Commonwealth because those boys stole her car.

As I understand it this boy was only brought to the Commonwealth. Starr would not let them be prosecuted for taking the cars, saying, "I am the one who has fallen down on his job."

Very truly yours,
Fred E. Smith.

OLD TIMERS LIKE TO RECALL OLD TIMES

Don F. Cochrane in Hartford Day Spring.

Len Dade, East Main street retired farmer, is a survivor of Hartford's stave factory days. Spurred by the reminiscences of Editor Arba Moulton of Decatur, reprinted in this column, Mr. Dade has done a little reminiscing on his own hook which should interest Hartford's old timers. He writes:

Editor Day Spring: Reading your story by Editor Moulton in regard to old stave factory days brings back to memory the old days of about 60 years ago when the stave factory in Hartford was running full blast and I passed staves to Wellington Fletcher to joint, for which I received 25 cents a day.

Arch Adams and Tommie Loutett packed the staves and tied the heaters. I do not recall playing ball at noon time, but I do remember how we boys caught a large dog one day and tied some tin cans to his tail, and he ran down Main street where the horses were then as close together as automobiles are nowadays, and it caused quite a lot of excitement. When questioned, of course, the stave factory boys knew nothing of it at that time.

Jess Hess owned the stave factory and paid us each Saturday night. Billie Palmer ran a candy shop, where we spent our Saturday evenings with candy, lemonade and pop. Len Dade.

Boys were boys in Mr. Dade's time, much as they are today—except that boys today would scorn a wage of 25 cents for a 10-hour day. That didn't harm boys of Mr. Dade's type. He did pretty well in the world later upon his own "rugged individualism."

METHODIST CHURCH HISTORY AND PRESENT OFFICIAL ROSTER

The following history of the local Methodist church and official church roster is reprinted from a copy of the Decatur Republican of September 24, 1925, and brought up to date by Rev. Dean W. Parker, the present minister. The sketch will be of interest to readers of the Republican who have watched the growth of this organization through its many years of religious work in Decatur.

The early members mentioned in the history have all passed on to the Great Beyond, but the children, grandchildren and great grandchildren of some of them are now carrying on their work. James and Susan Ellis are represented by their grandchildren, Mrs. A. C. Brigham and Mrs. Robert Orr of Decatur and Mrs. John Wassman of Lawrence; Amelia Taylor is represented by her daughters in law, Mrs. Esther Taylor, Mrs. Flora Taylor and Mrs. Allie Taylor and their children and grandchildren; Amos Morris is represented by his daughter, Mrs. Grace Vining Lisk and Miss Laura Morris; James Kirtland is represented by his daughter, Mrs. Nellie Betaque, now of South Bend.

HISTORY

The history of the founding and growth of the First Methodist Episcopal church in Decatur is intensely interesting. In this brief history you will find the most important events. In the pioneer days before 1860 Circuit Riders defied the wilderness and made extensive trips through this part of the state, from their homes in Indiana, stopping wherever they saw a log cabin, and administering to the spiritual needs of the people.

The first permanent record we have states that from the years 1855-1865 Decatur was the head of a circuit composed of Decatur, Lawrence, South Haven and Breedsville. The pastors serving the charge during this time were Reverends Tendlam, VanWyke and Berry. The first record of admission into the membership of the church is that of Ann M. Witter, March 3, 1861, by Rev. E. R. Kellogg.The first recorded baptism is Frances Bradley, September 10, 1865, by Rev. A. L. Crittenden. The first marriage, William Long, of Lafayette, and Sirenia Thomas of Lawrence, on December 18, 1865. Rev. G. C. Elliott compiled the first roll of members in 1875. There were 118 names; by 1880 the list had grown to 272 names.

In former years the church was organized in classes. Class No. 1 was led by Geo. Bennett and met at the church every Sunday. Forty-five were enrolled among whom we find these names: James Ellis, Susan Ellis, Louisa M. Barney and Amelia Taylor. Class No. 2 met in the Prospect Lake school house, was led by Lyman Cooper and in 1866 was transferred to the Lawrence charge. Class No. 3 was led by Amos Morris and held their services in Charlestown. Class No. 4 met in the Lee school house with Anson Hale as leader. James D. Kirtland led the East Decatur Class No. 5, which had 23 members. Later class leaders were David Webb, James Ellis, Chancey Holistee, Truman Bashford, Rev. H. Bray and Geo. Bassett. The Hamilton class, led by Edward Baxter, had 23 members. There are some members still living who can remember a few leaders and recall with pleasure the class meetings.

Following is a list of the ministers with the years they served:

The church at the present time employs a full time pastor in residence at 203 W. St. Mary's street in the parsonage owned by the church. The present membership of the church is 144 paying a salary of 1200 dollars a year to their minister. Benevolences last year amounted to $140. Perhaps it is a fact not generally known that the South Wayne Chapel, a beautiful little church in the open country south of Decatur is also the property of the church. Residents of the community now maintain the chapel at their own expense although it is no longer used as a place of public worship except on special occasions. For many years in the later 19th century and the early twentieth century it was an outpoint regularly served by the resident pastor of the Decatur charge.

One cannot help but feel that the ministry of this old church is still finding its way into the hearts of men and women of this community. We put our faith in God and with humble hearts look forward to a continued ministry that shall offer Christian service for many years to come.

THE MORRIS MURDER AGAIN

Stories of Decatur's Greatest Tragedy, Which Occurred the Night of September 28, 1879, Are Still Coming.

Here is more testimony in the Morris murder case sent to the Republican by Dana Smith of Paw Paw.

Charles Langdon was with a threshing crew at Parker's in the Valley. They were going from Parker's to Coulson's. Seth Coates owned the threshing outfit, and Langdon ran the engine.

Henry Morris went over to Parker's Saturday. He said he had 40 acres of wheat and wanted it threshed from the shock. Morelan said he could go there Monday afternoon. Morris said, "If you fellows can get there Monday morning you can have the job." "Couldn't do it," was the reply, "as we have to go to Coulson's first."

came along and asked Langdon to ride up to the Morris place as the Morris family had been murdered.

Johnnie Klinger worked for Morris by the month but had been away over Sunday. He came back by the way of Rosewarne's Monday morning and when near the Morris house he saw Henry lying on the back porch. He took hold of Henry and saw that he was dead. Then Johnnie commenced yelling and ran for Rosewarne's hollering at every jump and leaping over fences.

Rosewarne heard him coming and started to meet him. Johnnie would not go back to the farm that morning.

When Langdon got there quite a crowd had collected and the body had been taken inside. Mrs. Morris still lay where she had fallen, with arm extended over her head. She had been shot through the arm and body. She ran for her bedroom. The murderer shot at her as she ran and the bullet marks are there. She got to the closet where she fell near the window.

The hired girl was Jane Bull, 17, a very sound sleeper. Langdon knew as he had kept company with her.

In the Morris house an old-fashioned milk safe stood by the east door. Langdon saw bullet marks on the wall. He pulled out the safe and a bullet from a .45 calibre revolver fell to the floor. It was a bright moonlight night and Henry had no lamp.

Charles Langdon attended a meeting at the school house the night of the murder. The murderer took Morris' horse and saddle and they were found at South Bend.

The above story was told to Dana Smith by Charles Langdon.

Dear Mr. Moulton:—

Many thanks for following me north with the paper. It contains the most news of any town paper I have read. Last week there was more home news. Glad the girls are keeping their resolutions.

Have had a very pleasant winter with the girls here; plan to be home first of April. It may be lonely but it is home.

Riley would have been 79 years old the 20th of this month. We only lacked a year of our 50th anniversary.

Have real interest in the Morris murder. Was ten years old at the time. My step-mother was ill and a girl by the name of Ella Watson was helping with the housework. She was a neighbor of the Morrises and she felt so badly my father had to take her home.

Have often wondered if she is now living and has a family. A few years later my brother Will went west, settled in Nebraska. Later with his wife he visited a brother-in-law in Montana, and met a man living alone in the hills. He declared he was the man who committed the terrible murder, but of course, could not prove it. Have thought he might have imagined it, but since reading the article about the sheriff of Van Buren Co. going to Washington and recognizing the man, no doubt, he was the one my brother met in Montana.

That was such a tragedy at that time. Now we can scarcely pick up a city paper but what it has the headlines of some crime.

Is the world getting worse or was it because 60 years ago, we had no way of hearing about crimes. By the way, I felt the earthquake for the first time, trusting it will be the last.

Sincerely,

(Mrs.) A.R. Zimmerman

A STORY OF THE DOPP FAMILY

By Mrs. Kenneth Adams

I will tell you a legion of the Dopp family, which even Abner Moon never published, and he told many a story of this once well known Wayne township people.

This story was told me by Matt Dopp, a younger brother of Ransom, who had a wonderful memory. Most of it happened before he was born and he told it from memory as he heard his mother tell it.

In 1660 James, Duke of York, afterwards King James II of England, sailed into New Amsterdam and captured the city and surrounding lands without bloodshed. If I remember right he took them from the Hollanders who had settled there, and changed the name to New York. He put up the English flag and sailed away again.

Among the men who were with him was his best friend, Lord Fairington. James, who was Scotch, and therefore generous to his friends, gave Lord Fairington a vast tract of land near Albany.

The time when Lord Fairington settled there was not mentioned, and of course the Fairington mentioned in this story was not the great one but a descendant. But before the Revolutionary war broke out the Fairington family and a patroon family whose name was Dopp lived near Albany.

There was a daughter in the Fairington family and a son in the patroon family, and the two were playmates.

One day both families went away for a little while and left the two children at home. While they were gone the Indians came to the Fairington home and burned it, and when the families came back they found only blazing ruins.

They were frantic about the children who were gone, and the men prepared hurriedly to set out after the Indians, when one of the mothers cried out, "Look, there they come!"

Sure enough young Dopp came proudly out of the forest leading the little girl by the hand. "They were strange Indians," he explained, "and did not know of the big hollow tree where our playhouse is. We just went in there and stayed till they went away. I told you I would take care of her."

In spite of the ruins about them the two families gave thanks to God that, though their buildings and crops were destroyed the children were alive and unharmed.

The years went on and the children kept up their friendship. When the Revolutionary war broke out Lord Fairington remained loyal to his king, but young Dopp joined the American army.

When Lord Howe surrendered New York to Washington Lord Fairington sailed for Halifax and took his family with him. George III, to recompense him for the tract of land near Albany which he abandoned to the Americans, gave him a tract of land near Quebec.

When the Revolutionary War was over young Dopp went to Quebec to claim his bride, but Lord Fairington refused his permission and forbade his daughter to think of marrying her patroon lover.

But this was America, even in those days. The young lady let herself down from her window that night, and they skated across the St. Lawrence river and were married in the United States.

Lord Fairington's daughter was Ransom Dopp's grandmother and Matt. Kinney's great grandmother, if I remember correctly. (Then of course she must have been the great grandmother of the other Kinney brothers, Edward and Arthur of Decatur.)

Anyway she was an ancestor in the direct line, and at the time Matt. Dopp told me this story some of the brothers were trying to get the tract of land near Quebec. The estates in England were entailed to the male heirs.

I hear it is almost useless to try to do anything like that, as every 20 years unclaimed lands go to the crown, as in this country delinquent taxes take the farms after a certain length of time.

I spoke about it once to Mrs. Secor, Ransom Dopp's daughter, and while she scoffed at the idea of there being any fortune to get, she said she remembered the old lady well. She saw her once when visiting some of the relatives near Hillsdale and all she could talk about was the Revolutionary war.

A patroon is a proprietor of any certain tracts of land with manorial privileges, granted to members of the Dutch West India Company under the old Dutch government of New York and New Jersey. Abolished about 1850.

A tract fronting 16 miles on the seacoast or on the bank of the Hudson river, or 8 miles on both banks, was granted to those who settled 50 colonists.

AN OLD TIMER WRITES HOME

Fairdealing, Mo.,
July 4th, 1938.

Mr Arba N. Moulton.
Dear Sir,-

I have been thinking of writing you a few lines. We are having a fine summer here. Corn is caring, harvesting is all done, threshing most done. Wheat is not very good, apples half a crop, early peaches good but all gone now. Late peaches not so good.

I see in your paper it gives the names of Decatur's old ball club. Ed. Myers was an uncle of mine. Us kids used to stand with our mouths open and watch him and Del Kurtz throw at the ball on top of the old flag pole. They said that Del was the only one who ever hit it.

I saw in the paper what Charlie Dine said about his curves and the Volinia ball club, so I will tell you about the best club Volinia ever had.

Jack Goble, Lime Gant, Hugh Rich, Charlie Warner, Charlie Criffield, Frank Morlan, Jay Warner, Will High and myself were the players.

Lime was our pitcher. He could not throw any of those curves like Charlie told about, but the up shoots and down shoots he could throw were fierce, as my fingers can testify.

We wore no masks and no gloves like they have now, but I had to catch them if I could.

Lime and Jack were not hard batters but great runners. If they could bunt the ball they were sure to get to first base. I think Jack could run the fastest, for there never was but one Ball that could catch him, and that was Miss Lida Ball.

Well, as I am such a poor writer I had better quit this so you can get the paper out on time. But maybe I had better tell you what makes me such a good scholar. This is the way it was:

The first day, before school began, I and some other boys were playing marbles and a boy by the name of Orrie Summers came along and kicked the marbles out of line. That meant a fight, and the first I knew one of the teachers had me by the hair and told me to report to the professor. I started to do it, but when I got to the top of the stairs had made up my mind I had no business with him, so I went on down the back stairs.

That explains everything, but if this is not too much of an epistle for you to read I may write you about when I first came to Missouri and some of the old timers who used to live there and came here.

Ed. High, Fairdealing, Mo.

Dear Old Timer,—

It's fine to hear from you, Ed. Your writing is easy to read. You ought to see Jont's writing. Your writing is like the beautiful free hand Spencerian movement beside his. But I can read Jont's writing with one eye shut. The only trouble with both of you is that you don't write often enough. So send the good letters along and what we can't read will guess at, and give the old timers a laugh or a touch of sober memory occasionally anyway.

Basil Ewald (maybe you call him Awald) came in the day your letter came. He says you are his uncle. Can you remember the little fellow? Basil is thin now. He could almost put two of him in the pants that a year ago were made for him. That is what 2½ months in the hospital does for a soldier. But he is fast coming out of his difficulties, as you will conclude by learning that he is able to make the trip here.

His wife is with him—Nellie Arnold Carney of past years. They drove on to Kalamazoo for a day with Nellie's sister, Eva Hamlin. Saturday they are booked for another call at the printing office en route to the golden wedding celebration of John and Electa Maxon in Dowagiac. Of course you know all about that. It will be a great celebration, and it would be great if you could be to it.

Old Father Time picks off a pioneer now and then, but the boys and girls who are still sticking to the old earth should get all the pleasure they can out of life, and there isn't much greater pleasure for them that to hear from old friends. Wouldn't it be interesting to get a circular letter started, all directed to and printed in the Republican.

Start it to going, Ed., and we will see how many we can draw out.

The Ed. to Ed.

STONE FROM OLD BAILEY ESTATE WILL BE COUNTY'S CONTRIBUTION TO STATE CAIRN

Sometime this month Van Buren county will send a handsome granite boulder on which the name "Van Buren" has been engraved to Old Mission point north of Traverse City where it will be placed beside stones from other Michigan counties.

The state cairn, located at a point said to be midway between the equator and North Pole, will be a testimonial to the work of Hugh J. Gray of the West Michigan Tourist and Resort association, one of the prime movers in many campaigns to attract tourists to Michigan's great vacation-land.

The idea of the cairn originated last year and every county in the state will send a stone characteristic of its location or history to be used in a shaft that will be formally dedicated June 28.

Van Buren's stone was selected from those on the estate which was the birthplace of Liberty Hyde Bailey, perhaps the most notable man to ever come from the county and one who has achieved nation-wide eminence as a horticulturist, botanist educator, lecturer and author.

Coming from the Bailey estate, the boulder is believed to be typical of Van Buren county where fruit growing is a major pursuit and where beautiful scenery and fine beaches and lakes each year draw thousands of resort guests.

Ruth Mary Myhan, South Haven resort manager and director in the West Michigan Tourist and Resort association, was county chairman for the selection of Van Buren's contribution to the cairn. She was assisted by George Pickell, secretary of the South Haven Chamber of Commerce, A. H. Glassman, resort owner, and Major Frank T. Warner. The engraving work was contributed by Earl Thompson, South Haven.

"I can't say too much for Mr. Gray's untiring work in behalf of the tourist business," Miss Myhan declares. "He is recognized as one of the leaders in that type of work—not only in this territory but internationally."

"Recently when South Haven's schools, Scott club and other organizations were holding special programs in honor of Dr. Bailey's 80th birthday the committee for the Gray testimonial felt it particularly fitting to link these men together," Miss Myhan continues. "Recognized as the foremost horticulturist in his field, Dr. Bailey is South Haven's most famous son. He is a pioneer in his field and has spent a lifetime in scientific pursuits for the betterment of farm products and to enhance the natural beauty of the landscape. Hugh Gray has spent himself in developing Michigan's tourist industry—in inviting people to enjoy beautiful scenery, to partake of health and recreation. Both are quiet, retiring men of great personal charm. Both might well be called friends extraordinary," Miss Myhan says in notifying state testimonial leaders that Van Buren's contribution is ready to be shipped to the old Mission point cairn.

THE COLORED CHURCH SETTLEMENT

The Information for This Story Is Furnished the Republican by Lewis Goens and James Cotton.

This is a record of the colored settlement which centers around the First Baptist church of Decatur, the colored church located 3½ miles north of this village.

The church was built in about the year 1868 on ground presented to the organization by Henry Lindsley. The gift was with the condition that it should stand so long as the organization is maintained, and when it is no longer used as a church the land will revert to the Lindsley heirs.

There is not so much interest in the church as in the past. The old members have died or moved away But the organization is still alive and services are held often enough to keep it in good standing.

The first of the settlers were two families of Winburns. They came here from Indiana in 1850.

Three families of Cottons came in 1852.

Two families of Jeffries, 2 families of Vaughns, 2 families of Curtises and one family of Lennoxes all came from Indiana about the same time.

Four families of Fosters, one family of Coopers, one family of Mosses, one family of Battles, four families of Mahoneys came from Ohio.

Three families of Bradleys, one family of Longs, three families of Hamiltons, one family of Bennafields, came from Kentucky.

Granison Hamilton brought Lewis Mallory here as a slave in the early fifties and gave him his freedom, and for many years Mallory lived in a shack on the Hobart Millard farm, and died there.

One family of Worix, one family of Revels, two families of Manuels came from Tennessee.

Two families of Roberts, three families of Lowries, two families of Browns, one family of Watkins, one family of Simpsons, two families of Hills came from Indiana.

One family of Wilsons came from Island No. 10 in the Mississippi river. Three families of Weavers and one family of Ampeys came from Indiana.

We ought to include Aaron Burnett in this list. He settled in the village and so far as I know he was Decatur's first barber. He was a pretty nice old fellow.

Lived 130 Years

Henry Banks is another old timer we ought to name. He was a slave and came to the settlement after he was freed by the Civil war. He lived around the settlement for many years and then bought 40 acres of land up in the northwest corner of Waverly township, known as the Garden of Eden, and lived there till he died in 1930.

He had three children, Nettie, Oliver and Jim. Nettie is in Chicago, Oliver is in Ohio and can't say whether Jim is living or dead.

Henry Banks lived to be 130. We have to take his word for that, but the evidence bears out his statement. Lew. Goens, who is 82, says Henry was a middle aged man when he was a mere boy.

Henry said that when he was 12 years old he hailed soldiers from the surrounding country to New Orleans to help the British in the war of 1812.

Henry used to boast that he had a lot of brothers and sisters and that he was the best-looking of all of them. Those who remember him will smile at this as he was about five feet tall and so bow-legged that he couldn't stop a hog. His mouth extended almost from ear to ear, and he was always in good humor.

One time when he was about 80 he came upon some of the boys of the neighborhood and proceeded to be a boy with them. He jumped up in the air and cracked his heels together twice. The boys tried it after he had gone but none of them could do it.

One time when the Plopper school was in session and it was warm and the doors were open Henry Banks came along and walked up onto the platform in front and made up funny faces where the pupils could see him.

They laughed and the teacher went out to see what was causing it. When she saw Henry she rushed back into the room and Henry rushed off down the road. The teacher said to the pupils, "If you were as interested in your studies as you are in what is going on outside you would not see so much to laugh at."

Many years ago a crowd of boys had assembled at the depot to watch the fast train go by. Henry was there for the same purpose. As the train approached at a speed of about 50 miles an hour the mail clerk threw off the mail bag and it came rolling on toward the station. Henry saw it and became wildly excited. He grabbed his cap from off his head, ran out onto the track, jumped up and down and waved his arms and shouted, "Stop her, stop her, you've lost something." He came very close to being run over, for the train did not stop.

Back in the early days when the settlement was being formed most of the founders came here by train and a conductor remarked that the best-looking colored people between Detroit and Chicago got off at Decatur.

Wrecking a Decatur Landmark

The building best known as the Hinckley livery barn has become a thing of the past, a building that will exist hereafter only in the memories of our townspeople.

We are not sure but think it was built by M. M. Seymour, father-in-law of Mrs. Percy Nash Seymour of Bangor.

The village directory of 1869 contains the following advertisement:

Feed, Sale and Livery Stable,
Seymour and High, Proprietors.
Feed for Horses, Tame Hay,
Oats and Corn constantly on Hand.
West Side Public Square, near Depot.
M. M. Seymour, Jas. H. High

In its day it was a fine, commodious barn and has housed some high bred, speedy animals.

It is rather difficult to trace the history of this barn from memory. Chas. Rawson thinks it was built by Thomas Brownbridge, one of Decatur's earliest and most prominent residents. He came to America from England and it is said that he spent three fortunes here. Everything he did was on a big scale and well done. The Brownbridge farm just north of the village was famous sixty years ago for its fine buildings. The land is still owned by Mrs. Gene Cogshall of Oklahoma, once a daughter-in-law of Thomas Brownbridge.

At one time Anson D. Scott ran the barn. He had a son by the name of Charlie Scott, a fine young man of 18, who was kicked in the face by a horse and killed.

In 1869 Anson D. Scott was a farmer and his home was on the East Decatur road near the east village limits.

Fifty years ago William Graham ran the barn. He was followed by Chas. Tase and Jake Shookman. Then our townsman, Bert Hinckley, bought it and conducted a successful business until the coming of the automobile put livery stables out of business.

The property now belongs to the estate of Orrin A. Isham who used the building for a storage of produce. Dick Ulrich, his successor in their muck farming enterprise, bought the building, which has been a partial wreck for several years, and will use the lumber to build a storage on his farm.

Some of our enterprising citizens have plans to convert the lot into a play ground.

If any of our old time readers can add to the above information about the barn we shall be glad to print it.

ANDREW McGOWAN

Lawrence, Mich.,
April 9, 1938.

Dear Editor,—

There is a saying that where there is a will there is a way, and this is a story of a poor boy who found the way. In fact it was proven true by two Corwin boys and a young man who taught the Corwin school two terms in the early days.

Andrew McGowan, son of George and Caroline McGowan, was born in Alliance, Ohio, September 19, 1851. He took to books and an education like a duck to water. One day at the age of 12 he came home and surprised his parents by saying he was going away to school to get an education, and the following conversation between himself and his parents followed:

Parents, "Why son we cannot send you away to school, pay your board, tuition, and buy your books and clothing. We are sorry for we would like to help you to get an education; but your brothers and sisters are poorly clothed and we can hardly keep soul and body together without extra burdens. No, Andrew, sorry as we are to say it we could not give you a thin dime for your education."

Andrew,—"I did not expect any help from home. I was just telling you I am going away to school to get an education."

A few days after this conversation Andrew threw his few belongings into an old battered suit case and left for Coldwater where he had made arrangements with his Uncle Jonas McGowan, then a lawyer of that city, to board with him and go to school.

In those days every well to do business and professional man kept one or two driving horses and carriages. The horses had to be fed and cared for and the buggies had to be kept clean and shiny. It was this kind of work and other chores that Andrew did for his board and lodging the four years he attended the Coldwater school where he graduated.

He then went to Ann Arbor and entered the law department, his uncle lending him enough money for his necessary expenses the first year. He was lucky to get into the home of a well to do family that had horses and buggies to be looked after and this work Andrew did for his board and lodging.

When school let out in June for the summer vacation Andrew came home and worked with his brothers in the hay and wheat fields for other farmers. He earned enough money during vacation for his tuition, books and clothes for the next year.

After four years he was admitted to the bar and practiced law in Coldwater for a while. He then went west and established himself in the practice of law with the firm of Kingsbury and McGowan in the thriving mining town of Hailey, Idaho.

He bought a cow ranch and stocked it, and his young brothers back home gathered 8 bushels of walnuts and shipped to him to plant a walnut grove on his ranch.

He also bought a silver mine near Hailey for ten thousand dollars, but the seller knew more about salting silver mines than he did.

Andrew was running for circuit judge when he was taken seriously ill of brain fever and passed on, thus ending the earthly career of a self-made man. Edwin McGowan.

JONT SAYS, - -

I was out to one of the Wednesday night concerts they had. They had dances, but I cannot say it was dance music, that is, not the dance music I was born and brought up on.

In Ezra Stuyvesant's dance time of fifty odd years ago they played 75 to 80 different tunes in an evening. The fiddle he played was one he had taken out of a house down south during the Civil war while he and several other soldiers were out on a raid.

You could hear it all over a large hall and Ez. played all of the music by ear.

Jay DeMoss played the piccolo, and when they wanted some new tunes Jay could read the notes. He would play them on the piccolo and Ez. would follow him. By the time Jay could execute the music in good shape Stuyvesant had it stored away in his mind.

I remember they had a set of tunes called the Lancers. There were 16 of them. How I used to enjoy dancing to them. As time went on I learned to play several of the pieces on the violin. Speaking of ear music, I at one time knew about 125 tunes of all kinds and could play them without any music.

In Stuyvesant's dance band there were 4 people. He played first fiddle; Jay DeMoss, piccolo; Perry Young, second fiddle and caller; and Ely Young, bass viol. By the way, Ely Young had the best tenor voice of any I have ever heard, and Ada Warner Stretch had the best alto voice.

Charlie Ball could play the violin so well you would just have to stop and hear him. So you see Warren Mosier, who was relation to the Youngs and Balls, did not have to go outside of the family to get his ear for music.

At one time in early life Eddie Copley studied music. I have heard him play the old tunes like Munny Musk, Fireman's Dance, Opera Reel, Virginia Reel, Arkansas Traveler, in fact all of the tunes of those days.

His brother, Ward Copley, also studied music. I said to Ed., "I suppose Ward is by this time a good violinist." "Well," he said, "I suppose so, but somehow I don't jest like his fiddling." So you see one has his likes and dislikes.

The Stuyvesant band played for dances in all of the towns and country places within 10 or 15 miles of their homes.

Seth Fassett was another good violinist. He played by note. Less Gard was another. Charles Dine was his helper on the banjo and called. He was a good one. He married Delia Ball.

Frank Langdon of Lawton was a good fiddler. I will close by saying I knew all of the old time fiddlers around here and danced to their music. But those times are gone by forever and the fiddlers are now in heaven just as sure as there is a fiddler's green. Jont, Goble.

MORE MEMORIES OF PLOPPER DISTRICT

To the Republican:

I read Eddie Plopper's story about the Plopper school in the Republican last week and it brought some Plopper district history to my mind.

My grandfather, Macagia Cotton, lived in Halifax, North Carolina as far back as my folks know about. They say that his father, my great grandfather, was a full blooded Englishman. He settled in North Carolina and married a half blood Cherokee Indian by the name of Kittie Wiggins.

My grandfather married a half blood Indian by the name of Elizabeth Weaver. He and my great grandfather both were slave owners. My grandfather came west to Charlottesville, Indiana, in 1836. He brought along a slave woman and gave her her freedom.

He moved from Indiana to the south shore of Reynolds lake in the Plopper district in 1852. He had 12 children by his first marriage. Then he lost that wife and married a white woman by the name of Caroline Bennafield Jackson. They had two children, Mrs. Ed. Wilson of Benton Harbor and Eli Cotton of Battle Creek.

My father, Josh Cotton, belonged to the first family. He was born in 1840 and had his schooling in the log school house in the Plopper district. He and his brothers, Tom and William went to the Civil War and all came back.

My father belonged to the First Michigan cavalry and once he was captured. When the Johnnies were disarming his comrades he made a break and got away. Two bullets went through his blouse and one through his hat brim. When his horse jumped a ditch he fell throwing Josh, against the horn of his saddle and, hurting him so badly that the right leg shrivelled and became two inches shorter than the other, but he got away. He was in the war 2 years and 9 months, and saw 63 engagements.

My mother's folks, Thomas and Anna Winborn, came to the Plopper district in 1850 and settled on the east bank of Christie lake, now the Mrs. Lulu Gage farm.

I began school in the Plopper district in 1880 when I was 5 years old. My first teacher was Laura Loveland and in all I went to 16 teachers there. I quit school when I finished the 8th grade.

My father and mother were married in Lafayette, now Paw Paw, in 1866 and lived 50 years on the farm where Lewis Goons now lives. They attended the Disciple church which was held in the school house. The organization moved to Decatur when I was a boy and built the church now the Christian Reformed church.

My grandfather, Macagia Cotton, was a Baptist minister. In the days before the Civil war, before the country was cleared, he walked through the woods to Paw Paw Sunday mornings and preached in the Baptist church there.

Origin of Name Dowagiac

"Recent researches among the Potawatomies of Cass county reveals an entirely new interpretation of the meaning of the Indian word from which Dowagiac is derived," says George R. Fox, an authority on Michgan Indian lore. The currently accepted meaning of Dowagiac is "the place of many fishes," or "river of many fishes," which seems rather a free translation, since the red men, in telling its meaning, frankly said the word contained no root element meaning "fish or fishes" of "river or stream."

According to latest information the real term is "De-war-gah-yuk," spelled phonetically to express the Potawatomi sounds. It does not refer to the creek or river now known as the Dowagiac, but to all the creeks and streams in this region, particularly those occupying the area formerly covered by Glacial Lake Dowagiac.

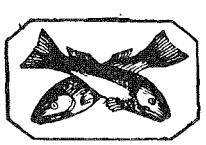
"The real meaning is 'dip up' or 'scoop up'," says Fox. "It is so called by the Indians to designate this region in which they found it possible to dip or scoop up, with nets or with their hands, great numbers of fish. When the Indians of the South Haven—or any other locality—set out for the Cass county region, they told their friends they were going "to Doewah-gah-yuk," the "scoop up" place. And it was known that they were going fishing in that region where fish were so plentiful they need not be caught with hook and line but could be scooped up in great numbers.

One Indian informant said: "In those days, the streams were so full of fish that the Indians dipped up baskets of fish with every lift of the net, or caught and threw them out with his hands."

The same informants give a new source for the name of Kalamazoo. It is not such a romantic meaning as certain others give it, but has back of it a prosaic Potawatomi interpretation.

The Potawatomies call the place where Kalamazoo is located 'Kuknahm-zoo." It means, as nearly as can be given in English, "smothered," or more properly "he smothered."

It seems that long years ago, a Potawatomi, wandering along the banks of the river, now the Kalamazoo, ran into smoke from a forest fire and becoming confused nearly smothered before he finally escaped from the burning area. Ever afterwards his fellow Indians referred to that region as "Kuk-nahm-zoo," meaning the place where a redman nearly smothered in the midst of a forest fire.—Dowagiac Community News.



Efficiency System Established in Decatur Postoffice

For the first time in the history of the postoffice of Decatur, or since the inception of the mail service in this community, the First Assistant Postmaster General advises our postmaster that the efficiency rating system shall be installed in this office. So far as we can learn from a reliable source the system has been installed since July 1, 1938.

The efficiency rating system is very puzzling and very complicated to be understood by an outsider so we persuaded an employee to explain it to us. He says it is simple once you get the idea, "The system has been in practice in all first class offices and offices having 25 or more employees. The device or system has been perfected to a T that any employee can grade his own efficiency independently and without any bias, discrimination or favoritism.

At its first inception the rating of an employee depended upon the pleasure and discretion of the postmaster or immediate superior. This latter practice led to corruption and injustice to the subordinate employees. There were so many complaints that employees received or rather rated very low due to, in some cases, the postmaster or immediate superior having a grudge or prejudice against subordinates, and in some cases, a lazy, worthless employee, who waits only for pay days receive a much higher rating than the one deserving.

So the department devised or rather made a list of penalties (there are about 300 kinds of penalties) upon which a rating of an employee is based. Thus, sorting of first class letters the list calls for 22 pieces per minute which equals 100 per cent; rate of walk with full load is 2¼ miles per hour, half load 3½ miles; ¼ load 4 miles per hour equals 100 per cent. Insubordination equals 700 demerits, and so forth.

It takes 1,500 demerits a year to remove an employee. A demerit is a penalty in the parlance of the postoffice. Like in school, employees of the postoffice are required to pass an annual examination, only the employees are given three tries. If the employee fails to pass the examination for the third time—well, he is either reduced to a lower grade of salary or gets fired, if there are enough demerits to back his removal from office.

Of course, in a small office like ours, the system has never been known to be in practice but on the other hand it is a good thing, it keeps the employees on their toes and away from corruption and malfeasance in office.

Some say that this efficiency rating system is the "bunk." Of course, if you never had it nor gone through it, it is the "bunk." But I will say it is the best, honest and just, simply because I don't have to depend upon the good side of my immediate superior for a higher rating of efficiency, for I know it is up to me to make that efficiency. It is just like a ladder with so many rungs to climb, each rung is rated. The higher you climb the higher rating you get and that is the "Efficiency Rating System."

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE NEGRO

Extracts from a Lecture by Dr. Joseph M. Evans of Chicago, Brother of Our Townsman, C. C. Evans

The Chicago Defender printed a sermon by Dr. Joseph M. Evans which it styles a masterpiece. It recounted some of the achievements of the colored race. The minister said:

"We stand credited with having discovered iron in the heart of Africa thousands of years ago. We founded the ancient world's university in which the greatest of the Greek studied.

"We provided Moses with his first wife, and through Jethro, priest of Midian and Moses' father-in-law taught the leaders of the Hebrew people his first lessons in law which are handed down to our present time.

"In the veins of King Solomon undoubtedly flowed Negro blood, for was not Solomon the son of Bath-Sheba, the beloved wife of Uriah the Hittite, a descendant of Ham through his son Canaan? By this way as well as by the way of Jericho, and Ruth of Moab, we contributed our share toward the physical make-up of the body of the son of God, for we were a part of His ancestry.

"Prof. Leo Weiner of Harvard university believes we were the first to discover America. He bases his opinion on what he believes to be a fact that some of the words and customs of the Indians were undoubtedly of African origin. Does not all of this recall the story of the lost Atlantis?

"When Herod sought to slay the young child, Jesus, He found a protecting asylum among us in Egypt, for does not the Book of God say, 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son.' And when Christ was on His way to Calvary, and sank beneath the awful weight of the cross, was it not Simon the Sydenian, an African, who came to His assistance?

"When Christopher Columbus sailed the uncharted seas and discovered America, history tells us that the pilot of his fleet, Pedro Alonzo Nino, was a Negro.

"There were thirty of us with Balboa at the discovery of the Pacific ocean.

"We assisted Cortez in the conquest of Mexico, and were the first to plant wheat in this our beloved country, the United States of America.

"When Gautemala was explored, and the conquest of Chile, Peru, and Venezuela, was accomplished, we were present to share in it all.

"We were here in America before the Dutch brought a few of us to these shores in 1619, for we figured very prominently in the founding of St. Miguel, near Jamestown, Va., in 1526, 93 years before the representatives arrived with the Dutch.

"In 1698 we had a republic in Brazil called 'Palmares.' 700 of us fought with the Colonists for American independence. In 1778, we were in the battle of Rhode Island. Later on, we witnessed the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

"We were with Perry on Lake Erie, and saw Robert E. Lee surrender to U. S. Grant, at Appomattox Court House April 9, 1865.

"We were with the Rough Riders at San Juan Hill, and performed well our part in 'no man's land' during the World war.

"Every Negro should know and feel that he is an integral part of a great ancestry, and that it is his high privilege and divinely appointed duty to join with all other human beings in working with life's constructive forces, life's marvelous powers, in bringing to pass the wonderful purpose of the world's establishment. He must work co-operatively with God, and with all men, in his attempt to answer the end unto which he was born.

"God's future man will not be made until the Negro brings to the making his contribution. Out of the gatherings of the best material and spiritual forces from everywhere the Eternal Spirit of everlastingness, will mould and fashion and build the world's future citizen, the KIND OF MAN GOD WANTS ALL OF US TO BE."

WRECKING A DECATUR LANDMARK

Jackson, Michigan,
July 9, 1938.

Dear Friend Arba:—

A few weeks ago the question was asked as to who built the Hinckley livery barn. Thede Throwbridge a business man in Decatur at that time and close friend of the Brownbridge family, claimed it was built by Thomas Brownbridge. I am quite certain he gave the year as 1866.

The barn after a while was owned by John Humphrey and operated by Horatio (Rach) Hendrix. He was also sheriff of Van Buren county.

My aunt, Mrs. Martha White, owned a farm about 2 miles west of Decatur, just off the west curve of the M. C. R. R. In 1868 she sold it to A. D. Scott. In 1870 Scott traded his farm with John Humphrey for his livery barn which he operated until his death. He lived on West Sherwood street, first house west of the Earl Copley home. Some years later my mother bought the Scott home and lived there until her death.

Thomas Brownbridge and Rach Hendrix lived just across the street. John Humphrey lived corner of George and Beers streets.

The last business I did with the livery barn was May 16th, 1883. At that time it was operated by Thomas Brownbridge and his son John. I wanted to drive out to my father's home but did not want to return the same day, so John accompanied me in order to return the horse and buggy.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. Howland.

THE BROWNING FIRE

Dowagiac, July 9, 1938.

Mr. Moulton,—

I noticed the story in last week's paper about the Browning drug store fire.

We have pictures of that fire, if you would like to print them. I can send them to you if you will return to me when you are through with them.

My folks lived upstairs over White's barber shop at the time so we know something about it.

Yours truly,
E. C. Foreman,
803 W. High St., Dowagiac.

Mr. Foreman,—

Your offer of the photographs is appreciated. Not having the equipment for making cuts from photographs are unable to reproduce them in the Republican. Some time when you are coming to Decatur shall be glad to see them if you will bring them.

I worked 5 years in that old Browning drug store and left it two months before the fire. A. N. M.

THERE IS NO STAINLESS STEEL

Stainless steel is misnamed. In the first place it is not steel but an iron alloy. In the second place it is not always stainless.

History of Pokagon Twp., Cass County

By Herbert A. Lee

This township was named after Chief Pokagon, who previous to the settlement of the white people made his home on the west side of the prairie, which still bears his name.

The first settler was Uzziel Putnam, Sr., November 18, 1825, followed six days later by Baldwin Jenkin.

Uzziel Putnam Jr. was the first white child to be born in the township, also the county, on August 12, 1826.

In 1827 Israel Martan came to the Township. He was a blacksmith by trade and the first one to carry on a shop in the county.

The first school was taught by Miss Jane Brown in 1828.

The first tanyard was by David Sink.

Pokagon township was organized by the Territorial Legislature November 5, 1829. At that time it included Silver Creek which was cut off March 20, 1837, and the north half of Howard township which was cut off on March 7, 1834.

All for now.

Herbert A. Lee,
Dowagiac, Michigan.

P. S.—Mr. Uzziel Putnam, Sr., was the grandfather of U. P. Leader of Dowagiac.

A RAILROAD MAN RETIRES

(Martin F. Ryan, of Marshall, to whom the Republican is indebted for the story of the early days of the Michigan Central Railroad published a few weeks ago, will soon retire after an honorable service of 50 years. The following sketch of his life and work has been prepared by his newspaper friends and he has kindly sent this paper a copy.

We hope, after Mr. Ryan retires and has the time to get away from his home city he will visit this village where his father settled with his family in 1867, the year the Decatur Republican was established. He will find a good town with pleasant people in it, a number of them being relatives of his old friend, Will Howland. Perhaps, too, he can locate a few of his own relatives here.

We wish Mr. Ryan years of good health and pleasant times, and just enough opportunity for work to keep him contented.)

Martin F. Ryan, ticket agent for the Michigan Central Railroad in Marshall for the past 37 years, retires from the service of the road after 50 years of service, January 1, 1939.

Mr. Ryan was born in Mattawan January 1, 1871, the son of Martin and Mary Ryan, who emigrated from Tipparary county, Ireland, in 1867. They first settled in Decatur with the father who became engaged in the track department of the Michigan Central, and later was transferred to Mattawan, where he was promoted to the position of section foreman. He continued as section foreman and traveling construction foreman of extra gangs, and was still in the service when he died in 1906.

The son, Martin Jr., following graduation from school began work in the track department with his father in 1888, and in 1899 entered the telegraph department as a student. In October, 1890, he was accepted as a qualified telegraph operator and assigned to various points along the road as a relieving night operator.

In 1891 he was assigned to a permanent position as night operator at Marengo, and in the fall of 1892 was appointed to the agency at Burlington, being the first telegraph operator at that point. He relieved Manassa Edmonds, the latter being displaced due to the fact he was not an operator, and the company wished to install a telegraph office to facilitate the movement of trains.

In 1895 Mr. Ryan was promoted to the agency at Jones, Cass county, a thriving lumbering point at that time, where he remained until 1901. From there he was transferred to Marshall, as ticket agent from which position he will now retire after 37 years of service.

In September, 1895, Mr. Ryan was united in marriage to Ella J. Keefe of Clarendon, Calhoun county, and from this union four children were born the first Agnes, a school teacher, died in 1922. The three boys, Ronald, Edward and Fred, after graduating from St. Mary's Academy, entered the public high school, and following graduation from there entered the University of Michigan. The first two graduated in law and the latter in medicine. Ronald is located in Battle Creek, Edward in Kalamazoo and Fred in Pittsburgh, Pa.

Since Mr. Ryan came to Marshall in 1901, he has taken a lively interest in civic and political affairs, and while nominally a Democrat, he classifies himself as an independent liberal. He has the record of being the only Bull Moose candidate who ever made the race for mayor of Marshall. It was in 1913 that the Progressive convention held in G.A.R. hall, nominated him for mayor; H. J. Coleman for recorder; J. N. Gustin for treasurer, and H. A. Clute for justice. The Democrats had nominated E. C.Gauss and the Republicans, Eugene Bigelow.

Following an exciting campaign, E. C. Gauss won the election, although not having a majority over the combined vote of the opponents. At that time women did not enjoy the franchise, and incidentally equal suffrage was one of the paramount planks of the Bull Moose party. Further it can be truly said that all the major planks of that party became the law of the land within six years thereafter. These planks were classified by the reactionaries of both old parties at the time as anarchistic.

In 1909, in a sparkling campaign for mayor between the late E. C. Sawdy, nominee on the Democratic ticket, and George Leedle on the Republican ticket, Mr. Ryan was the nominee on the Democratic ticket for local school inspector. Sawdy won the election over Leedle by ten votes and Ryan over Arthur McKinstry by one vote. After winning the election, Mr. Ryan lost his job because the State Legislature abolished all positions of its kind, thus he was the last local school inspector in Marshall.

In 1917 he won the election for alderman of the third ward on the Democratic ticket. At this time the late D. W. Moon was serving as mayor, and it was he who inaugurated a system of parliamentary law rules governing the proceedings of the local council, and it was during this term on the council that the first fire engine was purchased for the city.

Roy Foster, Pioneer

Roy Foster has come back to his old home town to live. He is a native of Hamilton township which means that he is probably its earliest living resident.

He was born on what is known as the Wooster farm in the Barber district 84 years ago last August. His father bought and moved onto the farm at Foster corners in 1856, when Roy was 2 years old. He bought the farm of George Bennett and George Bennett bought it of the James Nesbitt estate.

James Nesbitt was a brother of Robert Nesbitt. He took the land of the government, a whole section, in the thirties and fell in the well and was drowned in the early fifties.

Roy's father's name was Truman Foster. He came from New York with his brother Ira in 1837. Ira settled in Keeler township.

Roy never lived in Decatur village, but it has always been his trading and home town. He never was married, but lived at home and with his relatives. In 1925 he went onto a farm in Arlington township and has since lived in Arlington and Lawrence.

He lived in the George Knapp family in Lawrence several years and came from there here. He was with the Blasdell family over 8 years.

The Ed. Genton family of the Nauvoo district are among his friends. There are 4 daughters in this family, 3 of them school teachers. One teaches in Holland, one in Rochester and one is spending this year on the farm. The fourth daughter is married and lives in Flint. Roy says they are workers too, all of them.

Our new resident has taken a room with Mrs. Florence High on East Delaware street and is comfortably settled for the winter.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL DOUBLE TRACKED IN 1901-5

Memory fails or becomes confused. And where there is no record one is apt to be a poor guesser as to dates. So it is that in trying to fix from memory such an important event as the double-tracking of the Michigan Central railroad the variation in dates is all the way from 1890 to 1906.

Thomas Mahoney settled the question by writing to his cousin William H. Howland of Jackson. Mr. Howland was in the employ of the Michigan Central 50 years and retired as engineer a few years ago. His reply came Monday morning and is as follows:

Jackson, Michigan,
February 10, 1938.

Dear Cousin.—

As to the building of the double track through Decatur.

It was built and pushed westward from Jackson from 1901. The first section built was from Jackson to Trumbull's, 5 miles, which was put into service October, 1902.

No. 10, the Boston express, was the first train over the new double track. William Kilmer was the engineer, No. 268 the engine, and trailer. Kilmer did not see the bulletin notice at Michigan City stating that the double track had been placed in service. The first warning he had was when he saw the position of the switch. He said that he set the brakes on the train but the speed as so high she made the turn and did not tip over. Kilmer said afterward that he owed the engine lots of respect that she held the rail and did not tip over.

The summer of 1904 there was a double track switch in front of the depot at Decatur and it was double tracked from Lawton to Decatur. It was used as such by the road trains and later by all trains. The first freight train over the new double track through Decatur was December 15, 1904.

It took about 5 years to build the new track from Jackson to Niles. It was held up several months on account of the new division between Kalamazoo and Mattawan. The building and grading of the two main tracks took more time than the contractors figured on.

So in May, 1905, there was a double track switch put in at Mattawan and the double track was put in operation between Mattawan and Niles.

The first two passenger trains to run over the division were known as Father O'Brien's specials from Kalamazoo to Notre Dame. The engineers were Gil Patterson and Jesse Dodge. They were held up for some time at Mattawan while the new main track rails were placed in position and spliced together. This was the final move that connected and completed the M. C. R. R. double track from Detroit to Chicago. The date was August 15, 1905.

I understand how you got mixed on the dates 1890 and 1891. The Chicago World's Fair was to be held in 1892 and later was changed to 1893, so the Michigan Central got ready for the World's Fair in 1892.

In 1890 and '91 they graveled the main line and sodded all sand cuts and sand banks east and west of Mattawan up White Oak hill and through Decatur to hold down the dust during the World's Fair traffic. They commenced at West Detroit and carried through to Kensington.

Sam McKinley acted as engineer on one engine and as master mechanic over all engines hauling gravel from Pokagon pit in 1890 and 1891.

I helped to build the double track from Trail Creek where the Michigan City draw bridge now stands to Huron river bridge at Ypsilanti, a distance of 200 miles. It took 33 years to complete the job.

I worked as water boy, laborer, brakeman, conductor and engineer.

Sincerely your cousin,
W. H. Howland.

FROM A REAL OLD TIMER

Raton, N. M., Dec. 23, 1938.

Dear Friend Arba:—

I wish to send by sincere thanks at this time for the copies of the Republican you have sent me during the past year and assure you that every one contained items of much interest to me. They all revive memories of former days that are very vivid.

The story of Wayland Nicholson's awakened events of early days when the country around Decatur was a great wheat raising country and in the fall when the farmers, bringing in the wagon loads at times reached up through Main street, waiting to unload at the "elevator." The past campaign recalls that of 1868 when Grant and Colfax ran against Wheeler and Wilson. The torch light processions, the raising of the Liberty pole down on the green where the park is now. The crowning event of all was the gathering of all the ox teams in the county, hitching them up to make a train over a mile long, hauling a wagon at the rear filled with old settlers of which my father and I think Charlie Rawson's father was one.

In your last paper, the disposal of the John Shaad shoe store recalls an event in my youthful years. At the age of 11 I went to work at the stave factory passing staves for Fred Minnis at 25 cents a day and the first money ($6.00) I accumulated, I went down to John Shaad's and got measured for a pair of boots, and was I proud.

Well, that onery, red-headed, freckled-faced kid, Charley has developed into a bald, round-shouldered guy of past 80 and still keeping office hours in one of the grandest country towns out of doors.

Tell Charley we may seem to be far away, but we get on the train at 12.30 p. m. and get off at Chicago the next morning at 8:20. What! The enclosed Christmas card is a copy of one taken at our cabin in the mountains not far away.

With kindest regards to all old timers, Tom Lyon.

(It is fine for all the old timers to receive this letter from Dr. Tom Lyon. It takes a real old timer to remember him, but there are quite a few of them around here and scattered over the country yet, and many of them are readers of the Republican. Our next door neighbor, Charlie Rawson, should have credit for sending some of those papers. He does not forget this friend of his boyhood days and it is worth a lot to anyone to be able to call him a friend. Write again, Tom, and we will keep you informed how well we are keeping the home fires burning.)

DR. THORP'S GOOD MEMORY

Christmas Time, 1938.

Good Friends:

As we look back over the year 1938 we are moved to a deeper, more sincere appreciation of our friends.

Each year we realize more fully that our friendships are what make life worth living and if, instead of a cold, formal, stereotyped message, the greeting is couched in our own words, and reflects our own personality, its value is naturally intensified greater.

We manifest our appreciation of our loved ones by tokens or remembrances at Christmas time. We manifest our appreciation of our friends by a word of friendly greeting, and so at this holiday time we want to extend to you our sincere good wishes as an expression of our genuine appreciation of your friendship.

May the Christmas of 1938 be your merriest and the year 1939 your most prosperous. Sincerely yours,
R. L. Thorp.

Hello Arba:—

Do you still crawl up stairs for your cookies as you did back in the '70's?
R. L. T.

(Let us introduce to younger readers of the Republican one who knew Decatur when it was young. Dr. Thorp was a country boy, one of the farmer boys of Little Prairie Ronde. He and Fin Huff came to Decatur to get their schooling and took a room upstairs in the Moulton house, the house where Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Pollock now reside. Their mothers kept them in cookies and this writer helped to keep them out of cookies. It was a great privilege to climb the stairs to the room of that jolly pair. Being forbidden to climb them except on special occasions for the reason that we would disturb the boys in their studies we sometimes took advantage of moments when the coast was clear. On one of these attempted stolen visits we got to the top of the stairs, lost our balance and bounced back like a rubber ball. There was a stair door at the landing that had been carefully and silently shut at the beginning of the climb. We struck this door with a bang, the latch broke and it slammed back against the wall with a loud noise. It was a long time after that before we got another sight of that cookie jar. For many years this fine friend of our childhood has been one of the leading physicians of Denver, Colorado.)

DOG COLUMN

A POEM

The following poem, by Miss D. Eardley-Wilmot, the writer of "Little Gray Home in the West," will stir deeply the souls of some of us who know what the experience it describes, means:

Dig the earth and dig it deep,
Let him rest and let him sleep.
He was loyalty and trust,
Gone, as we must go, to dust.

Faithful eyes that watched your own,
Ears that cocked for ev'ry tone,
Looks that told us ev'ry day
Love that humans seldom pay.

Dull, or fearful, tasks to do,
Still his footsteps followed you.
Just a dog—but what a plan!
Given as a friend to Man!

Dig the earth and dig it deep,
Let him rest and let him sleep.
God who knows that hearts can break
Sent him here to share that ache.

"SKIPPY," DOG HERO OF 1938

At a public meeting held at the Women's City Club of San Francisco, May 6, the Tribune of Oakland, California, presented "Skippy" of Fresno as "the greatest dog hero of 1938," and his master, Karl Foreman. This is Skippy's story as told in an editorial in the Tribune, March 2, last:

Through snow and cold, without food or water, for 12 days Skippy stayed beside the body of his mistress in the deeply-drifted mountainside near Quincy.

Skippy was only a dog, of doubtful antecedents, yet his devotion to his appointed duty cannot be excelled.

THUNDER

One of our favorite swear words is "Thunder."

We said it when, on reading a letter from Mrs. Fannie Foster O'Rourke of Banks, Oregon, and about to send it to the type setter we noticed in one corner the words, "Not for publication."

Just to appease our injured feelings we are going to print a part of it anyway.

Referring to an editor of the Republican of the seventies she wrote, "Mr. Buffington, the editor, was a gentleman of the old school, not the back slapping, baby kissing type. After leaving Decatur he was made consul to Chatham, Ontario."

Referring to the program of the high school entertainment held in the Spring of 1865, she wrote, "How that old program, rendered when I was six months old, my parents had just moved into town, came into my possession I cannot imagine."

Correcting a mistake we made in her previous letter she writes: "Decatur's first telegrapher was Franc Foster, sister of the one time resident, Mrs. W. H. Tucker, and daughter of W. B. Foster, a charter member of the Masonic lodge.

"Mrs. Tucker was the photographer in those days when we sat for five minutes perfectly still looking 'natural' as we had our pictures 'took'.

"Your reading of my hieroglyphics verified the verdict of one dear friend who said, "Fannie, your penmanship is beautiful, but the devil himself couldn't read it'. Some day I'll use the typewriter so my friends can know what I say."

Mrs. O'Rourk's writing is more legible than she admits. Changing the name of the first telegrapher of Decatur as it was written in her first letter was proof that we are not as smart as we thought we were. Remembering that Franc Castor was the telegrapher at this station in an early time we took it for granted that Fannie had made a mistake in writing the name 'Franc Foster'.

BIRDS

No. 51—WHIP-POOR-WILL— (Twilight Bird)

C. C. Evans

Description: A long wing bird of the twilight and night. Large mouth fringed with bristles. Plumage dusky and owl-like, spotted with black and gray. Wings beautifully mottled with shades of brown; outer tail quills white.

Note: "Whip-poor-will, whip-poor-will, whip-poor-will."

Season: Common summer resident.

Nest: Builds none, but substitutes a mossy hollow in rock or ground.

By request of a friend I am writing about this weird bird, with its bristling, fly-trap mouth that sleeps all day and prowls all night. While I am writing one is singing his twilight hymn, a short distance from my window, and the echo-like song, invariably breaks the silence of the clear, calm night.

This weird bird, comes to us late in April, if the season is warm, clamoring and making strange echoes in the bare woods, and in early September, mute and mysterious he gathers his flock and moves silently on, for the whip-poor-will has not at any time even a transient home to abandon; like the Pilgrims of old, the earth is his only bed.

I have in the past year collected some new information in regards to his habits. I also find he is somewhat erratic in local destribution, and is seldom seen near water courses, except in spring migration.

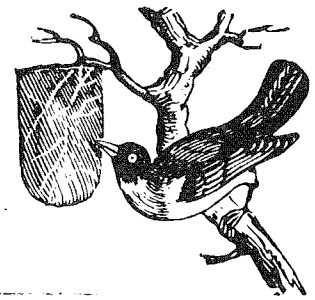
Many people are familiar with his cry who have never seen the bird; for nature has taken great pains to blend the colors of his plumage with the browns and grays of the bark and and rocks of the forest, and has given him the unusual habit of sitting lengthwise on the branch when he perches, so he closely resembles the branch against which he is so flattened as to escape notice.

The whip-poor-will prefers the forest solitude, but in his nocturnal flights he often comes near houses, and sometimes calls close to a window with startling vehemence.

The breeding habits of this strange bird are not the least of his peculiarities. When the ground-laid eggs are hatched, they are beset by many dangers from weasels, snakes, etc., but the young birds are almost invisible to the human eye, even if their location is known.

The female is very adroit, and if she thinks her family has been discovered she will move them to another place, carrying them in her mouth as a cat does kittens, in fact, the whip-poor-will is well protected, both by nature and superstition. The farmer knows his value as an insect-destroyer, and the idle mischief-loving class, who kill birds from pure wantonness, give him a wide birth, as being the possessor of some occult power akin to the "evil eye," and associate his sudden cry with some appalling calamity.

Next Golden Crowned Thrush.



Jan. 27, 1938.

I like to believe that God has a plan for each of us, just as an architect designs a home. We are contractors. We can follow God's plan and build beautifully, wisely and well, or we can [illegible] the plan and stubbornly [illegible] dimensions, cheapen the material, omit essential details, and when the house is done blame the architect for the mess we've made.

How often we do the latter and then wonder why we are so unhappy, why we are ill, why we are in need. It is much more sensible if we had followed the plan and how glorious would have been the result!

But the heartening feature of it all is that having made these mistakes, we do not have to keep on making them. God only asks that we make a new start. We have only to turn about and new opportunities, a clean page, a new life, a fresh plan is ours. St. Paul says, "Forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on . . . ."

Live not for the past nor the future,
The present is all that thou hast—
For the future will soon be the present,
And the present will soon be the past.
—Selected.

I DO NOT FEAR

I do not fear what life may do to me
For I am working in eternity,
I am not struggling for a miser's goal,
But aiming, rather, to protect the whole,
There is a simple creed behind the plan

Of life's expression, in the form of man,
That may be learned (if one would but obey)
And live not for tomorrow but today.
Obedient to the laws of simple life,
Avoiding worry, haste and waste and strife,
I will aim to strike the chord each day
That harmonizes work with rest and play.
Man was not born to be the tired slave
Of every woeful force from birth to grave,
It is for him to merely rise and say,
"I live not for tomorrow but today."

—Anonymous.

Most sincerely,
Your Old Friend.

CHARLES A. BELLIS

The Boy of Corwin Who Never Forgot His Boyhood Friends Will Write No More.

Last week there was time to say only a word about the death of Charlie Bellis before the time of printing arrived. Now we wish to comment in a way that will do justice, in so far as we are able, to a poor boy of this community who went out into the world and made in it a creditable place for himself.

Will begin with an account of his death which occurred in a hospital near his home town of Whittier, California, a town not far from Los Angeles.

Mrs. Bellis wrote on Sunday, January 16, as follows:

Dear Mr. Moulton,—

Charlie passed away this morning at 9:15. Blanche (his daughter) and I were with him to the last. He did not recognize us at all.

Mr. Moulton, the stories and 'Memories' are ended. He asked me to write you in regard to the story of Corwin. The lady who wrote it got some of her data from some of his writings. How proud he was to read it.

He planned his story of the colored people he knew in his boyhood, which he had named "Black Diamonds," but he could not write it. His hands were swollen so that he could no longer handle the typewriter.

I hope his writings will live in the memory of all who read them. He has lived his early life over and over. I know all of you, although I have never seen you. He would have been 68 in March and had lived a working life until sickness came upon him.

If at any time you come to California I would be glad to see you and know you for Charlie's sake.

With best regards,
Mrs. Bellis,
153 McNees Avenue,
Whittier, California.

And so the Memories and the stories will come from him no more and it falls to the editor to write the "Memory" of the boyhood friend who created the title and used it for a tribute to the pioneers of his native community when one by one they crossed the silent river.

Those memories were treasured and kept, and they can be found in many a scrap book in the homes that know the vacant chair.

Charlie knew but little of the comforts of life in his boyhood. Money was almost unknown to him. But he was taught from childhood that it was up to him to make his way in the world, and he did it.

He had comparatively little schooling, but possessed a native ability to meet and deal with people, and in a few years after he set out for himself he was able to earn a fair living.

His wandering and work finally took him to the beautiful land of southern California and there he married and built for himself a home. We of course have never seen it, but can imagine that it is a pretty cottage with vines growing upon it, and a beautiful garden of flowers by the side of it. We can imagine that he took great comfort in his home and that in his last years it brought him the peace and contentment for which he longed.

We shall miss the Memories and the stories, and as for those Black Diamonds, shall always regret that they were not recorded and wonder who they are. As Charlie cannot write his Diamond story, will supplement it with this tribute to him, and name it "A Diamond in the Rough."

Jane Law Chavileer Webster

(MRS. NORMAN E. WEBSTER)

Jane Law Chavileer (or Jennie L. as she was commonly known) was born April 1, 1845, in Hamilton county, near Cincinnati, Ohio, and died Thursday evening, March 3, 1938, at Kalamazoo, Michigan. She was the fifth child of Jonathan and Mary Hinkle Chavileer who in 1846 moved by wagon to the farm on the Valley road south of Decatur, Michigan, the hill on which still bears the Chavileer name. The children, Ellen Chavileer Welcher, John Chavileer, Rachel A. Chavileer Vought, Mary Ann Chavileer Northrup and Elizabeth Chavileer Cady, have all preceded her.

The buildings which she knew on her father's farm, later known as the Abbott and the Fifield farm, have all gone except the house which her brother occupied after he married Catherine Van Hise, but a part of the old Valley school which she attended remains.

On December 23, 1863, at Dowagiac, Michigan, she married Norman Earl Webster, born October 3, 1832, at Elba, Genesee county, New York, who died at Kalamazoo on November 23, 1921. They lived for short periods at Dowagiac and thereafter at Decatur until 1887, except for two years, 1879-1881, at Sturgis. In 1887, they removed to Findlay, Ohio, and after two years there and at Tecumseh, Michigan, they located at Kalamazoo which remained their home thereafter.

With her husband Mrs. Webster united with the Presbyterian church while living in Coldwater, being received by the Reverend G. L. Foster who afterward supplied the church in Decatur for a time. Later she was a member of the churches in Decatur and in Kalamazoo. In the latter city she was during many years a member of the Twentieth Century Club and the South Side Literary Club, the latter having elected her to honorary membership when advancing years made it impracticable for her to continue as an active member.

She is survived by her only son, Norman Edward Webster, who resides in New York City, and in Decatur by the family of the late Joseph Welcher ho was her nephew, and by the Misses Amanda and Rose DeBolt, cousins.

Monday morning at 10 o'clock in Kalamazoo at the Truesdale Chapel services were conducted by her pastor, Reverend John W. Dunning, and in Decatur at Lakeside cemetery by the Reverend L. F. Cooper. Interment was in Lakeside cemetery beside her husband.

A MYSTERIOUS DEATH

Mr. and Mrs. O. S. Chubbuck of Marcellus attended the funeral of a friend in Stockbridge recently. Mr. Chubbuck is the owner of the Dixie Service station and the Ford Sales and Service of this village and Herschell Morris is his local representative.

The Marcellus News says the death of his friend, Guy Ransdell, was very mysterious. He had gone into the basement of his place of business to fix the fire and was afterwards found dead and the body still in a standing position in front of the open furnace door. It is supposed that when he opened the door there was a puff of gas, fire and smoke which probably killed him instantly. His clothing was burned and the body was burned and charred with smoke. A mystery fully as great as that which caused the accident was the fact that the body remained in a standing position after death. Some explained it on the theory that breathing the gas caused the muscles to become so rigid that they held the body upright even after death. It was certainly a very unusual accident as well as a very sad one. We never heard anything like it before.

Elizabeth F. Hall was born October 17, 1849, in St. Louis, Mo. When she was two years old her family moved to Salt Lake City by ox team. Her childhood was spent in the Mormon city at the time Brigham Young was the head of the church and laying the foundation of the Mormon temple.

April 19, 1869, she was married to Alva H. Huyck, then stationed with a cavalry regiment at Ft. Bridger, Wyo. Sarah, her elder daughter, was born at Salt Lake City.

After her husband was mustered out of the service he took up a homestead in Kansas, near Chetopa, right on the border of the old Indian Territory. There the family spent the next 9 years and the other three children, Myra, Richard and Frank, were born. In those days the prairies were raw—plenty of buffalo and Indians—no dust storms as in the present day.

Ague (chills and fever) commonly known as "the shakes" in that locality, laid the foundation for her, gradually increasing deafness, about which she was extremely sensitive. This sensitivenss was never evidenced by any complaint but was shown by her gradually keeping more and more to herself in her later years. She realized it was difficult for people to visit with her on account of this affliction. A great lover of company and sociability with a wonderful sense of humor, she voluntarily isolated herself because she knew it was such an effort for others to try to talk to her.

In 1879 the family moved to the old Huyck homestead on Little Pairie Ronde where the next ten years were spent. It was a time when the Prairie was considered one of the finest farming sections in Michigan, the days before the automobile, when farmers were neighbors in the better sense of the word and depended more on each other for entertainment. They exchanged work at harvest time, were into the fields at daylight and out of them at sundown; always on hand in time of trouble, always available when harvest was through for any form of entertainment. It was a hard working, fun-loving community.

The old prairie was almost a closed corporation at that time. The Lawrences, Buells, Copleys, Huycks, Morrises, Rosewarnes, Thomases, Kerns, Hathaways and others were its residents.

And when winter came and farm work eased up, the card parties (pedro, not bridge), oyster suppers and dances were given, first at one house and then another. Old square dances with Geo. Kern playing first fiddle, beating time with his foot and calling the changes, were the popular diversion.

Hard working, earnest, fun loving farmers all—this was undoubtedly the happiest ten years of Mrs. Huyck's life, though it was shadowed by the loss of her daughter Myra.

In 1889 the family moved to Decatur where Mrs. Huyck spent the rest of her life. Her husband died in 1899, her daughter Sara in 1920.

She is survived by her two sons, Richard and Frank.

Her death Monday night, June 6, at about 11 p. m. terminated a long, full, useful life, with more than its share of tragedies and sorrows, all taken with a certain stoicism and equanimity. Every death in the family was a decided shock, sudden, unexpected—and yet she carried on, living her life as she was given to see it, a faithful wife, a fond loving mother, a kind friend and a good neighbor.

Her passing marks the end of a long life, lived to its utmost, with a cheerful acceptance of each day's joys and a calm resignation to the sorrows that each must meet. Few of her old Prairie friends are left, most of them have gone on before. Those few who remain rejoice to feel that she can now HEAR the loved ones who have preceded her.

FRANKLIN A. WAGNER

Lawrence, Mich.,
April 16, 1938.

Dear Editor,—

Last week I told the story of Andrew McGowan, a poor boy of the formative period of Corwin who went out into the world and made a place for himself.

This week I write of Frank Wagner, son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wagner, who likewise, by his own efforts obtained a university education, became a lawyer, and gained prominence in the great city of New York.

Frank Wagner was born on a farm near Corwin about the year 1870. When old enough he went to the Corwin school and was my school mate, although a few years younger.

He was a good boy, quiet, modest and a little bashful. He would do no harm to anyone and would take a lot from others before he would strike back. He was a good scholar for his age, always up with or a little ahead of his classes.

He took to books and learning easier than I did, but I never saw anything about him to indicate that he would be one of the seven wonders. Some of my other school mates seemed to be fully his equal.

After Frank finished the grades at the Corwin school he wanted to continue his education at college. He was ambitious to obtain a good education, but he had no money of his own.

Now it is not for me to say whether or not his parents were financially able to help Frank with his education. Be that as it may, I have always had an idea that they could have helped him had they seen fit to do so. But they gave a strong hint that Frank was no good. He would not do anything in the way of work on the farm; he would just read books and ponder over the life of some big man in history.

The parents did not like what to them was laziness in him and they did not intend to throw away their hard earned money to help him become a shiftless man who wouldn't work.

Their refusal to help him did not keep Frank from going ahead with his plans for an education. He went to town to school, earned his room and board by doing chores for a doctor, and after he had finished school the good doctor lent him money to enter the University of Michigan law school.

After his graduation he was admitted to the bar and began the practice of law in New York City. He became one of the leading attorneys of the city and at one time was president of the state bar association.

Thus did another self-made man of Corwin make good.

Edwin McGowan.

In a note to the Editor Mr. McGowan adds,—So many years have passed since our school days I have lost track of Frank's life history. I cannot recall the name of the doctor who befriended him. Think it was in Decatur, but it may have been some other town. If you can correct what I have said or add anything to it shall be glad to have you do so.—E. W.

When Mr. Wagner passed away a few years ago the Republican printed a short sketch of his life, and Beea Harris Young, one of his neighbors and helpful friends, furnished an interesting account of his early years in Corwin, but it was a matter of regret at the time that we could not obtain a more complete record of his accomplishments.

We will say with Mr. McGowan that if any reader can add to this short sketch of Frank Wagner we shall be glad to have him do so.—Ed.

Dedicate Seventh Day Adventists' Auditorium

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Sibley Were Present from Decatur and Brought the Republican This Comment on Senator Vandenberg's Address:

Grand Ledge, Mich., Aug. 28.—Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg declared Sunday that any attempt to subject the Supreme Court to political controls would be a potential blow at religious liberty.

The senior Michigan senator's warning was delivered here at the dedication of the new Seventh Day Adventists' auditorium, attended by 8,000 persons. Other speakers included former Gov. Frank D. Fitzgerald, Mayor George W. Davis, of Grand Ledge; Mayor Max W. Templeton, of Lansing, and Elder Carlyle B. Haynes, of Lansing, president of the Michigan Conference of the Seventh Day Advents.

"When the spirit of the Constitution dies religious freedom perishes," Vandenberg asserted. "You have just one warrant for religious freedom—an inviolate constitution and an inviolate Supreme Court to give it voice."

Recalling the hotly disputed Supreme Court reorganization bill of 1937, the senator warned: "Any effort to submit this Court to political control; to make it submissive to the temporary gales of passion which periodically sweep every nation; to rob it of its supreme constitutional jurisdiction; any such effort, no matter how nobly argued, is a potential blow at all liberties, including religious liberty. Any failure of our people to resist all such efforts, no matter how plausibly argued, is freedom's suicide.

"There would be nothing about an American dictatorship which would be any more tolerant and benign than any other tyranny. Indeed, the sinister word 'purge'— in another aspect—already has significantly crept into our own contemporary lexicon."

Vandenberg called for a spiritual revival in the United States, "a revival not only in religion but in all things of the spirit."

"The nation," he said, "needs to renew its understanding that there are things far more important than cash registers, trade balances, cash from Washington and purchased elections.

"It is all very well to slip and slide along toward a collectivist state in which a paternal government promises a new degree of material security in return for a less degree of personal liberty. But those who try to trade liberty for security usually wind up by losing both."

Early Decatur Days Recalled by a Death

Our attention was attracted to an item in the Dowagiac paper last week telling of the death of James D. Collacott which occurred July 5, at the home of his son Hallie on the Indian Lake road. He was 85 years old and was born in Canada. He was a blacksmith in Dowagiac for many years before moving his shop to his son's farm.

James Collacott grew up in Decatur. He had two brothers and one sister, Ned, Pete, and the sister's name is forgotten, but she lived somewhere around Dowagiac.

The old man Collacott had a blacksmith shop and a peg leg. The shop was on the lot next to his home and his home is now the house of Mrs. Minnie Hakes Hodges, just a block south of the Decatur depot.

The old man was the Michigan Central blacksmith at this station for many years. He kept the company's horses shod. Seems queer to think of the railroad keeping horses to help make its business go at this station, but sixty to eighty years ago it kept two of them.

One of the horses was for the tread mill where the horse pumped water for the engines and Tommie Maxham was the man in charge.

The Company had two round houses with water tanks, one for the east bound and one for the west bound trains. There was a windmill that brought the water up when the wind blew, but when there was no wind the engines needed water just the same and a trained horse did the treading. It was great fun to go down to the round house and watch Tommie Maxham make that little horse teeter.

The other horse was a big powerful animal. His job was to take the place of an engine when no engine was in town, to place the cars around on the side tracks. The Company loaded hundreds of cars of wheat at this station every season, and also many carloads of ties and apples.

The brakeman did not handle the switches in those days. When a freight train came steaming in and wanted to take a side track the engineer tooted three short blasts of the whistle and Tommie Maxham, or sometimes his brother, came out and set the switch.

George Roberts helped refresh our memory with this information. He lived across the track where Mattie Chamberlain McOmber now lives, and we lived on the farm a half mile farther on.

The old man Collacott died here and the blacksmith shop went down to decay and entirely disappeared many years ago.

Mrs. Collacott lived on with her son Pete until she died. She was a well educated, good woman. She belonged to the Episcopal church and there were only a few Episcopalians in town, so they met around to the neighbors, and Mrs. Collacott met with them. She had a hard life. She called her son who lived with her 'Georgie,' but everybody else called him Pete. Pete was always a boy, and a wayward boy at that. He brought sorrow and trouble to his mother, but he was always her boy, and she took care of him till she died. Then after a while Pete died, and that was the end of the Collacotts in Decatur.

EARLY SCHOOL DAYS AT CORWIN

Lawrence, Mich.,
January 21, 1938.

Decatur Republican.

Dear Editor,—

I note in your paper of December 30 the writing of Mrs. Marcia Wild giving a sketch of the early history of Corwin. I may be able to add something to this history, though not the earliest history. My sister, Rosetta Brown, oldest child of George and Caroline McGowan, has already given the early history of Corwin.

I am the youngest of George and Caroline's family of eight boys, and am still a kid. Got all my schooling at Corwin except the four months I went to Keeler when Nate Simpson was superintendent there, and two months in the old school house in Paw Paw when Miss Briar was my teacher.

My school days at Corwin were good and not so good. Can still remember and feel the sting of that little water beach switch about my not too well covered back.

We never had more than three different teachers in one term. The boys and girls, raised in the woods, were all swamp angels.

One winter term when I was quite young we had three teachers. The first was a woman who did not stay long. Then a man teacher was hired. In a few weeks the older boys thought it was time for another change and this teacher went so quick he did not stop for hat or gloves.

Billie Wilson and his family lived in a shack a few rods from the present site of the Corwin store. The teacher made a bee line for this shack, bolted through the door and dived under Billie's bed (so the boys said) and they could not get him to come out and resume teaching.

The man teacher is still alive, but he cannot sprint as fast as he did that day he beat the boys to Billie's shack.

We had a vacation then till the school board hired Web. Brodhead of Decatur. Web. had orders to bring the wild animals to time or skin them alive. He brought them to time and everything went along all right the rest of the winter term.

The old school house had a 16 inch board around three sides of the school room with desks made of 2-inch plank. I was subject to sick headaches and when one of those spells came on the teacher would make a bed for me on one of those 16 inch boards. Sometimes the teacher would send me home with my older brother and when I got so sick I could not walk he would carry me the rest of the 1½ miles.

We had one sweet girl teacher who ruled the school by love and moral pursuasion instead of the rod. Her name was Etta Hall, the daughter of a minister from up north. She taught two terms, and when the term was out and she was going home most of the girls would cry, and so would I.

There was a board fence around the school yard, with a six-inch board on top. The kids would run on top of this top board like wild cats.

There was a big walnut tree near the school house in the Frank Harrison woods. The kids would take hold of hands and circle the tree and it took 13 of them to do it. When the tree was cut down it jarred the earth and the school house windows rattled like it was an earthquake.

BIRDS

No. 44—HERMIT THRUSH

By C. C. Evans.

Description: Above olive brown, reddish on the rump. Sides and breast washed with buff. Under parts, white.

Song: In tone like other thrushes, but differently accented—wee-o,wee-o.

You usually find their nests in tall bushes, constructed of moss, twigs and grass.

If we take the quality of melody as a test, the hermit thrush stands at the head of our list of songsters. One may be very familiar with the song of the thrush without ever having identified the bird.

At the first glance the Hermit closely resembles the wood thrush, but a good field glass will enable you to see the color distinction of the back, and also that the Hermit has a more yellowish cast and the breast spots are more acute. But however, there is not a very great difference comparatively.

They are here now and if you would like to hear their wonderful melody go out among the dogwood trees for the Hermit thrush likes to perch among the white blossoms of the dogwood.

I really think when his wonderful melody falls upon your ears gradually in the scale as it progresses, now trilling, now legato, you will say that it is the most perfect, exalted, unrestrained, yet withal, finished bird song that you ever heard.

I have never heard the nightingale, but those who have say that it is the surroundings and its continuous night singing that makes it even the equal of our thrush; for, while the nightingale sings in numbers in the moonlit groves, the Hermit tunes his lute sometimes in inaccessible solitudes, and there is something immaterial and immortal about the song.

Presently you cease altogther to associate it with a bird, and it inspires a kindred feeling in every one who hears it.

It has been given a local name—Swamp Angel.

Next: Flicker (golden-winged woodpecker.

"Sure! They build you a house and you pay so much a month. By the time you are thoroughly dissatisfied with the place, it's yours."

A RELIC OF LAWTON'S BOOM DAYS

The foundation of the stack, slowly crumbling to ruin, is all that remains of the iron furnace which was Lawton's major industry from 1867 to 1875 during which time the town attained a population of two thousand. The site of the furnace adjoins the Michigan Central right of way, in the western part of the village.

GENERAL GRANT WAS A STOCKHOLDER IN LAWTON'S FURNACE IN 1867-75

By DANA P. SMITH

In the late 40's many eastern investors were coming west and investing in Michigan land, which could be had for $1.25 per acre. Among them was Nathan Lawton, who purchased land where the town of Lawton now stands.

About this time the Michigan Central railroad was surveyed through, and as Mr. Lawton's land included the intersection of the railroad with the Prairie Ronde and Paw Paw road, he donated ten acres to the railroad company at this point in consideration of their making it a station on their line.

The railroad was built through to Niles in 1848 and in that same year the company built a passenger and freight depot east of the Prairie Ronde road. The freight house burned down just recently at the age of 89 years.

Some years ago I had the privilege of resurveying this ten-acre tract for the railroad company.

The depot was the nest egg from which the village of Lawton was hatched. During the following 17 years the little settlement grew steadily with the development of the country, except perhaps during the dark days of the Civil war.

The war over, the Lawton brothers, George and Charles, young, active, highly educated and thoroughly capable, began, with the revival of business, to put pep into the business life of the town founded by their father.

Perhaps their greatest project was the building of the charcoal iron furnace which quickly boomed the town to a reported population of 2,000.

Major George Lawton's army acquaintance seems to have been a large factor in the formation of the furnace company. Early in 1867 Major Joseph Walker visited the Lawton brothers and they acquainted him with the large amount of timber in the vicinity and pointed out that it ought to be converted to some useful purpose instead of being burned by the farmers in their land clearing operations. If this timber could be manufactured into something it would be a source of income to all.

No plan was arrived at at this time. Major Walker went to upper Michigan where he met Gen. Gilmore and talked over the Lawton project with him and finally left it for future consideration.

Major Walker later met Major Brooks, who was engaged in iron mining about Lake Superior and he discussed the Lawton project with him. Major Brooks was interested and he in turn discussed it with many others.

In the same year that the negotiations started, the Michigan Central Iron Company was organized with a capital stock of $150,000 of which General Grant held $5,000. General Gilmore was president, and Samuel Cantrell, treasurer.

This same year, also saw the completion of the furnace, which went into blast December 24, 1867. It was a great day in Lawton and inaugurated such boom days as have never been seen before or since.

The furnace was in direct charge of Henry Ford, a practical iron manufacturer, and employed in various capacities, about 150 men.

To supply the furnace with fuel required a large amount of charcoal and the furnace company purchased over 1500 acres of land, the timber on which went to the making of charcoal. On the furnace site was a large battery of kilns where the burning of wood in-

Maple Syrup--The Most Delicious of All Sweets

WM. R. GREENMAN, having been a sugar maker in his native state of New York, settled on the land of which the present Sugar Bush is a part, about 1845. He chose this particular tract in the then wilderness for the reason that it was heavily wooded with dense thickets of the largest hard wood maple trees growing in the richest of soils, and for the additional reason that this beautiful forest was located on the banks of lovely Christie lake.

While this sugar bush is not so extensive as it was in pioneer days when thousands of trees were tapped each spring, 70 acres of the original woods are still standing.

These old veterans of the days when Indians roamed the woods, show the battle marks, not of Indians but of the tapping chisel and of the modern tapping bit. All about are the younger maples seeming to be on guard over these old time maple forefathers.

Every year since the Sugar Bush was founded, maple syrup and maple sugar have been made here and always with the thought of a high quality product in mind.

It was learned very early that maple syrup has several delicious and delicate flavors which are volatile and easily lost in the process of manufacture if the most exacting care is not taken. Scrupulous cleanliness in the care of the sap buckets, evaporator and other utensils is imperative.

The sap must be gathered at once after flowing from the trees lest some of its finer qualities are lost. This measure, together with the rapid and very shallow boiling in the evaporator pans, are some of the main factors in the sugar-maker's art.

to charcoal was actively carried on. Even as far off as Waverly township, seven miles northwest of Paw Paw, were a number of coal kilns whose product was hauled by teams to Lawton for the furnace.

Charcoal is comparatively light in weight so the wagon racks were made large with sides sloping outward and about four or five feet high. The sides were made of light poles set in holes bored in the sills and top rail about four inches apart. This gave ventilation, for it was a common thing for a driver to find that his load contained smouldering fire which would break out on the road. As a boy, I have often seen these coal wagons stop at my father's and other places and the drivers carry water from the well to fight fires. The open rack helped to get water where it was needed.

Coal racks were then as familiar a sight on the streets of Lawton as are grape racks today.

The farmers used to make charcoal by piling wood up, usually in a round pile shaped like a hay stack, and cover it with dirt, leaving a vent hole at the top and air holes near the bottom. This was fired and allowed to burn until all moisture was driven off and the whole thing thoroughly hot; then the air holes were plugged and the fire smothered. When cool enough to safely open, the dirt was shoveled off and the charcoal gathered up. This method was known as coal pits while the brick ovens are called coal kilns.

The charcoal provided for, two other items were necessary—iron ore and limestone. The ore would have to come from the Lake Superior country, while the lime stone could be had by call[illegible] part of the furnace. On the foundation rested the big cast iron hearth with its water jacket to keep it from being melted by the intense heat of the molten iron. Above this towered the brick stack to a height of perhaps 40 to [illegible] larger at the bottom and tapering toward the top. The top was capped by a heavy hopper-shaped casting with a good sized round opening in the middle. This opening was closed by a bell-shaped casting opening inward and operated by a long lever.

About the top of the stack was the charging platform. To the north was the receiving and storage shed with suitable tracks from the railroad. From the storage shed to the charging platform was an inclined track up which two small cars were hauled by chains operated by power from the engine.

These cars would haul up a charge of charcoal, limestone and ore and dump it into the hopper, the bell would be tripped and the charge would slide into the furnace. When this bell was tripped at night the flaming gas would shoot high, lighting up the town and countryside, and the reflection on the clouds would be seen for miles. These waste gases were sent through what were called "stoves" thus preheating the furnace.

The engine and boiler room were to the southeast of the stack, containing the necessary boilers and the big blowing engine. This was a vertical machine with the steam cylinder at the top and the blowing cylinder under it. The crank shaft and two big balance wheels were at the bottom.

At the south and a little west was the casting shed with the floor covered with moulding sand in which the molten iron was formed into what they called "pigs"—thus "pig iron."

The furnace office stood at the end of Union street on the south side.

The furnace was a thriving industry for eight years, until April, 1875, when it shut down, it was supposed, temporarily; but it never resumed operation.

The increasing use of coke for blast furnace fuel and the establishment of blast furnaces with steel mills put the charcoal furnace out of business.

These were the days [illegible] furnace money put pep and snap into the business life of the village and much of its present business, [illegible] had its foundation in those early days.

[illegible] DISTRICT OF LAWRENCE TOWNSHIP

Where for Eighty Years the School Bell Called the Children To Work and Play and the Three R's Were Taught in a Masterly Way.

NOW THE BELL IS SILENT AND THE SCHOOL HOUSE CLOSED

Written for the Republican by Edward Plopper.

As I have read a great many interesting items in the Republican about the early days I thought I might write something that would be of interest to the readers.

In 1850 Avery Mullinex, Nathan Benedict and my father, Stephen Plopper moved into this country. It was then a forest and they settled here because they found so much white oak timber.

They built a cooper shop and made barrels together for a good many years. They hired the barrels taken to Paw Paw by oxen and floated down the Paw Paw river to St. Joe and sold there for pork and flour barrels.

These men, having families, knew there would have to be a school so they built a log school house across the road where I now live. Some of the teachers who taught there as I remember my father tell about them were Ella Dodge, Eliza Carris, Libbie Worden, Cora Jones, Jane Ellet. Jane was Bertha Chase's mother. Hattie Sanborn, Amos Benedict's mother, was the last one to teach in the old log school house.

The present school house was built by Joe Sanders, Harry Lurkins' grandfather, in 1866. The first teacher in the new school house was Emma Rice.

Sumner J. Sherrod, for many years a well known citizen of Decatur, was my first teacher in 1875. Dr. N. H. Greenman, well known to me as 'Newty,' started to school there in 1878 and we both attended for many years.

I well remember when Ida Lurkins taught there in the fall of 1879 when she came to school one Monday morning and told us about the terrible Morris murder.

Harry Chase was my last teacher in 1885. At that time we had a school bell the size of a teacup. The bell we now have was bought in 1911.

At present our school is closed and the children are taken to Paw Paw to school by bus. This is the third winter it has been closed. The attendance got down to five or six and the taxpayers thought it wasn't worth while to keep it up. I was on the school board 30 years and my father before me was on the board nearly 40 years.

Some of the teachers of the district taught 3 years and others not more than 3 months.

I have lived where I could see the children play and hear the bell ring for 60 years and hope I may live to see them play and hear the bell ring again.

I will give here the teachers who have taught in this district as I remember them, and if any are left out please forgive me for it will be a mistake. You might notify the editor and he will make the correction. They are:

WHERE FURS ONCE BROUGHT GOLD

By D. C. LAMOREAUX
Free Lance Conservation Officer,
Paw Paw

IN YOUR IMAGINATION, as you look into the mist rising from the river over these stones, it is not difficult to turn back into the past and visualize the colorful existence of this trading post's inhabitants—to live with them through the dark, stormy and snowbound winter; the awakening of spring in the forests; the quiet, warm summer days by the river; and the autumn with the woods ablaze with color through the soft Indian summer.

Long dead are the men, white and Indian, who drew their canoes up to this river landing and unloaded their winter's catch of fur—traded them for supplies and gold, then turned their faces back into the wilderness. For over three quarters of a century all trace of the log structures of the post has been lost. Even the clearing has been rehabilitated by nature with a heavy growth of vines and trees. These stones, which were used as a base of the river landing, are all that remain of a once thriving trading post—all that remains to the memory of a group of men who lived hard, worked hard and sometimes died alone in the wilderness.

In 1827, John Agard, a French trader, left the eastern seaboard, turned his face toward the wilderness of the midwest and four years later arrived in Detroit. Ten months later, after traveling over the old Detroit-Chicago Trail and wilderness roads, he began clearing a site for a trading post in the then entirely wild and unsettled township now known as Paw Paw, Van Buren county, Michigan. There on the banks of a river (now called the Paw Paw), at the head of navigation, he began trading supplies and gold for fur. He constructed a post of eight or ten log cabins and a river landing of stone and split logs.

The post became popular with the Indians and a thriving fur trade was carried on. It is assumed that Agard kept a quantity of gold hidden in the vicinity of the post, for it was noticed that he used gold quite freely in his transactions and there were no banks within a great many miles. Agard died without revealing the cache of the gold. Shortly after the trading post was established a half-breed Frenchman named Shawanecse set up his tepee near the clearing; and it is said that many a landlooker and trapper sought the favor of his daughter whose dark beauty was famed throughout the reaches of the post.

At the height of his prosperity, in October, 1835, Agard died suddenly and was buried at the trading post which was soon after abandoned.

SURVEYOR'S NOTES GIVE CLUE TO SITE

"Some two years ago, while employed as engineer on a hydro project on the Paw Paw river, just below the power dam at Paw Paw, I had occasion to use the Government survey notes made of this Section in the years 1827 and 1833. I noticed under the surveyor's 'remarks' the location of a trading post at the head of navigation on the (Paw Paw) river. Out of curiosity I relocated the site of the post, and by proning under water in the sand and muck I located the stone base of the river landing. The trading post was established in 1833 and abandoned two years later after the sudden death of the trader, one John Agard.

"During the night of December 6, 1937, after a heavy rain and snowfall, the Maple Lake dam broke, pouring a torrent of water down the river. Shortly thereafter, while patrolling the Paw Paw river, I revisited the old trading post site and found the stones partially out of water with a faint mist rising over them."

GOOD TIME CHARLIE

When Charlie McCarthy takes the air on Sunday nights, speaking the slick impertinences of Ventriloquist Edgar Bergen, the Chase and Sanborn hour traditionally has the ear of perhaps a third of the nation, largest radio audience in the U. S. But Charlie appears only twice (a total of about 15 minutes) during the hour; the rest is usually orchestra music, songs by Contralto Dorothy Lamour and Baritone Donald Dickson, effervescences by guest stars and a master of ceremonies. Between Charlie's turns at the Mike, the interest of his vast audience wavers. Many tune in on other programs, office mix drinks, woo father, miss commercials until Charlie returns.

Last week Standard Brands ordered its valued Chase and Sanborn show tailored more accurately to Charlie's measure. Beginning Jan. 7, after the contracts of Songstress Lamour and Gladhander Don Ameche expire, the Chase and Sanborn program will be cut to a half hour, mainly Charlie and guest star stooges, leaving little or no opportunity for singer, orchestra to check out for a drink between drives. OLD FRIENDSHIPS RENEWED THROUGH EDDIE AND CHARLIE

(If this Eddie Bergen inspiration does not do anything else it is renewing friendships which have remained dormant for many years. Don't know that we have seen Charlie Secord since those school days to which he alludes, but he is a boyhood friend we never have forgotten. He used to clerk in the grocery store of L. G. Stewart and drive the delivery wagon when we were a clerk in Browning's drug store next door but one. So we were neighbors as well as friends, and doubtless he can recall more than one good time we have had together.

Certainly glad to hear from you Charlie, and to get you in touch with the old home town again. Will send Mr. Hoffman a marked copy of the paragraph of your letter about the Townsend Plan, and know he will be interested in it.

Hope you will write again.)

ARBA IS CURIOUS.
SO LET'S TELL HIM

Chicago, Oct. 11, 1938.
EPISODE 19

My dear Arba:

Just a few weeks before going to Melrose I was a student at the beck and call of the operator and there I found conditions just reversed—I was the operator with a student at my beck and call, responsible for his advancement and training; possibly an Edison in the making. A student is taught the station call as quickly as possible so he may listen for the call at times when the operator is out looking after express, freight or other duties, or when the night operator has not had sufficient sleep during the day and wishes to take a little nap while on duty without getting into trouble.

I pretended I was asleep a number of times to make sure I could trust my student to remain awake and listen for the call but he always went to sleep. His mother was a poor widow and was badly in need of his assistance, so I was anxious that he should continue as my student, but I could not keep him if he could not be trusted to keep his promises better than he had thus far done. I finally told him that the next time he failed me I'd give him something he'd remember.

It was then midwinter and one night he again went to sleep after promising to remain awake and listen for the call while I took a nap. I tiptoed out of the office and returned with a bucket of ice water, all of which I doused on him from head to feet, which gave him the surprise of his young life. He was forced to stand near the hot fire the remainder of the night drying his clothes. Never again did he go to sleep after promising to listen for the call and he soon became a first class operator and of much needed aid to his widowed mother.

After working in Melrose for a few months I received a telegram to go to Lucas and work nights. Lucas was a more important station with considerable more work for the night operator but not enough to prevent me from getting very sleepy at times during the long hours before daybreak and there I did not have a student to listen for the call should I fall asleep.

Late one night I dropped asleep in my chair and was awakened by my station call, which I had finally succeeded in training myself to heed, just as one heeds the call of one's name when deeply absorbed, and when I answered the call the train dispatcher asked if No. 16 had passed and without realizing I had been asleep and the train might have gone by without awakening me, I told him it had not. A few minutes later he asked the same question and when I again said it had not yet arrived he gave me an order to hold No. 16 for Stutia extra.

When the operator at Whitebreast reported the extra as having departed, the dispatcher again called me and inquired about No. 16, thus showing his anxiety. 'Twas then the horrible possibility that No. 16 had gone by without awakening me and a head-end collision was imminent, which fear was augmented by the fact that I could hear an engine doing some switching at the coal storage tracks about two miles east of the station. I paced up and down the platform for what seemed an age before I heard the whistle of No. 16 coming from the west, the train having been delayed between stations due to the breaking of a draw bar or coupling between cars. What a welcome sound that whistle was and what a lesson that scare of all my scares taught me—never to say a train had not gone by had I been asleep only for a moment.

After that experience whenever I felt I might fall asleep, I would place a long wedge, which could easily be seen from the office window, between the ends of two rails on the main track, and as long as the wedge was still there I could take an oath that no train had passed the station.

I have been badly frightened at other times but never so skeered as I was that night at Lucas while visioning a head-on collision between two trains due to my having told the dispatcher that No. 16 had not gone by. I was too old to take part in the World War, but I can't imagine how any soldier could possibly have been more

SKEERED

At dead of night as you tramped your beat,
Clad in khaki from head to feet;
With trusty gun and bayonet keen
And helmet, gas mask and canteen;
There came a stutter in your stride—
You dared not run, you could not hide;
And then a creepiness so weird—
Of course, my boy, you were not skeered?

That listning post was a lonesome spot;
Far out midst shrieking shell and shot,
Or else the silence was most profound
As on the night you heard a sound.
And as you peered through mist and fog
A form appeared—an old stray dog
And not the foe you long had feared—
Weren't you, my boy, a little skeered?

While in the pill-box waiting attack,
Chills creeping up and down your back,
In the cold dawn of morning's dim light,
Where death had stalked night after night;
You thought you saw an enemy tank
And clutching your machine gun's crank,
Through a porthole you tearily peered—
Weren't you, my boy, a little skeered?

'Twas over the top you crept that night
And wormed your way far out of sight;
On through the shell crater's bloody mire
Until you reached the foe's barbed wire;
And as you deftly cut a strand
A voice hailed across No Man's Land;
"Turn right, face your body scared!"
"Twas then, my boy, that you were skeered!

ARBA IS CURIOUS, SO
LET'S TELL HIM

Chicago, August 9, 1938.
EPISODE 10

My dear Arba:

Impersonal and far-off incidents, though of great general importance, seldom make lasting impressions on the youth of the land, and I might well include most of the grownups, but some of the things we actually see and hear, though of slight personal importance, are truly unforgettable.

While I have the haziest recollection of the great Chicago fire of my boyhood days, a happening at about that same period is still vividly fresh in memory—in fact unerasable. My brother and I had been sent to the small general store shortly after dark to make a purchase of some minor article for mother, and while we were still there a stranger entered and asked to be shown the best revolver in the store, which was handed him. He inquired if it was always sure-fire, etc. He then asked permission to step out through the back door to try it. Boy-like we followed him out, to our great horror. He first aimed the revolver high in the air, and without saying a word, quickly lowered the muzzle to his right temple and fired, soon filling an unknown's grave.

Another unforgetable boyhood incident occurred about four o'clock one Sunday afternoon, when suddenly the sky darkened, and father and mother barely had time to close the doors and windows and rush three crying children down into the cellar, before the cyclone demolished the Catholic church nearby, carried away part of our barn and did much damage generally. If you survive one cyclone you'll always hope to escape another.

While sitting beneath the shade of the cherry trees in our front yard, I heard a locomotive on an east bound train, which was fast approaching town on the steep down-grade, whistle repeatedly for "brakes," which was before the air-brake had been discovered and trains were not easily or quickly stopped when going at high speed, and shortly I saw the locomotive crash into the caboose of another train and hurl it down a steep embankment a short distance east of the station. 'Twas sort of a pioneer movie thriller.

A quite unusual incident occurred to me while coasting down a very steep hill, when a cow darted out of an alley in front of me and I belly-buster shot between her legs without sustaining a scratch.

These and many other incidents occurred while still awaiting the day when I should say good-bye forever to those happy days of youth.

Of course I did not escape being sent out with a handful of salt to sprinkle on the tails of the snowbirds so I could easily catch them, nor did I learn about Santa Claus and the stork until long after I should have known better. It would seem that the young of today are much "wiser" about certain things than were the boys and girls of my day, but I often wonder if they are any better off due thereto.

However, "The March of Time" gradually added to my youthful knowledge and then came

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

AN ECHO OF THE DAYS OF SMART TOP BUGGIES AND FINE ROADSTERS

Editor Arthur E. Town in Otsego Union.

In a recent issue of the Decatur Republic, editor Arba N. Moulton mentions Mr. Rasmussen, a former dealer in smart top buggies, phaetons and so on who is retiring after having been in business in Decatur since 1876.

The name "Rasmussen," awoke recollections of my boyhood. We located in a lonely prairie country in Dakota territory. A dim trail made by the wheel marks of my father's farm wagon led to Crandon, a tiny railway hamlet.

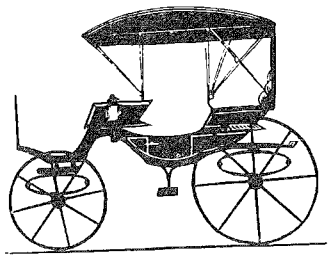
Settlers flocked in and the dim trail became "Michigan Avenue," because of several families from Michigan locating there. It was not citified at all as there were less than a dozen families in its ten mile length from Crandon to the James River. But the farm houses were rather sumptuous looking and the barns and granaries were well built and roomy. Perhaps this was the reason that "Hi" Woodnorth, editor of the short-lived Crandon Tribune gave this road its citified name. Crandon had grown to quite a town with the inrush of settlers.

We had several years of good crops and "Michigan Avenue" began to put on airs. There was much rivalry among the residents in the matter of fast stepping roadsters and fine top buggies. My father had a George W. Cribb Co. buggy made in Milwaukee, one of our neighbors had one made in Kalamazoo, another one had a "Brewster" built somewhere in the east. There were others whose make I do not remember.

Finally following a big crop one of the Michigan families made a visit "back home" as they called it. When they returned to their farm they brought a new top buggy. It was a beauty. I well recall the first time Mr. and Mrs. Sel Richards, its owners, drove into our dooryard behind their spirited roadsters and sitting up proudly in their shiny new buggy.

He told us it was a "Rasmussen." I do not recall whether the name plate showed the name "Rasmussen" as maker or sales agent and I do not know whether that buggy came from Decatur or not but as you will see this is some circumstantial evidence in that direction. For some time that buggy was at once the envy of our neighborhood.

Times changed. Drouth blasted our crops year after year. One after another, our neighbors, discouraged and more or less impoverished, gathered up what they could of their belongings and moved away. One of the last to go was Sel. Richards and his family. Leading the way in his "Rasmussen," its lustre gone and his once spirited steppers now older and slowed down and followed by a little string of wagons also loaded with the family effects and trailing a little bunch of extra horses and a small herd of cattle they headed out over the horizon towards the sunset. "Going way west to make another start," Richards told us. We never heard of them again.



THE OLD RED SCHOOL HOUSE

By Herrick L. Sutton.

My parents came from New York state to Michigan in 1856 when I was 2 years old. The following spring they settled on a farm ¼ mile south of the Michigan Central railroad and about half way between Lawton and Mattawan.

It was 1½ miles from the farm to the school house at Antwerp center, known as the Harwick school from the name of people living near there. It was also spoken of as the Red school house. Originally it had been painted red.

I was not a very husky kid. I put in a good part of my time summers shivering with ague and had a red flannel cloth tied around my neck in the winter time.

It was a long walk to the school house and a third of the way was through the forest, so I did not start until I was seven years old.

Then I took my dinner pail and primmer and started for the Red school house which I reached in time to go in when the teacher rang the bell. I was allowed to sit with the only boy in the school that I knew.

The teacher called us to order, read a few verses of Scripture, led us in singing, looked over our books, laid out the lesson, told us the rules, and that took up the time till the boys' recess.

The School House

Now I will try to give you a description of the school house. It was a plain frame building, I should guess about 32 feet north and south by 24 feet east and west. It was on the north side of the road 10 or 12 rods east of a four corners and facing south, the door being in the south end.

Six feet of the south end was partitioned off for an entry hall and there were two closets for the dinner pails and wraps.

The teacher's desk was in the north end of the room, facing south. There was a row of desks and seats on either side for the scholars. The seats were wide enough for two and were made of the nicest pine to carve I ever saw, and many a jack knife had been tested on them.

The walls were ceiled, the ceiling being the natural color of the lumber, but time and smoke had changed it to what I would call a faded black.

The heating system was a large box stove placed in the center of the room. On the ceiling above the stove were figures that resembled maps but really were stains. The kids had set bottles of frozen ink on the stove with corks firmly set in the bottles. When the ink thawed out and the steam pressure got high enough the corks went out with a bang and instantly there was a map on the wall. I think probably this is where the idea of spraying paint originated.

The ceiling was further decorated in spots, where some enterprising youngsters during a slack time had chewed paper wads to pulp and tossed them up to the ceiling.

There was a recitation seat across the room facing the teacher's desk. The step at the entrance was a square stick of timber about 12 inches long. There were two wood black boards on the wall.

The School Bully

The country was new, and, as the saying goes, "Pretty wild and wooly." Every village had its bad man and boasted that he could whip all comers. The school also had one boy who could thrash most or all of the others and whose authority was generally recognized.

In our family I was the only boy. I had two sisters and one girl cousin who lived with us part of the time. They were all older than I.

I had been humored and made much of, and when I came to my first recess was pretty soft. I did not feel very much sure of myself or very happy for that matter.

I sat down on the end of the timber that formed the front step and a bunch of boys formed a half circle around me to look the new scholar over and decide where I belonged.

Presently a kid about my size stepped out of the circle, came in front of me and stood there a few seconds with his feet spread far apart. Then he shut up one of his hard little fists and struck me under the eye.

I had not spoken a word to him or he to me. I got up and went into the school house. The teacher looked up as I came in and said, "What is the matter with your eye?" I told her one of the boys hit it.

She called the boys all in and asked me which one it was. I told her, but the kid that hit me (will call him Tom) said no, he did not hit the new scholar, that it was George. He referred the matter to some of the other boys and they confirmed his report.

He said the new boy did not know the other boys very well and had got them mixed.

So the teacher took poor George out on the floor and switched him. A serious miscarriage in the administration of justice, you say. Yes, I'm afraid it goes that way often in life.

At noon we had one hour intermission in which to eat our lunch and play. We were called to order again at 1 o'clock, had a 15 minutes recess at 2:30 and at 4 were dismissed for the day.

As soon as Tom saw that I was not going to try to take his kingdom away from him he became friendly and the next morning I was ready and anxious to go to school. I felt that I was a lot older and knew a lot more than I did the day before.

The Old Swimming Hole

A half mile south of the Red school house was a creek, one of the upper branches of the Paw Paw river, and at a bend in the creek was the old swimming hole. Just a little way up stream from the swimming hole were several large springs, making the water clear and cold.

The kids would stay in swimming till their teeth chattered and their lips became as purple as the iris blooming on the banks of the creek, but the run to the school house would warm us up.

East of the school house a half mile or so was 80 acres that had been abandoned by the early settlers and left to go wild again. Grubs had grown up on most of it, but the clear spots had come up to wild strawberries, and in the season of their ripening frequently the teacher and children would all go up there and feast on the berries. Sometimes we took walks in the nearby woods.

The Teachers

Our teachers were usually young ladies from 18 to 25 years old. They did not need any special training to secure a certificate to teach. They were paid only $2.50 per week and board around the district.

Each teacher set up her own rules and was expected to enforce them. Most teachers prohibited whispering. It worked much like liquor prohibition. If the violators became a nuisance the punishment had to be applied or discipline went to the dogs.

Punishment was all the way from whipping to standing on the floor or staying in at recess.

I liked my teacher and would have gotten along all right, but I could not learn to spell. The teachers worked long and faithfully to cure me of the trouble. They stood me on the floor, kept me after school, and I shed briny tears, all to no avail.

The Memory Remains

However, I regard my time spent at the Red school house as well invested, for there I formed my friendships that lasted for life and the memory of which are a joy to my old age.

The old Red school house crumbled into dust many long years ago, and the spot that once resounded with shouts and laughter of a group of many care free children is now silent.

Many of those who attended school my first day have passed over the Great Divide to the life beyond. Only a few are left. Less than a year ago there were four. So far as I know Dan Van Antwerp and his sister, Mrs. Idale Van Antwerp Marshall of Porter, and Mrs. Ella Hopkins Kingsley of Ann Arbor, and myself are the sole survivors.

The old district has been reorganized with other districts to form the consolidated schools of Mattawan, and so far as I can learn no one now in the old district bears a name that was common there when I first knew the school.

HAPPY DAYS IN THE GEORGE McGOWAN BRICK YARD IN CORWIN

Lawrence, Mich., May 9, 1938.
Decatur Republican,
Dear Editor,—

It is harder to explain the brick making business on paper than it would be to explain the different operations if the person were on the ground to see.

I am sure it would be interesting to most persons to see how it was done from the time the raw clay was taken from the ground till the cherry red brick were in piles ready to go into the building of a beautiful home or store building.

To begin with we at the Corwin farm were blessed with good brick clay. But when that clay was plowed in the spring for crops it got more cursings than blessings from us boys. It would plow up clay lumps as big as a 14-quart pail or a wash tub.

After a few days drying the fields would be dragged 4 or 5 times, then the lumps would be ready for the maul. We made the mauls from knots of trees cut round or square, an auger hole bored through and a handle wedged in.

If we kept those mauls going up and down in perpetual motion and did not stop often to play we could break up an acre of lumps a day.

We did not have the modern disc harrow, clod crusher and cultipacker then. These modern machines going once over the ground would do more to break up the lumps and fit the ground than 40 draggings with our home made butterfly drag.

Now Back to the Brick Yard

We used the same yard for all of the 10 or 12 years we made brick. It was a lot of work to make and keep up a good yard. It had to be a level, smooth and hard as a floor.

We also used the same clay bank near the yard and it made hundreds of thousands of brick. We did not go down more than 4 or 5 feet. Deeper than that would take us into too many lime stones which break the brick or cause it to chip when burnt.

The clay was plowed and scraped into pits about 14 feet square, made with inch boards for sides and bottom. We had two of these pits about 40 feet apart.

The pits are filled with clay and covered with water and left to soak half a day or over night. It took barrels and barrels of water to soak up each pit of clay, and this water had to be pumped by hand with an old fashioned wooden pump. We had to do a lot of pump priming, the same as Uncle Sam does today.

The first pump we had was made from a tamarack tree by the Alerington Pump Company of Keeler. These pumps, though painted, sooon checked and cracked from the hot sun.

Our brick yard was about 40 rods from our log cabin house. Sometimes the old pump would start a sudden leak from a check and there would be more water running down the pump than into the trough that watered the pit of clay. So it was up to one of the boys to tear off his shirt tail to get rags for calking.

Our brick machine was drawn from one pit to the other on a little track by a horse.

A set of brick molds was six. When not burning brick the molds had to be sanded each time after using so the soft brick would not stick.

We had a neighbor we called Uncle Charlie Shear or Dad Shear. Every season he would have about 50 turkeys running all over the neighborhood. Sometimes when we were gone to dinner that flock of turkeys would walk across the soft brick leaving deep tracks in them. Uncle Charlie told the neighbors those McGowan boys had killed a thousand turkeys for him. If he had left off the ciphers he would have been nearer the truth.

Father had to hire but little help in making the brick. There were 8 boys in the family and with father as overseer we got along nicely. It took some hash to feed us all, as working in the mud was good for the appetite.

Mother would cook apple dumplings in a wash boiler to have enough for us. And our meals were not complete without a big pan of johny cake with maple molasses and butter.

Father would often dress a fat sheep, and sometimes a little fat pig about 2 months old. They would roast it whole and in 3 days that little pig would all be gone but the squeeler.

One season we put 200,000 brick in one kiln. But it was too many, the heat did not go to the outside or top and too many soft brick were left. One-half that number made a better sized kiln.

The kiln must be burned a week, day and night. We worked 3 shifts, 2 men to a shift, about the fifth day or night it is a sight to look through the arch of the kiln, all the brick white hot and melting down. At this stage the boys used to put a board up at one end of the arch and shoot through the other end with a rifle. Usually the bullet would melt before it had traveled the 30 or 40 feet.

By the fifth and sixth days the blaze would be coming out of the top of the kiln. The arches of the kiln were a fine place to roast corn and bake potatoes, covered with ashes and hot coals, and the top of the kiln was fine to roast or cook chicken. Take the insides out, smear the feathers with mortar, place it on top of the kiln. When nicely done remove the feathers and clay at one operation, and you have the whitest, sweetest, juiciest chicken meat you ever tasted.

In the early days most all wells were dry and curbed with plank. After a few years the curbing rotted away and the well would cave in or the water not be fit to use. Father got to making circular well brick and thousands were used to wall up the open wells.

The last set of brick molds used on the old brick yard was made by Mike Carpp, father of George Carpp, They were made of cherry lumber and were a perfect set in every detail. The writer has one that is about 60 years old, a prized keepsake.

I will now give some of the houses and buildings made from George McGowan's brick:

The Will Harris house, now owned by Fred Harris; the Frank Tuttle house, now owned by Edwin Klett; house on the old Alex. Stockwell farm now owned by Chicago parties; house on the Lafayette Meachum farm now owned by heirs of the late Clem Manley; the Ellis Conklin home in Lawrence, and the store built by Ham Marshall, now known as the DeHaven store.

MRS. JENNIE WEDDEL, NURSE OF SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

Former Decatur Lady

Mustered into Richard Westnedge Camp, USWV, at Kalamazoo.

(The following story concerns a native of Decatur township who grew up on the farm in East Decatur, attended the Decatur High school and remained a resident of this community until going out to make her own way in the world.

Jennie Weddel was a daughter of the late John and Katherine McWilliams Graham. Her brothers and sisters are Elmer Graham, Mrs. Lizzie Maguire and Mrs. Charlotte Deuel of Decatur, and Marshall Graham of Kalamazoo.

Mr. and Mrs. Weddel moved from Decatur to Kalamazoo seven years ago and this story is taken from the Kalamazoo Gazette.)

One of the very few women in Michigan eligible to membership in the United Spanish War Veterans, resides in Kalamazoo.

She is Mrs. Jennie M. Weddel, wife of Walter Weddel, 1310 Blakeslee street, and she was mustered into Westnedge Camp, USWV, as a full-fledged Spanish-American war veteran, at the last meeting of the camp.

Mrs. Weddel, now in her 69th year, was a nurse during the Spanish-American war.

Native of Decatur, Mich.

Born in Decatur, Mich., Jan. 30, 1869, Mrs. Weddel received her training at General hospital, Milwaukee. She worked as a private nurse for several years, and then moved to Clarinda, Ia., to become supervisor of the women's ward of the Iowa State hospital. At that time there were about 2,500 inmates in the hospital, and Mrs. Weddel had fully intended to make the nursing of the mentally ill her life's work.

Then, in 1898, came the startling news of the sinking of the Battleship Maine. Indignation was aroused in Mrs. Weddel, and she, instantly changed her professional plans. From her home in Clarinda, she penned a letter to President William McKinley, volunteering her services with the American forces.

Three days later she received a reply from the president's secretary, informing her that her letter had been forwarded to the surgeon-general's department, and thanking her for volunteering.

Mustered Into Service

A few days later she received a letter from the surgeon-general's headquarters, ordering her to report for duty at Camp McPherson, Ga. Leaving her home and professional duties at Clarinda, she travelled to Camp McPherson, and there was mustered into the United States forces as a war nurse. At that time, James Warrick, Kalamazoo, a member of Richard Westnedge camp, was a patient at the Camp McPherson hospital.

She served at Camp McPherson as a registered nurse until Aug. 20, 1898, when a call came for 20 volunteers to go to Camp Cuba Libre at Jacksonville, Fla. She was one of 13 nurses to respond to the call for volunteers. Camp Cuba Libre was situated on an old race track about seven miles from Jacksonville, and small tents were used mostly for wards. The only means of transportation to and from the camp was by mule team over rough roads.

Wed to Man She Loved

Over 200 wounded and typhoid victims were hospitalized in this camp, with virtually no supplies available. Her hours of duty consisted of one whole week at a time, with only one other nurse to relieve her. While in this camp, she was credited with saving the life of a soldier (this soldier chanced to be the sweetheart of the relief nurse) whom she found suffering from ptomaine poisoning. Through her quick action and professional knowledge, she nursed the soldier back to health. Later, the relief nurse and the soldier were married.

On Nov. 1, 1898, she was ordered transferred to Cuba, but at that time became stricken with a light attack of typhus fever and was transferred to Camp Shipp, Anderson, Ala. After three weeks in the hospital, she was granted a 20-day furlough and returned to her home in Clarinda, Ia. She was mustered out of service and honorably discharged Dec. 19, 1898.

Father Civil War Veteran

During the Spanish-American war Mrs. Weddel served as war nurse in Georgia on the same spot where her father, John Graham, of the 19th Michigan Volunteers, engaged in a battle during the Civil war. Her father marched with General Sherman's forces through Georgia to the sea. At the battle of Peach Creek, her father was the ninth color bearer to carry the flag and plant it on enemy ground.

DECATUR CELERY, YESTERDAY AND TODAY

1—Setting celery by machine. 2—Setting celery by hand. 3—Hoeing and cultivating celery by hand. 4—Field of celery ready for harvest. 5—Harvesting celery.

Decatur's celery industry dates back to the glacial period when the ice sheet scooped out the basin which became the big swamp and deposited the hills and rich lands to the south. To the north it left an island of sand which eventually became the site of the village. To the early business men of Decatur the big swamp was a problem. It shut off all trade from the the south, and before roads could be built the Dowagiac river had to be straightened and deepened.

When the surplus water had drained off and the edges of the swamp began to dry out it was found that this land was very productive and would grow all vegetables better than the uplands.

William North, a carpenter, grew a few stalks of celery on the edge of the swamp 51 years ago. The next spring Peter Christensen obtained enough plants in Kalamazoo to plant a few short rows on the L. T. Rawson farm located on what is now the Old Swamp road. Two years later, when more of the land had been drained, Henry Houseman Sr., and Neal King came here from Kalamazoo and grew the first commercial quantity of celery.

The swamp land was covered with a heavy growth of timber for which there was little sale, and it was burned where it fell. Then came the hard work of pulling and burning the stumps. Land used for growing celery must be free from roots, and as a tree has as much wood below the ground as above it was no easy task to prepare the land for a crop.

At first most of the celery grown was the green type because of its better keeping qualities. About the middle of April the seed was soaked over night in warm water, then mixed with muck and let stand to sprout, being stirred several times a day. When the seed sprouted till the muck seemed to have white mould all through it, the same amount of dry seed was mixed in. This was done to insure a succession of plants and to guard against loss of plants by frost. The sprouted seed would come up a few days after being planted in the beds while the dry seed would not come up for ten days or two weeks. The seed was sown in the beds about the 20th of April.

The plants were transplanted in the field the latter part of June and early July. A carload of barnyard manure was used to about 1½ acres of celery. Hundreds of carloads were shipped here from the Chicago stock yards every year. This in time became so expensive that commercial fertilizer was substituted.

A small rope was stretched taut across the field and on this line the plants were set. No one knows how long a 40 rod row is until he has crawled it on his hands and knees with the hot sun beating down on his back and neck, and set a celery plant every 4 inches of the way. Setting 5,000 plants was considered a good day's work.

When the plants had taken root and straightened up the loose dirt was pulled away with a hoe and cultivation started. This was kept up until the last of September when the rows were split with a wing shovel and dirt pulled up to the plants until only a few inches showed.

Trenching began about the middle of October. Usually six rows were put in a trench. Two wide 14-foot boards with long sharpened stakes fastened to them were set 10 to 12 inches apart. The plants were dug out with spading forks and piled close to the boards.

The trencher would stand between the boards and receive the celery from both sides, placing it first on one side and then on the other of the trench. Care must be taken to have the celery stand straight in the trench or it would come out crooked and worthless.

When the boards were full the muck was shoveled up, the boards removed and another trench started. After a day's trenching the trencher did not look at the supper table to see what was on the table but how much. In a few days the celery began to grow and bleach. When ready for market the trench was opened and if the weather permitted the trimming was done in the field, if not it was trimmed and washed at the wash house and tied into bunches of 12 stalks and six bunches were placed in a box for shipment.

A third to a half of the celery would be lost in the trenches through freezing or rot, and the season lasted from the first of November to the holidays. But that was yesterday.

TODAY

Most celery growers have large green houses in which the plants are grown for the early crop. The planting begins in April and the celery is ready for the market by the latter part of June.

Today the plants are set by machine in a straight line across the fields, setting the plants at a uniform depth, watering and packing the dirt firmly around them. A machine sets two rows at a time while traveling one-half to three-fourths of a mile per hour. Two good operators will set two acres a day.

Celery is now bleached with paper and bleaching requires ten days. Most early celery is washed and bunched at the farm, taken to a central packing plant from where it is sent by truck and express to all parts of the country.

Commercial fertilizers are used and power driven machines do the cultivating and harvesting. Decatur has 8 celery storages with a combined capacity of 400 carloads. There are 250 crates to the average carload.

Today celery is shipped out of Decatur from July first to June first. By the first of February the storages are sold out of Decatur celery and then they are refilled with Florida celery which will be obtainable till the first of June.

A description of Decatur's large celery plants is a story by itself and you will be well repaid by visiting one.

EIGHTH ANNUAL CELERY FESTIVAL and CENTENNIAL

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

The sketch of Dr. Rose published elsewhere in this paper brings to my mind a flood of pleasant memories of him.

The Mattawan doctor intimates that Dr. Rose swore when the buggy broke down. Perhaps he did, doctors have been known to swear when the occasion seemed to demand it. But I know of one occasion when he would have been more justified in swearing but he did not even complain.

It may be that Dr. Rose out of the business of his heart possessed the happy faculty of making all of his friends feel that they held a particularly favored place in his esteem. At any rate I was proud to entertain such a thought.

Occasionally he would come down to the printing office and insist that I needed a rest and should take a ride with him. He never came on any other than a pleasant day, although no storm was too severe for him to brave when there came the call of distress.

People of the present generation, driving in heated and lighted cars over smooth pavements can hardly realize what it meant to start out on a dark night in a pouring rain or the bitter cold of winter, through ruts and mud or almost impassible snow drifts, and guide a fractious team to some lonely home in the country. Such was the common lot of the doctor in the time of Dr. Rose.

Would anyone do it now? It is very doubtful, and thank God it is no longer necessary. No wonder the strong constitution and vigorous body gave out and suddenly collapsed at the age of fifty-three.

One beautiful summer afternoon I accompanied the doctor on a trip to Paw Paw. His business was transacted in a short time and by three o'clock we were on the pleasant drive homeward.

Dr. Rose was heavy, weighing not far from 250 pounds. He drove a fine team of horses hitched to a buggy made extra stout for his weight and rough usage.

His horses were swift, full of life and required constant watching. They had few equals in the community in the amount of territory they could cover in a day.

We were about half way to Decatur, the doctor driving and carrying on a most delightful conversation, when one of the wheels struck a large stone that seemed to have been maliciously placed in the road.

The horses jumped and the doctor was thrown out of the buggy, lighting on his side in the road. He held to the lines which pulled the team around so that they made a complete circle. I jumped out the other side and was able to stop them when they came around.

The doctor proved his horsemanship by the way he held the lines but he was shaken and hurt so severely that, with the prancing horses and my not very efficient help, it was as much as he could do to get back into the carriage.

Dr. Rose said not a word of complaint and displayed not a particle of temper. He took the whole matter as calmly as he would the call of a patient in his office.

We arrived home without further mishap but he had suffered a sprained ankle from which it took him several months to recover.

Well do I remember that cold winter night near the first of January when I last saw him alive. He had come in from a call in the country and was headed for home on foot. He was noticeably a sick man and said he was going home and to bed.

Before the week was over he had gone from us forever, and a shocked and sorrowing people were gradually beginning to realize that a calamity had befallen Decatur.

Here is a magic trick with figures that has been tried out several times and found to work. We don't know why it does, but it does. Try it.

Write the figures of your age down on a sheet of paper.

Add 5

Multiply that result by 50

Add to this total the amount of change in pocket. (This amount must be less than one dollar)

Subtract the number of days in a year

Add 115

The first figures of the total will be your age and the next the amount of change in your pocket.

Illustration: Suppose your age to be 49 and you have 28 cents in change in your pocket.

Age	49
Multiply by 2 equals	98
Add 5 equals	103
Multiply by 50 equals	5150
Add 28c (change in pocket) equals	5178
Subtract 365 (days in year) equals	4813
Add 115, equals	4928

And your age is 49 and you have 28 cents in change in your pocket.

Darwin McKee of East Valley is known to his old time friends as 'Dol.' He is getting up close to his eightieth year and has turned the work and responsibility of keeping up the farm over to his son-in-law, Lytle Watson.

Dol likes to come to town when the the car comes and spend the time here calling on his friends. When asked the other day not to be in a hurry to leave he replied, "I must go now, have to make the rounds."

Dol inquired, "Ever ride in one of them airplanes?" No, we replied, have you? He said he had not and what is more he never intends to. He feels a little safer on the ground. He and the late Mrs. McKee spent the winter of 1924 and '5 in the south. They went in December and returned the following March, establishing their temporary home in Biloxi.They had plenty of opportunities there to go up in an airplane but the idea never appealed to them.

There have been many improvements in flying machines since that winter fourteen years ago, and now instead of a fifteen minutes ride the prospect is solicited to take long excursion trips.

During the winter round trip excursions from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis and return were sold for $15, and airplane trips from Chicago to New York and return were sold to a man and his wife for the price of one fare.

Mrs. Howe writes,"Am feeling a little home sick, but no home, folks, just graves."

Mrs. Howe is not the only one who must fight such thoughts. They must be fought or they will drive the thinker to despair. All over the world there are lonely people, shrinking from the sunlight, desolate, heartsick and sad.

This loneliness is the devil's sharpest weapon. He delights in shoving it into his victim and twisting it to see him writhe. But it is possible to beat the devil off and there is great satisfaction in watching him scurry to safety when routed.

"Weeping may endure for a night but joy cometh in the morning." So sang the Psalmist David, and so we all can sing.

Work is the best cure for the blues. There is a time for introspection when something is crowding to be done.

Sometimes a good funny movie, an ice cream soda or a fox terrier is good for one; and our stock remedy is waiting for the Republican.

Here is something quoted from somebody who did not come very far from hitting the nail on the head:

"A specialist is a person who knows very much about very little and who, as time goes on, continues to learn more and more about less and less, until eventually he knows almost everything about practically nothing at all!"

Here is another quotation we like. It was written by the Union's first martyred president, Abraham Lincoln.

"Let him who is houseless not pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built."

A point on the earth's surface where the prime meridian crosses the equater is called by navigators lolo (latitude zero, longitude zero), because it has neither latitude nor longitude.

The only definition of Lolo given in the dictionary is,—One of a race by some classed as Caucasians of southern Szechwan and Yunnan, China.

Among the many pieces of property listed to be sold for taxes is one in the village of Decatur with $169 against it. The amount might as well be a thousand dollars, the owner would be as well able to pay it. The house needs repairs that would cost at least $500 but they will not be made.

Wonder who will buy the place and turn the owner out into the street. Wonder what the government will do about providing another place for her.

Here is some information about Decatur which we will pass along. According to the last census the village of Decatur has a population of 1,581. The township of Decatur including the village has a population of 2,618.

In the election of November, 1936, Fitzgerald received 702 votes for governor and Murphy 307.

The population of Hamilton township is 793. In the last election Fitzgerald received 206, Murphy 152.

The population of Keeler is 946. It gave Fitzgerald 278 votes for governor and Murphy 233.

Last month the Republican received from the village of Roscommon a copy of Michigan Conservation containing a story of the fur trading post on the Paw Paw river before the village of Paw Paw came into existence.

My dear Arba:

Events of the utmost importance to the entire Benn family were the triennial visits "back home" which mother would plan and then prepare for for many months ahead by making suitable clothing for herself and three small children, for in those days ready-made or store clothes were in the luxury class. Father seldom found it possible to be away from business for a month's visit, so the rest of the family went by train until we children became old enough to pay half and full railroad fare, and then in order to save money the trips were made by horse-and-wagon, as that was before the "horse and buggy days" we've heard so much about during "Fireside Chats" made by the titular head of a certain political organization or of a great nation, depending on the exigencies of the occasion. Having been of greater interest I shall now tell you about one of the horse-and-wagon or I might better say mule-and-wagon trips.

My brother William had reached the age when father considered it safe to let him drive, and as father thought better of a team of mules than of the team of horses he then owned, at least more safe for a young boy to drive, brother drove the mules. They were not much to look at; tall, long and lanky but with the latest mule coiffure, manes and tails trimmed right up-to-the-minute. We would drive steadily until noon or night and then stop and feed and water the mules. A fire would be built and mother would make coffee and we'd all thoroughly enjoy the food she had prepared before leaving home.The nights would be spent at some farm house as we were afraid to camp out.

We spent a wonderful three weeks with mother's father and mother and visiting her brothers and sisters, all of whom were married and lived on farms not far distant, with the exception of her youngest brother, who was still in his teens and lived at home.

These grandparents lived in a large white house, where the sun always seemed to rise absolutely in the north much to my bewilderment. They had the largest red barn I had ever seen in those days, and best of all they had a large orchard with wonderful Maidenblush and other luscious apples, and a large tract of timber in which there were plenty of hickory trees full of nuts. Of course they had lots of chickens, which meant fried chicken and chicken gravy, delicacies I have never tired of even unto this very day, together with eggs prepared with home-cured ham or bacon. Those were truly happy boyhood days, with so many things to eat at meals and apples and nuts from morn until night; in fact I often sneaked a Maidenblush apple to bed with me.

My father's parents lived on a farm eight miles north of Washington, Iowa, my birth place as previously mentioned, and as they were quite old when I was a boy, I can recall only this one visit we made them, which I shall never forget as he was an old time country doctor and had inadvertently uncorked a bottle of medicine and the whole house fairly reeked with its awful smell, the odor of which I have ever since detested, together with a barnyard incident which I never mentioned to a soul but which I may tell you a little later.

Our visit proved a wonderful success; even the mules had a grand vacation with not a thing to do from morning until night but stuff themselves with fine timothy and clover hay and choice oats; quite a change from the common prairie hay and ear corn they were accustomed to at home. However we all had paid dearly for the good time had by the mules before we got back home.

Our visit over we left for home early one morning. There were no good roads in those days, no hard roads of any kind; no road maps nor route markings, so we were seldom sure we were on the right road and had to make frequent inquiries. When we stopped for luncheon it was noticed that one of the mules did not appear especially hungry and later in the day his long ears got wobbly and he began to lag and perspire excessively. Finally mother and brother Will decided the mule was sick, so we stopped at the roadside, unhitched the mules and William went to a nearby farmhouse for help. I had always been told that a mule was tough and hardy that mules never died, and as I had never seen a dead mule I thought such was the truth. However, after watching the sick mule for a time I began to doubt that a mule never died, so I began praying in my fervant boyish manner for the mule to get well, but all to no avail as the mule died before dark and was buried where he fell. I could not understand why my prayers had not been answered as I had been taught in Sunday school that they would be, and I spent a very unhappy, sleepless night.

What a pickle we were in; a badly frightened mother with a splitting headache, three crying children, a two-horse wagon and only one live mule left, and far, far from home and only a few dollars left of mother's reserve funds. Finally mother persuaded the farmer to hitch one of his horses with our remaining mule and drive us to Knoxville, in the mean time having telegraphed father from the next town, he came to meet us there with a horse to help pull us home.

Father drove over to Knoxville in a one-horse sulky, and after hitching the horse with the mule and roping the sulky to the back of the wagon, we reached home late at night, and home, sweet home it was after that experience, which proved my last long cross-country trip by H. P. or I might better say M. P. (mule power).

That hard three-day trip would now be made by auto over wonderful roads in less than three hours, thus showing the discomforts and inconveniences endured during my boyhood days as compared with the comforts and conveniences of—

TODAY

From yesterday's good lessons learn
And for tomorrows, cease to yearn,
For pregnant is the day now here
With friendships, love, success and cheer.
So loiter not nor listless prove
Nor trudge along a rut or groove,
But make of self what God did plan—
An upright, worthy, happy man.

ARBA IS CURIOUS, SO LET'S TELL HIM

Chicago, August 23, 1938.

My dear Arba:

Whitebreast was one of the smaller streams which was never referred to in Iowa as a river but it may have been so designated before it emptied into the Missouri river far south of source. A wide stretch of timber extended practically its entire length in those early days before the walnut, oak, cottonwood and now and then a hickory tree were chopped down and converted into lumber, railroad ties, fence posts and firewood, and where we would go to lay in a winter's supply of walnuts or to gather wild grapes from the large vines clinging to many of the trees, or pick wild plums, which mother would make into plum butter, or wild blackberries, gooseberries, etc., for jellies and jams. There were no butternuts and only a few hickory nuts but hazelnuts were plentiful in our south central part of the state.

Whitebreast woods were well stocked with wild game, including turkeys, and as father dearly loved to go hunting, we usually had a fat turkey hen or a big turkey gobbler for Thanksgiving or Christmas dinner, and when he failed to "bring home the bacon" there was great disappointment in the Benn household. Father was a good shot with his old style squirrel rifle, for which he molded the bullets, which were rammed into the barrel with the ramrod after a charge of powder had been poured from the powderhorn which he had made from a carefully selected cows' horn, and was exploded by a brass cap—an outfit far removed from today's up-to-the-minute hunting equipment.

When I had grown older I often teased father to take me with him on one of his rather frequent trips, which he finally did after he had purchased or traded for a shotgun, putting the discarded rifle at my disposal. We ate a hasty breakfast and left home about four o'clock so we could reach that part of the woods by daylight where he expected turkeys would be leaving their roost in the treetops, and having expected to return home by noon so father could work the remainder of the day we did not take any food with us. We finally struck the trail of a flock of turkeys, which we followed for hours without sighting a single turkey, squirrel, pheasant or other game to shoot at.

It was getting late in the afternoon and I was almost famished, so the turkey hunt was given up in disgust and we started back to where we had left the horses and wagon. I was so tired that I could scarcely drag my feet along, having carried that heavy rifle so long and far. It had occurred to me a number of times during the day that father did not seem very much worried or anxious as to the manner in which I handled the rifle, and later when I tried to shoot at a mark or knot on a tree trunk to try my aim just before climbing into the wagon for the trip home, I found out why father was so unconcerned—try as I might after using cap after cap I could not discharge or fire the gun. I might just as well have lugged a heavy crowbar around with me up hill and down dale, through thicket and underbrush and over fallen trees and stand just as good a chance of getting a turkey as I did by carrying that never-to-be-forgotten gun.

My first turkey hunt sufficed for all time as that was my first and last hunting experience, which means that I have never killed anything with a gun, not even a rabbit, nor do I ever expect to. I have never owned a gun or a revolver as I have never had the slightest personal use for either.

During those far off days eastern buyers would select and purchase large walnut trees, have them chopped down and the logs hauled to Woodburn to be shipped by rail to eastern sawmills to be sawed into lumber for the furniture factories, as walnut furniture was the vogue, such as walnut whatnots, marble top parlor tables, beds, trundle beds, chairs, etc., of which mother possessed a few precious pieces, including a large rocking chair which father greatly cherished. It had a soft downy cushion and our one big black cat always made a bee-line for it when it was not in use. When my baby sister came and there was no crib for her, mother would lay the babe in the rocking chair, and the first time she did so and the cat jumped up to take her usual nap, Tabby was so frightened by the unusual sight she beheld that she ran from the house and never returned. Besides this very unusual incident, many happy memories still cling to—

FATHER'S ROCKING CHAIR

Pa's heavy walnut rocking chair when
I was a small boy,
Long stood within the living room and was my father's joy;
For when his daily tasks were done
he'd put his slippers on,
And there he'd sit and read and smoke till we to bed had gone.

My father bought the rocking chair
the year that I was born,
For which he paid a goodly sum based on the price of corn;
For corn was mighty cheap those days
and little it would buy,
While furniture made "way down east" was scarce and very high.

Quite oft my father sat therein and took me on his knee,
And told me of those stirring times in eighteen sixty-three;
When Yankee lads were led by Grant against the boys in Gray,
And bravely fought before Vicksburg until they won the day.

At other times he'd tell about some places wild and weird,
Or else he'd tell about the night he was so badly skeered;
And so I love to sit and dream of days
quite free from care,
When father held me on his lap and rocked me in his chair.

DECATUR PLANS TO ERECT STATUE TO EDGAR BERGEN AND CHARLIE McCARTHY

By Staff Correspondent of Kalamazoo Gazette.

(This story as printed in the Gazette contains several errors. The date of his birth is incorrect. He did not go to school to Mrs. Arthur Howe. The reporter has this name confused with that of Mrs. Lena Wickett Bailey. Mrs. Otis Howe [Millie Dunnington] was his neighbor when they were children in the Shaw district. We shall try to present to Republican readers an accurate story of Edgar Bergen's Decatur days and shall appreciate the help of our townspeople who remember him.)

Decatur—One of the famous teams of the entertainment world may soon have a monument erected here in its honor . . . Edgar Bergen and his popular dummy, Charlie McCarthy.

It is likely that the monument will present only the likeness of Charlie, but it will be symbolical of the fame that Bergen has brought to his old home town.

Enthusiasm over the idea of suitable recognization of this comedy team and the fame that such a monument would bring to Decatur is growing. Actively interested in the idea are Arba N. Moulton, veteran editor of the Decatur Republican; Oscar N. Newell, furniture dealer, mortician, president pro tem of the village board and member of the school board; Henry Houseman, principal of the high school, and Harley Smith, boyhood friend of Bergen's.

Resident 11 Years

Bergen was born in Chicago, Oct. 6, 1903. While he was a baby his parents moved to Decatur and Edgar was a resident of this community for 11 years. The family lived in several places in and about Decatur, One residence was thre miles south of town, at which time Bergen attended the Shaw country school. This district school building still stands.

While resident of the village Bergen was a pupil at the old brick school which burned Feb. 11, 1919. E. R. Washburn, who was then superintendent of schools, is still a member of the faculty and now is teaching science.

One of Edgar's teachers back in the brick school days was Mrs. Arthur Howe, now a resident of Decatur.

"I remember Edgar Bergen very well," Mrs. Howe states. "He was in the fourth grade class which I was teaching during the school year of 1913-14. I recall that he showed particular skill in art at that time but there was nothing to indicate that he later would gain fame as a ventriloquist and entertainer. I remember, too, that when he was in school here that the family name was spelled 'Bergren'."

Parents Not Wealthy

Harley Smith who "grew up" with Bergen during his days in Decatur, recalls that Charley McCarthy's sponsor was dabbling in ventriloquism even before he left Decatur.

"As a boy I used to play with both Edgar and his brother Clarence," Smith said. "Clarence is now a certified public accountant in Chicago. Both of the boys, I believe attended the University of Chicago and Northwestern University. I remember a school party we had out near Eagle lake where Edgar put on a ventriloquist act, but used no dummy."

Bergen's parents were not wealthy. The father maintained the family by doing farm work, and such other jobs as he could get. It was the death of the father in Decatur which prompted the mother to take her children back to Chicago after their residence of 11 years at Decatur.

One of Edgar's first jobs as a lad was sweeping out and doing general work at the old opera house in Decatur, which was then managed by Mrs. Gertrude Metzger. It was a triumphal night in the village when the former Decatur boy came back as one of the featured stars in the film, "Goldwyn Follies." The old opera house has gone and now the films are shown in the Cozy theatre, owned and managed by Fred E. Pennell.

Wire From Bergen

Manager Pennell made an effort to have Bergen present in person for this opening run of his picture in Decatur. Finding this was impossible, a compromise was effected whereby Bergen sent a telegram conveying his greetings to the residents of Decatur.

First suggestion that a statue be erected to Charlie McCarthy was printed by Editor Moulton in his own front page column "This Week." By his own account, Moulton gives credit for the suggestion to another newspaper man who had come to town to see what could be learned about Bergen's residence there.

"The reporter made a good suggestion," Moulton writes. "He said Decatur should erect a statue of the famous wooden man in a conspicous place in the village on M-40, and add the words, 'Decatur, the Birthplace of Charlie McCarthy.' It was his opinion that such a display of enterprise would make Decatur famous.

"It is a capital idea. Perhaps we as a community are not capitalizing our natural resources."

ARBA IS CURIOUS, SO LET'S TELL HIM

Chicago, July 26, 1938.
Episode 8

My dear Arba:

I was large and husky for my age but I was never given to fighting, so I got through my boyhood days without one serious fight with the town boys due to the fact that the boys of my own age were afraid of me and the older boys were ashamed to fight a boy so much younger than they were. I remember one real fight, a fight to the finish almost, with my brother Will, because I seriously resented being bossed by him, and as a result father gave us both a hard whipping, although few and far between were the whippings he gave either of us, and this particular whipping prevented further similar outbreaks between us.

I never cared much about wrestling but there was one neighbor boy who was never satisfied until he had thrown me, little did it matter where he met me. One cold winter day I was standing near the stove in father's drug store when he entered and grabbed me and as usual I was getting the worst of it and was falling, and to prevent me from falling against the hot stove father gave me a shove and I landed on top of my antagonist. Very naturally I thought I had at last thrown him, which gave me the courage long lacking and the next few times we met I reversed the usual wrestling results and threw him, soon causing him to cease picking on me. With sufficient confidence, backed by worthwhile effort, life's battles may be won.

As I grew older I wanted to earn some money but few were the opportunities to do so in such a small village, so I never had any spending money to speak of. The owner of the candy, ice cream and oyster parlor often gave me a dish of ice cream, but never any money, for turning his old-fashioned freezer for what seemed an endless length of time. His ice cream formula was very simple—two gallons of milk from which the cream appeared to have been skimmed, plus a pint of water used to wash out the milk container so not one drop of milk would be lost, to which was added the same kind of lemon extract mother used to buy for cooking purposes. It more nearly resembled lemon ice than ice cream. Folks talk about sharp practices these days but dilution, adulteration and a few similar words seem to have been quite well understood more than three-score years ago, so after all the world may not be getting worse and worse as some people seem to think.

Mother used to plan so I could earn a few pennies now and then and among other things she suggested was what I make and sell some—

"SOFT SOAP"

I used to saw and split and tote
And pile the wood-box high;
And very often ma would say—
"Wood ashes make good lye,
So take a shovel and pan
And clean the stoves out well,
And save the ashes till next spring

And then make soap to sell."

When spring came round I'd go down town
And roll a barrel back,
And then I'd stand it on two logs—
A makeshift for a rack;
And with the barrel thus in place
I'd tamp the ashes tight,
And water poured thereon at morn
Would be strong lye by night.

The big black kettle from the shed
Would then be brought to view,
And to the lye I'd add meat scraps
And then I'd sniff and whew!
For soft soap boiling o'er a fire
Gives off an awful smell,
But one must o'er expect to sniff
When making soap to sell.

I'd sell the soap from door to door,
And with my hard earned dough,
I'd buy a Huckleberry Finn
And to the hay mow go;
And there I'd read, or dream of days
When I'd ne'er taste of hash,
Nor save the ashes for soft soap
To raise a little cash.

It seems quite strange how times have changed,
For now I like wife's hash
And dearly love the smooth "soft soap"
She gives me for my cash;
Besides it sort of dawns on me
Though I can't tell just why,
That mother used to "soft soap" me
When I was young and shy.

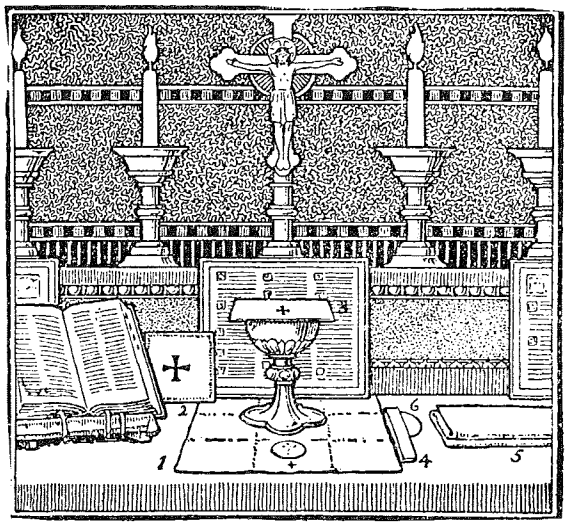
Principal Henry Houseman,
Decatur High School,
Decatur, Michigan.
Dear Friend:

It is with a feeling of great pleasure that I am writing to you on behalf of the Committee on Student Personnel of this institution to advise you that the name of Dominic Dziewiatkowski appears on the High Scholarship list for the spring term, 1938. This is a signal honor, in view of the fact that the standards set for achieving this distinction are very high.

We feel sure that you will be as happy, because of this achievement, as are the members of the committee. It is needless to indicate that we are extremely glad to have students of this caliber associated with us.

Very cordially yours,
John C. Hoekje,
Registrar.

Dominic was graduated from the Decatur High School in the class of 1933.



HOLY FAMILY CHURCH OF DECATUR, MICHIGAN

(This sketch of the Decatur Catholic church and its members was prepared by Postmaster Herbert H. Creagan. The information was furnished in part by W. H. Howland of Jackson, Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney of Chicago, and Thomas Mahoney of Decatur.)

The Holy Family church was originally a mission of Silver Creek and was in charge of Father Baroux, pioneer missionary, who came to the United States from France and set up headquarters on the St. Joseph river at about where Notre Dame University now stands. He later set up headquarters at Silver Creek and took an especial interest in converting the Indians.

Father Baroux came to Decatur at intervals and said mass in homes of parishioners. The first mass in Decatur was said in the home of Mr. McDonald on North Phelps street. Father Baroux was followed by Father Sweeny and next in line was Father Roper. During this period mass was said in Decatur at times by Father La Bell of Kalamazoo.

Father Wernett was the next priest assigned to work in Decatur and this mission was attached to Paw Paw.

A few years later Decatur was transferred to Dowagiac and the priests in order were Father Broger, Father Joos and Father Cramer.

The next transfer was back to Paw Paw and Decatur was served in turn by the following Fathers: O'Rourke, Marker, Mulcahy, Wall Clarson, O'Toole, Higgins, Bona and Sajnaj.

Then came Father Korzeniecki of Bangor and the present incumbent, Father Krawczyk.

In early years mass was said in a hall in the Trowbridge building on Phelps street. Many children of early settlers were baptized in this building.

At one time a large church was proposed, property was bought and plans for a building were formulated. This plan was later abandoned and a small frame church was bought from the Universalist society which was building a new church. They had purchased the frame church from the Presbyterians some years previous. This church was dedicated by Father Broger about 1885 and served the parish until 1933 when a brick church built by the Universalists was bought by Holy Family church.

On a Sunday morning a few months ago Holy Maternity church, Dowagiac, was filled to capacity when the Most Reverend Joseph H. Albers, bishop of the Lansing diocese, celebrated Solemn pontifical mass on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the first Catholic church in Cass Bishop Albers was assisted by Rev. John Hackett V. G. of Kalamazoo, and other pastors from about the state.

The first celebration of Holy Mass was in Silver Creek in 1837.

The history of Catholicism in Cass county is a thrilling one, filled with the hardships and privations which the Jesuit priests underwent to bring christianity to the Pottawatomie Indians who then were the principal occupants of this section of Michigan.

Old Chief Simon Pokagon helped to build the first church in Silver Creek township and it was the place of worship of the 250 Indians residing there.

While the Chief was living his people were united and happy, but after his death, July 8, 1840, his estate was divided and the entire tribe, with the exception of ten families, moved to Rush Lake where they built another church.

The first Catholic church in Dowagiac was built in 1872. A few years later prosperity struck Dowagiac and Father Broegger built his residence there in 1880, making it his headquarters instead of Silver Creek.

Father J. Joos came to the parish in 1891 and the next year built the present Dowagiac church on North Front street. In 1893 Watervliet and Rush lake were added as missions to Dowagiac.

Father Joos during his stay at Dowagiac had mission churches at Silver Creek, Hartford, Bainbridge, Decatur and Paw Paw. Rev. John G. Wall was transferred from Paw Paw in 1901. Rev. Frank Carroll has been pastor of the Dowagiac church since 1928.

DIVERSIFICATION OF CROPS ON MUCKLAND

By E. L. Woodhams, Manager, A. M. Todd Company, Mentha, Michigan, in the Sugar Beet Journal.

Our Mentha Plantation, as it is called, comprises about 2100 acres of muck in the northeast corner of Van Buren county, adjacent to Kalamazoo and within three miles of Allegan counties. A. M. Todd bought it around 1900 when it was all in the wild state. Previous to that he had owned and farmed 80 acres at Decatur, Michigan, and about 1600 acres near Fennville, so that he was not an amateur at handling muck.

The Mentha muck is nearly all "heavy" muck—having been largely covered with ash, elm, cedar and swamp oak timber with but little so-called "open marsh" before it was brought under the plow. In many ways, it is like much of the muck around Decatur. The Decatur and Mentha areas are the two largest muck areas in Van Buren county. This type of muck is much heavier and more solid than the mucks on which trees like the tamarack grew.

When the writer took charge of the farm in 1910, the two things that we thought about were: (1) getting more land cleared and (2) draining sufficiently to grow a crop. Insect pests and diseases were minor matters—as they usually are on new land. Only two or three crops were grown at first—mint was the most important and there were smaller acreages of onions and cabbage. When the land was new, little if any fertilizer was used, and we were reasonably sure of a good crop if we could get it in on time and there was no flood or frost. The crops grew readily on the virgin soil and good yields were the rule.

I think this is the history of all new mucks—the "cream" can be skimmed for say 10 years and then something happens. Yields begin to fall off unless large amounts of fertilizer are applied every year; weeds seem to get bigger and better and insect pests and disease begin to appear or at least to become troublesome. This is not confined to muckland as you can look around and see the same thing happening on the high ground. Lands that used to grow good crops 25 and 30 years ago are standing idle in many cases because they do not "make any money" as we say.

There are really two reasons for this state of affairs. The land is certainly not "worn out." Land does not wear out that way. The two reasons are (1) we have mined the soil—taking off crop after crop without replacing anything by plowing under green manures and (2) one crop farming.

That first 10 years of "cream skimming" took strength from the soil that may have respresented hundreds of years of building up. Just figure how many tons of humus you take from a soil in 10 years and no wonder the soil needs help.

Some of you know land in Kalamazoo that has raised celery continuously for 50 or 60 years without rotation, but today you will also find that is pretty "sick." Part of the trouble is from "mining" the soil and part of it from one crop farming which has multiplied celery disease, until many fields are almost a total loss each year. I was born and brought up in Kalamazoo and I can well remember the old Hollanders riding on top of a steaming load of manure which they had secured from stables right there in town. Everyone who could afford to do so kept a horse or two and perhaps a milch cow right in the middle of town, just the same as everybody has a car today. The result was that the 2 or 3 acre piece of celery ground was literally plastered with manure — tons of it to the acre. Today there are no more horses and unfortunately automobiles do not produce fertilizer. So really with the coming of the automobile, celery production began to slide down both in quantity and in quality. Manure still remains the best all around fertilizer for muck, but you cannot cover 25 or 50, or 100 acres with manure today and there are farmers here in Decatur who raise well over 100 acres of celery. Possibly if they could get tons and tons of good manure, they might continue one crop farming. But at that one crop farming is poor farming—insects and disease that attack that particular crop increase unless crops are rotated. So we must do something else.

Rotating crops such as onions to celery to mint and using commercial fertilizer will not do the trick as you are still "mining the soil." Some crops do leave a valuable residue which can be plowed under—such as cabbage, sugar beets and mint when it is "run out," as we say.

Corn is another muck crop which we have raised as a rotation crop successfully after we had developed an early corn that will mature by Labor day. There is one drawback to corn, however, and that is the fact that you cannot fall plow unless you remove the crop early. The ideal way to harvest corn is to pick the ears from the standing stalks and then plow under the stover. If you have to plow the corn land the next spring, it is hard to find a crop to follow it unless we wish to turn under a crop like rye or soybeans, the year following corn.

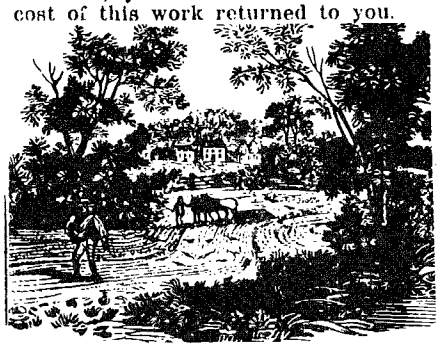
Sugar beets which we tried in 1937 for the first time appear to be a good rotation crop. You can turn under the tops and have the land fall plowed. Another good feature of sugar beets is the fact that they go deeper into the ground than any other muck crop and thus secure some plant food from the deeper ground. They also tend to air out the soil. The tops are a valuable cattle feed if you want them.

We all know that fall plowing is best as we want to get on the land just as early in the spring as possible. But it would be much better for the soil if we could cover it with a crop like rye in the winter. Bare land in the winter is bad farming – it causes washing and blowing. About the only way to do is to divide up our fields and not try to raise money crops on every acre every year—use part of the farm for building up fertility.

If you will take a look at the older muck areas, you will find the same story—right from Indiana up through Michigan. Muck areas that in 1910 were veritable "Gardens of Eden" have gone back to field crops like hay and corn and are no longer intensively farmed. In 1910 the famous Nappanee Swamp in Indiana was the center of onion growing. Then the thrip, wind storms and so forth, turned it to mint. Now the flea beetle and other troubles have driven these farmers to the field crops. The enormous Fennville area was a great mint center and today the mint farmers have turned to other crops—simply a case of too much one crop farming.

The solution, it seems to me, is to raise a greater variety of crops and above all to plow something under once in three or four years on each field. Soy beans are not adapted to muck except as a green manure crop, as the season is too short but they are excellent for building up humus. You may broadcast corn with a grain drill and get an enormous tonnage to plow under. You may plow under rye.

With the Soil Conservation Act in force, you can at least get the cost of this work returned to you.



FLAT-BOATING ON THE PAW PAW RIVER

By Dana Smith, Paw Paw, Mich.

Ever since LaSalle came to the mouth of the St. Joseph river it has been the highway for travel and commerce for the Indians first and the white man later. As the Paw Paw river has its mouth within a half mile of the St. Joseph river it is more than likely that it early attracted the notice of the hunters and traders who found it a practicable route for canoe travel up as far as the presesnt site of the village of Paw Paw. It could be a very useful route for the traders of the St. Joseph to reach the Indian villages of the interior. With the coming of settlers and before the building of roads the crooked old Paw Paw carried considerable traffic.

In 1834 Wm. Ackley, who had settled north of Paw Paw and raised a crop of wheat, built a flat boat and transported his crop to market at St. Joseph by way of the Paw Paw river. Wm. Gunn, a neighbor of Ackley on Section one north of Paw Paw, also shipped his wheat in the same way to St. Joseph. These men were the first settlers in Paw Paw township to accomplish anything in an agricultural way and they were the first to navigate the Paw Paw river to St. Joseph.

Ackley on one of his trips to St. Joseph with wheat brought back to Agard's trading post below Paw Paw a load of goods for the store of J. Adison Smith at Schoolcraft. In the fall of 1834 the above firm purchased Agard's boat to ply the Paw Paw in the interest of their firm. The craft was a flat boat and the propelling power was men with setting poles. There was a plank runway along each side of the boat with cleats fastened on to give a suitable foothold. The setting poles were stout but light with one end cushioned and covered with some kind of animal skin. It took four men and sometimes more to operate these poles, which was done in the following manner: Two men would take their places at the bow and the front end of the runway, and, setting their poles in the river bottom and the cushioned end against their shoulder, they would push valiantly and as the boat moved forward they would walk back along the runway until near the end when they would call out "set" and two men ready at the bow would set their poles and go down the runway, while the other two returned to the bow to repeat the laborious operation. The heat of summer and the swarms of mosquitoes night and day, added to the chill rains and snow of near winter, made the work exceedingly hard, but the pioneers were stalwart men who thrived on hard work and by such men was the wilderness subdued.

Trips to St. Joe

Wm. Lyle shipped on a flat boat as cook for a round trip to St. Joseph in 1835. Writing of his experience he said, "The mosquitoes were a terrible torment. They would settle in swarms on the meat frying in the skillet. It was impossible to keep them off so they were cooked with the meat. There was no complaint as it was either eat it or go hungry." There was no shelter on the boats and the crews were exposed to the drenching rains and wet snows which added to the general discomfort.

On one of his trips to St. Joseph Ackley sold his boat to J. Addison Smith of Schoolcraft who loaded it with goods for their store, intending to ship them up the Paw Paw to the French Trading Post where they would be wagoned to Schoolcraft. One of the worst obstructions on the river was the rapids at Watervliet, and when this was reached try as they might they could not pole the boat up the rapids. Delamore Duncan and Isaac Sumner were building a mill at the rapids and Mr. Duncan gave his assistance by driving a yoke of oxen into the river, hitching to the boat and hauling it up the rapids. They opened a barrel of sugar and paid for the work with that rather scarce article. Even as late as 1839 a considerable quantity of wheat raised about Schoolcraft was hauled to Paw Paw and ground into flour at the then new mill then boated down the river to market at St. Joseph.

L. W. Willard once loaded a large shipment of flour at the West Michigan Avenue bridge for St. Joseph, but this could only be done during high water as the "riffles" above the trading post made it too hazardous.

In 1848 the legislature appropriated $10,000 to improve the navigation of the Paw Paw. The money was spent, John R. Baker being the contractor. The benefits were negligible as the Territorial road, newly finished, was taking the traffic, and river boating days were past.

Flatboating Days Over

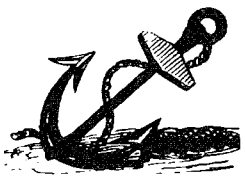
In the thirties the merchants at Schoolcraft bought their goods in New York, sent them up the Hudson river by boat to Albany, thence by canal to Buffalo, thence around the Great Lakes via Detroit and the Straits of Mackinac to St. Joseph, thence up the Paw Paw to Agard's landing, thence by wagon to Schoolcraft.

By 1842 flat boating on the Paw Paw was over. In 1835 it was an unbroken wilderness from Paw Paw to St. Joseph, except the new mill building at Watervliet.

In 1840 I. W. Willard of Paw Paw built two flat boats to ship flour from his mill at Paw Paw to St. Joseph. One was named the "Daniel Buckley," A. R. Wildey, captain, and the other, the "Wave," commanded by Wm. B. Hurlbert. One of these boats lies rotting in the river sands opposite Rose Villa at Paw Paw. John Reynolds was another flat boat captain. There are others who flat boated on the Paw Paw whose names and deeds have been lost in the more than one hundred years since those pioneer days.

Down on the site of the old trading post, once the scene of so much activity is nothing but a lonely wind swept field. The road leading to the river landing is there still. Part of the foundation of the old warehouse can be seen when the river is low, mute reminder of those long ago pioneer days, when Paw Paw was a river port.

Back in the village in the Pioneer Cemetery, sleeping in unmarked graves beneath the whispering pines, lie many of the pioneers who helped to bring civilization to the Paw Paw valley. The oldest marked grave is 102 years old, that of Susan B. Dodge, the first person to die in the then new settlement of Paw Paw. May the lights and shadows of the fleeting years rest lightly on their last resting place.



TWO NOTED DOCTORS SKETCHED BY DR. McNAIR

Drs. Rose of Decatur and Palmer of Hartford Have Gone Down in History Among the Greatest Country Doctors in Southwestern Michigan.

Reprinted for Kalamazoo Gazette.

Dr. Rush McNair, who has just completed 51 years of medical practice in Kalamazoo, is writing for the Gazette reminiscences of the members of the Kalamazoo Academy of Medicine.

His last installment included sketches of Dr. Ezra Palmer of Hartford and Dr. Gilbert L. Rose of Decatur. These men in their day were outstanding members of the medical profession in southwestern Michigan.

They frequently called each other in consultation and were such good friends that the story of one accompanies naturally the story of the other.

Dr. McNair writes of the two as follows:

Dr. Ezra C. Palmer

Dr. Ezra C. Palmer was not a pretty-pretty. He was a little forward bent and got over the ground with a mincing and a shuffle. His hair was blond with a curl at the tips and thinning on his crown. His nose was tipped spherically. His lips were thick and he spoke none too distinctly.

But who looked into his eyes saw the benevolence, the kindness and the charity, fell under a certain hypnotism of which Dr. Palmer himself was unaware. His voice, too, spoke benevolence, kindness and charity. And there was a quality in it, a timbre of old primitive folk song, never written, that made one's breath go tense, the heart throb and the blood beat in the temples. I never met another who had such affection for every one of his medical brethren. He took every doctor to his heart and gave his confidence, his loyalty and his whole devotion.

Meets Tragic End

The years went by and there came a request that I visit Dr. Palmer. When I arrived Dr. Palmer lay in bed. In a front room in consultation were Dr. George Carnes of South Haven, and Dr. O. M.Vaughan of Covert.They told me that the doctor had developed a form of Bright's disease and that they felt there could be but one termination.

After a visit with the doctor I came away much depressed. I made two other visits within the next few weeks. Dr. Palmer asked, "Do you think Dr. Harris Burnet Osborne would come and see me?" I answered that the doctor would wish to come and that I would bring him down.

I will never forget the scene when Dr. Osborne came into the room. Palmer roused himself from his beginning coma, raised his head and shoulders upon pillows, grasped Dr. Osborne's hands in both of his and clung to them through the whole visit. Both doctors were under much emotion. Finally, said Dr. Palmer, "Dr. Osborne, do you remember the comparison that Dr. Rose made at that autopsy over in Keeler township?" In recollection, both doctors laughed until tears ran down their faces. I too, was profoundly moved and did not withhold all my tears. The dying doctor . . . death for him only a few weeks away . . . and his old friends, two men of nobility and purity moved to laughter over the wit of a ribald joke . . . so human, so very human, so wholly lovable and so natural.

Language of Doctors

Let it be remembered that doctors have a language all their own. It is spoken by no other people. Sometimes in this language things are said which may not be translated. The older doctors spoke this language more classically than the moderns. And, alas, this language is now almost one with Nineveh and Troy.

Smut is like ambergris. Ambergris, a foul appearing, malodorous mass ejected from the intestinal tract of the whale, is found floating on the sea or cast up on the shore. It is worth from $20 to $100 a pound, for the wee-est bit of it is the spirit of the most exquisite perfume. We all love exquisite perfumes. And ninety-nine parts of wit added to one part of smut makes a combination unexcelled in all literature.

In his Gettysburg address, Abraham Lincoln spoke in the language of the heavenly spheres, but in his pleas to a jury or in a political appeal to the men of Illinois, he often, and in the best of taste, made use of ambergris. And long after the grateful odor had left their nostrils, the great truth that Lincoln had uttered was graven in their souls.

Dr. Ezra C. Palmer was born in New York state, the son of Henry R. and Margaret Plantz Palmer. He died in Hartford, Mich., September 17, 1909, at the age of 59.

Dr. Gilbert L. Rose

He who looks upon the portrait of Dr. Gilbert L. Rose does not need to be told that here is a great man . . . the noble and thoughtfully poised head; the keenness and kindness of his eyes, the fine features of his face, as if chiseled in Parian marble; the deep vision of his gaze; the giant shoulders, fit to carry the woes and tribulations of a world.

Dr. Rose was born in LaPorte county, Indiana, July 21, 1853. He attended the LaPorte public schools and at 17 entered the medical department of ths University of Michigan. In 1874 he was graduated at the Cincinnati College of Medicine.

On August 1, 1876, Dr. Rose and Mary E. Kelly were married. There were born two sons, Max Donald, a business executive in New York City, and Dalton Keats, member of the faculty, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo. From 1888, for four years, Dr. Rose was associated in practice with Dr. George W. Mahoney, now professor of ophthamology, Loyola University.

Horse and Buggy Era

Dr. Rose's practice was all in the horse and buggy era. On January 5, 1907, after 33 years of the severest stress and storm, the deep roots of his life were torn from the earth and his great form crashed to the ground. Dr. Rose's funeral was held in the town hall of Decatur. All the forenoon, old friends of country and town filed through to gaze and the time was all too brief for all who came.

I heard Dr. Reuben Peterson, member of the University of Michigan, pronounce an eloquent tribute on his dear friend and brother doctor . . . "and were everyone for whom he did some loving kindness, to bring a blossom to his grave, he would sleep tonight 'neath a wilderness of flowers."

Recalls Night Ride

Dr. George E. King of Mattawan recalled a ride he took with Dr. Rose. The two doctors spent the night far out in the country at the bedside of a man on the verge of death. Midforenoon, a hot day in midsummer, the two doctors were dozing as the horse chose the homeward road. A front wheel ran into a "pitch" hole throwing the two doctors forward.The front axle broke and the two doctors found themselves under the heels of the horse.

King scrambled out and sat on a rock, while Rose, as soon as he could catch his breath, proceeded to express himself. It is said that the wrath of a good man is the most terrible. Rose burned up the horse, the buggy, the road and even the dust and ruts, night work of doctors, the whole doctoring business, cursed the day he was born and that he should be condemned to set the affairs of this lost, vermin-infested world aright. King said he laughed almost to exhaustion

General Horace Porter tells of General U. S. Grant, who, during the two days of horror in the Wilderness, gave orders, as always, in a calm quiet voice, but when the army was on the march to the slaughter of Spotsylvania and Grant saw a teamster beating a horse over the head with a whiffletree, lost all control and tore loose with such a lurid cursing that the astounded staff forgot to record it.

Thus was a classic lost to literature. Thus, likewise, was lost the classic of Dr. Rose.

LETTERS

THE STORY OF DR. BROWN

(The Republican welcomes the letters from Edwin McGowan, an old time citizen of Lawrence and the community of Corwin. Mr. McGowan is one of the few still living who knows and can tell the trials and experiences of our pioneers, the men and women who came into this country, carved their homes out of the wilderness and cleared the fine farms for future generations. These letters are memorials to rugged people, tributes to their memories, a recognition of their accomplishments.

When the senior generation of today passes away the first hand record of the pioneers will be closed. Strangers will be living in the homes they built, and working in the fields they made ready for the plow. Those who made it possible for the new comers to enjoy the beautiful country homes are resting from their labor in the sleep that knows no waking, and there will be no one left to speak their praise.

The Republican welcomes these pioneer stories, for the time will come when the files of this paper will furnish to posterity the richest bits of history that exist of this fair community. They will have value then and the contributors like Mr. McGowan will be lauded for furnishing the basis for historical studies of southwestern Michigan.Others who contribute pioneer stories to the Republican will also be praised for it long after they have been gathered to their fathers. Every reader has a standing invitation to contribue them.)

Lawrence, Mich.,
March 26, 1938.

Decatur Republican,
Dear Editor,—

I wonder if you could spare the time and space in your splendid paper for a short sketch of an every day pioneer and his family of Corwin, Dr. George Brown.

They came to Michigan from Canada about the year 1865 and settled temporarily on the Robert Nesbitt farm.

They were a large family, consisting of the husband and wife and the following sons and daughters,—Joseph, Charley, James, Robert, William, Eugene, Hannah and Malinday.

After Mr. Brown had lived in the Nesbitt neighborhood a few years he got the western fever, and with his team and wagon, household goods and family started out by the overland route in the direction of the setting sun.

They had been in the west but a short time when the adventurer became very sick and his money was all used up.

Then they all decided to return to Michigan. Joe supplied them with the money he had earned working there by the month.

Mr. Brown was still very weak when they started. They carried him on a cot to the station and put him on board a train. Mrs. Brown and the younger children accompanied him and the older boys drove through with the team and wagon.

When they returned they settled on the north forty of Wess Abbott's big farm. There was a small house on the place, and Mr. Brown recovered his health and worked several years for Mr. Abbott. He eventually bought the place, built the little house and made a comfortable home. It is known of late years as the Mort Bullard place.

It was about this time that the subject of our sketch started on his new career as a doctor. It was in a small crude way at first,—just doctoring for his neighbors and friends. But he was very successful, and his success became noised around the community.

He was soon riding over the townships of Keeler, Hartford and Hamilton, the busiest veterinarian in that section of the county. He never attended a veterinary school or college and his education was limited, but he had a natural gift for the work and in fact was a typical self-made man.

Drowning of Robert

During the time the doctor was at his best in his practice a sad tragedy came into his home when Robert Brown was drowned in the Nesbitt mill pond.

The Corwin boys had a swimming pool at the pond but Robert was warned by his parents not to go there without telling them and getting their consent.

One day Robert went to the pool with his chum, Silas McGowan, without the knowledge of his parents. Both boys were fifteen years old and about the same size.

The bank of the pond was steep and slippery, the soil being clay. The two boys had stripped for the swim when Robert slipped down the bank into the water and went under. He could not swim but Silas could and dove from the bank into the water to save him. When Robert came to the surface Silas grabbed him, but Robert got a drowning man's death grip on Silas and both went down. Silas, by using every ounce of strength he had, succeeded in getting himself loose and rose to the surface. He saved himself but Robert drowned.

We hope that every boy who reads this sad story about Robert will take warning and obey their parents at all times.

Written by Edwin McGowan of Lawrence)

(The story last week concluded with the drowning of Dr. Brown's son Robert in the Nesbitt mill pond.)

To the Republican,—

It was about this time that George McGowan was mowing hay with the first Buckeye mower made. One of his horses was an unusually fine and valuable animal. The early mowers were crude and as hard as a steamboat to run, not like the mowers of today that turn so easily on their ball bearings.

The splendid horse Prince did not mind the work, and stuck his head down and nipped off the rich red heads of the June clover at every opportunity. One time when nipping the clover blossoms he received a nip on the nose by a big rattle snake. Prince threw up his head and the rattle snake took a tail spin to safety.

In a few minutes the animal's nose was badly swollen and George McGowan was badly scared.

It was a half mile through the woods to the home of Dr. Brown and one of my older brothers made a record run to get him.

The doctor was soon on the scene and decided that the only way to save the horse was to bleed him. That was the generally accepted way to cure sick animals as well as people, in some cases, in those early days.

Dr. Brown sharpened a stick and jabbed it up into poor Prince's nostril. He bled all right but the bleeding would not stop. Prince became so weak they thought he was going to fall.

It was then that Dr. Brown became frightened and said, "If I lose this fine horse I will never doctor any more, and the only thing that will save him is a puff ball."

There was a tract of about one hundred acres of timber that came up to within a few rods of our barn; my older brothers knew where there were plenty of puff balls there and they were not long in getting some of them to the doctor.

The doctor slit one of the balls and pushed it up Prince's nostril and it clotted the blood and stopped the bleeding.

The little puff ball not only saved the life of a valuable horse but kept the doctor from giving up his practice that later made him a small fortune.

Joe and His Pal

Joe Brown worked several years for Dick and Wess Abbott. It was while he was working for Wess that he started to keep company with Rosetta McGowan, then living with her parents in their log cabin in the woods.

Wess Abbott had a big black shaggy dog, a fine watch and stock dog named Rover, and he and Joe became fast friends. Rover would follow Joe whenever he had permission, and sometimes when he did not have.

One Sunday night when Joe visited Rosetta at her home in the woods Rover knew when he left and the direction he took. All the evening the dog kept his nose pointed to the north hoping to see or get the scent of his returning.

After a while the dog got nervous and about eleven o'clock set out through the woods to find him. He took the winding wagon road that led to the log house of the McGowans. When about 30 rods from the end of the road he decided his pal was at the cabin and he would wait there.

The dog stretched himself across the wagon road while the hoot owls and screech owls made excited noises in the trees above him.

About midnight Joe bid Rosetta good bye and hurried down the wagon trail for home. He was wondering what was the cause of the unusual hooting and screeching of the owls overhead when all of a sudden he stumbled over a big black animal that lay across his path.

As he was taking a header into the brush Joe was thinking rapidly and his conclusion was that he had come in contact with a bear. But before he could get to his feet Rover was licking his hands and face and telling his pal as best he could how sorry he was to have caused the spill.

If Joe did not enjoy keeping company with Rosetta at the old log cabin it was not because Rosetta's kid brothers did not try to make it interesting for him.

Joseph Brown and Rosetta McGowan were married February 8, 1871, and the writer has a piece of her wedding dress.

After Joe had paid for tying the knot he had just a dollar and fifty cents left for himself and bride to begin their journey through life together. By hard work and careful planning he made good and before they reached the end of the long trail they had a fine home and property.

Joe and Rosetta began house-keeping in a log cabin on the farm of Eli McGowan, now owned by Mrs. Ella Abrams.

A Near Tragedy

There came near to being another tragedy in the family of Dr. Brown. Not long after Joe was married he became ill. It was probably an attack of billiousness or the ague.

A messenger was sent to the home of his parents explaining the trouble, and Mrs. Brown said she had just the medicine that would put him on his feet in a jiffy.

The medicine was sent to Joe with orders to take a big dose. Mrs. Brown reasoned that if a little dose would help him a bigger dose would help him more.

Medicine in those days was not put up as it is now. Then it was in the form of dry powder,--red, white, pink, brown and so on, and was kept in glass vials by all doctors, both horse and human. The vials were labelled and the doctor would pour from them onto a small square piece of paper the medicine he wished to give a patient. Sometimes he would pour from two or three vials and mix them together, and the taste of some of it was bad enough to make a pig squeal.

Dr. Brown was not at home when the messenger came, but arrived soon after. His wife explained to him what the trouble was and that she had sent Joe some of her good medicine. He asked her what vial she took the medicine from and when she showed him his heart almost stopped beating. She had sent Joe, some of the horse medicine that contained enough poison to cure or kill a horse. The good medicine the mother had intended to send had in some way gotten into the place of the horse medicine.

There were no airplanes or autos in those days and the doctor had to depend upon the old gray mare to make the run against time and save his son. The mare did her duty and then and there earned the everlasting thanks of the families. Joe had not yet taken the medicine and his life was saved.

Eugene Succeeds His Father

Dr. Eugene Brown now comes into the picture. When a young man Eugene decided that he would follow the calling of his father and become a veterinarian. He had helped his father for years and in this way had gained first hand knowledge of the profession.

He realized that he must go to school and to veterinary college in order to meet modern requirements of the profession and compete with other veterinarians. So he attended the college at Toronto, Canada, and later took a special course at Grand Rapids.

He was then able to cope with the best veterinarians of the day, and to help his father who had been riding day and night over four counties and greatly needed rest.

In the course of time Dr. Eugene Brown became one of the leading doctors of southwestern Michigan.

Dr. George Brown bought a big farm and home near Lawrence and retired. John Spinks now owns the place and it is one of the best and most up-to-date fruit farms in the township.

There is but one member left of that big family and he is our good townsman, William Brown of Lawrence.

THE POST OFFICE AT CORWIN

I will now give you a little history of the Corwin post office. As near as I can remember it was the summer of 1887 that the people of Corwin decided to send a petition to the post office department at Washington for the establishment of a post office.

In due time the following answer was received from the Department,—If you people will get some one to carry the mail for three months without expense to the Department, we the post office department, will then establish a post office at Corwin, appoint a postmaster and pay for the same.

The department suggested that the people contribute enough money to pay a carrier for three months and it would help by returning all money received at the Corwin office for the sale of money orders during that time.

Mr. Jenkins and another man I cannot now recollect ran the store at Corwin. They called a meeting at their store to discuss the plan and find out who could be induced to carry the mail from Corwin to Hartford two days each week for the three months.

The subscription plan for paying him was adopted. Some signed 25 cents, some 50 cents, some 75 cents and some a dollar. It was expected that the carrier would make a good many dollars for carrying goods from Hartford for the store, and that many people would order goods from Hartford and pay the carrier for delivering them.

It was not expected that the amount collected by the carrier would be big pay but it would be a good part time position and the pay would be certain each week. The question was, who would undertake the task?

Some one suggested Edwin McGowan. I guess they knew I had a good young driving team, a top buggy, lumber wagon, nothing to do and lots of time. Well, they were about right, and that was the reason Edwin McGowan became Corwin's first mail carrier.

I want to explain a little. I was not too lazy to do other work with bigger income, but I was handicapped in a way. Two or three years before this time I was married to Hattie Harvey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Harvey, and my wife had just had a break down in health. Dr. Rose of Decatur diagnosed the case as consumption of the bowels. She was getting weak and unable to work and the doctor ordered absolute rest for her.

I sold our farm to my brother Garfield and we broke up house keeping. My wife went home to her folks and I went to make my home with father and mother in the brick house.

It was then that I had nothing to do and time dragged on my hands. So I accepted the position as mail carrier to pay bills.

Blanch Moffatt, later Mrs. Blanch Drullinger, was the teacher at Corwin when the post office was established there. She bought the first big post office money order. She drove most of the time from her home to the school with a horse and buggy. She decided to get a new buggy and ordered a Cincinnati, one of the best, at a cost of $50 if I recollect right, and paid it with a money order.

I carried the mail for the three months and then the government established a full fledged post office at Corwin and Mr. Steve Zimmerman was made postmaster. He did not stay at the office or hand out any mail as he had a fine farm and home nearby to keep him busy; but he had to sign all papers and documents relating to the office. He drew the pay of postmaster and was under bonds to see that the office was conducted in the proper way.

My wife partially regained her health so I resigned at the end of the three months and we bought a little farm and went to house keeping again.

THE BELLIS FAMILY RECORD

Dowagiac, Feb. 12, 1938.

Mr. Moulton,
Decatur, Mich.
Dear Sir,—

I saw the piece in your issue of February 3 by Earl Tinney of Hamilton about Charlie Bellis, also the piece in your February 10 issue with the information given you by Mr. Barnum. I am Charlie's second cousin and I am familiar with most of his history before he went to California.

In answer to Mr. Tinney: Yes, he is the same Charlie he worked with in the R. O. shop. Charlie was born in a log house between the west end of Christie lake and the Nauvoo school house. His father was Erastus Bellis and his mother was Sarah Burke.

His father and mother separated when he was a small boy and he lived around with different relatives until he was old enough to work for his board. He stayed with his grandmother, Mrs. Uriah Townsend, near the Wall Greenman farm near Christie lake for several years. I believe he attended school at the Nesbitt mill school and also at the Lee school at different times. Later he stayed with the late Dr. Baker, taking care of his horses and the yard while he attended the Decatur school for a year or so.

Later he worked on various farms as a farm hand and came to Dowagiac about 1880 or '81 and worked for Mr. Strowbridge who was a [illegible]

I will gladly verify Earl Tinney's question as to Charlie's work in the Round Oak shops at Dowagiac. He told me he was an apprentice at that time and besides he polished the legs of the stoves, also polished the "Round Oak" sign on the door and we had one with us for a long time, but in moving around it was lost.

Yes, his wife was sick and he said nights he would take her in his arms and walk the floor with her to rest her, for she was so thin.

Charlie always had a sweet memory of her and I have seen him cry many times. Of course Blanche looks like her and that has kept a living memory of her.

I think Charlie has had a hard life. He took it on the chin and got all the happiness out of life he could. His thoughts were always for others. The last words he said when his breath was getting shorter was, "and how are you resting, dear?"

He was a good husband and "dad" and both of us think of so many things we could have done for him. But I wonder if that is human nature. Both of us miss him so much.

Respectfully,
Mrs. Bellis.

P. S.—I think Gene Bellis was a daughter of Alva Bellis (brother of Charlie's father). She died quite young. Chauncey Bellis should know who she was. I wish these questions had been asked before, for Charlie would have enjoyed answering them. I think Charlie left the R. O. shop the fall of 1901 and he and High Steadman and Orrin Olmstead and a bunch of men went to North Dakota to work in the harvest fields, and to get emery dust out of their systems. That fall I met him and we were married December 27, 1903, just 34 years ago.

He enjoyed this Christmas so much and all Christmas cards from friends, especially so the one from Mr. and Mrs. Frank Stapleton which he wanted to answer but his hands were swollen and he was too tired to write.

Mr. Moulton, if you care to print this letter it may be of interest to others and you may arrange it all together, for I have written it as things came to my mind.

If you print it, also Chauncey Bellis' answer will you send me a copy. Mrs. B.

ARBA IS CURIOUS, SO LET'S TELL HIM

Chicago, August 9, 1938.
EPISODE 10

My dear Arba:

Impersonal and far-off incidents, though of great general importance, seldom make lasting impressions on the youth of the land, and I might well include most of the grownups, but some of the things we actually see and hear, though of slight personal importance, are truly unforgettable.

While I have the haziest recollection of the great Chicago fire of my boyhood days, a happening at about that same period is still vividly fresh in memory—in fact unerasable. My brother and I had been sent to the small general store shortly after dark to make a purchase of some minor article for mother, and while we were still there a stranger entered and asked to be shown the best revolver in the store, which was handed him. He inquired if it was always sure-fire, etc. He then asked permission to step out through the back door to try it. Boy-like we followed him out, to our great horror. He first aimed the revolver high in the air, and without saying a word, quickly lowered the muzzle to his right temple and fired, soon filling an unknown's grave.

Another unforgetable boyhood incident occurred about four o'clock one Sunday afternoon, when suddenly the sky darkened, and father and mother barely had time to close the doors and windows and rush three crying children down into the cellar, before the cyclone demolished the Catholic church nearby, carried away part of our barn and did much damage generally. If you survive one cyclone you'll always hope to escape another.

While sitting beneath the shade of the cherry trees in our front yard, I heard a locomotive on an east bound train, which was fast approaching town on the steep down-grade, whistle repeatedly for "brakes," which was before the air-brake had been discovered and trains were not easily or quickly stopped when going at high speed, and shortly I saw the locomotive crash into the caboose of another train and hurl it down a steep embankment a short distance east of the station. 'Twas sort of a pioneer movie thriller.

A quite unusual incident occurred to me while coasting down a very steep hill, when a cow darted out of an alley in front of me and I belly-buster shot between her legs without sustaining a scratch.

These and many other incidents occurred while still awaiting the day when I should say good-bye forever to those happy days of youth.

Of course I did not escape being sent out with a handful of salt to sprinkle on the tails of the snowbirds so I could easily catch them, nor did I learn about Santa Claus and the stork until long after I should have known better. It would seem that the young of today are much "wiser" about certain things than were the boys and girls of my day, but I often wonder if they are any better off due thereto.

However, "The March of Time" gradually added to my youthful knowledge and then came

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

When I was young and still in school,
I had great expectations;
But like some other lads I knew,
I loathed examinations.

A cowboy first I longed to be,
While Jack would be a teacher;
And Dick would be a circus clown,
And Tim would be a preacher.

'Twas Lily White, with big brown eyes,
Who caused most hearts to flutter;
But after years of spinsterhood,
Wed "Red," who e'er did stutter.

While Hazel Jones, with freckles brown,
And hair quite red and fiery;
Turned out to be a little peach,
With beaux to fill her diary.

The boy who would a teacher be,
Is in the circus clowning;
While Dick, who longed to be a clown,
Is now the Bishop Downing.

Instead of preaching day by day,
Tim daily plays the ponies;
While I find time to read and write,
And play poor golf with cronies.

It now seems plain most early dreams
Are due to lack of learning;
For things I longed for in my youth
Long since I ceased all yearning.

FLETCHER CONEY

(It is a pleasure to receive and print this letter from Mrs. Elma Shockley Bagley, and to learn something more definite about one of the first graduates of the Decatur public school. Mrs. Bagley was a graduate of the class of 1877. She has been an invalid and confined to her bed for some time, but her mind is a clear as in the days of her prime. She is at the home of her sister, Mrs. Jont. Goble, on Wheeler street, but will return to her own home on West Delaware street if she can find a woman to be her housekeeper. Mrs. Bagley is one of the oldest living residents of the village and we hope she will write more reminiscences for the Republican.)

Decatur, August 4, 1938.

Friend Arba:—

In a recent issue of the Republican, speaking of the murder of the Kalamazoo druggist you said his wife was a daughter of Fletcher Coney, but as yet you had found no one who remembered Mr. Coney.

Now I distinctly remember him for he, with two other young men, boarded with our folks while attending the Decatur High school. Fletcher was a quiet, inoffensive fellow. He paid his way through school by being janitor for the building.

Then there was a bell in a belfry on the roof. The bell had to be rung three times in the morning and three times at noon, besides ringing to tell the pupils when they could go out for recess and when to come in. The building was heated with wood stoves which had to be looked after quite often.

Wonder when the poor boy got any time to study, but he did, and graduated with the class of 1869.

Our folks moved from Volinia to Decatur into the house where Walter Brown now lives on Wheeler street.

One night we heard sleigh bells going back and forth past the house. They were coming to our house and thought that couldn't be the place because there were so many boys there.

Finally they ventured up closer and peeked into the window and saw our folks sitting there. Then they decided that was the house and rapped, then the boys jumped up and made for the stair door. Only Fletcher was successful, and he, not thinking, pulled the door to, thus leaving the others, Frank Witter and Charlie Fulton, in the lurch. Charlie was right at home because the intruders came from his neighborhood, but Frank had to grin and bear it.

Fletcher had one brother, Charley, and one sister, Clara.

I think the Coneys lived about 1½ miles from the Chadwick mill, when we lived on another road. Saturday I could go to play with Clara for an hour, mother said. I not knowing any better, thought if I ran and got there sooner I could play longer, not knowing that it meant one hour from the time I reached there. We both went to school at the Nauvoo red school house.

After Fletcher was married we lost trace of him, although I heard once he lived at Allegan, and that it was his sister Clara and husband who had the hospital at Allegan.

Elma Bagley.

KEELER HOMESTEAD RECALLS EARLY HISTORY OF VAN BUREN COUNTY

Lone relic of the days when as many as twenty stage coaches daily rumbled over Territorial road through Keeler township, still one of the most scenic highways in all southwestern Michigan, historic Elkhorn Tavern stands on the farm of Supervisor T. J. (Ted) Rosevelt, two and one-half miles east of Keeler village.

It is a tenant house now, its frame of hewn oak timbers standing as plumb and foursquare as when it was erected 102 years ago.

A leanto that formed the tavern kitchen and the dining room where fatigued travelers refreshed themselves has been moved back and is a tool shed now. The old stage barn, where horses weary after the first lap of the stage coach run from St. Joseph were stabled and fresh horses were harnessed for the dash to Paw Paw, is still the horse barn on the Rosevelt place. Both are built of the same heavy timbers, laboriously hewed by hand long before sawmills began eating into Keeler's virgin forests.

The spreading antlers of an elk, which hung above the tavern door as the insignia of Elkhorn Tavern, still repose in the attic of the Rosevelt home.

Many dignitaries of the period passed beneath those elk horns to gain the hospitable shelter of the tavern. Among them was Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, famed in American history as the senatorial and presidential opponent of Abraham Lincoln.

Upon the only occasion that he is known to have been a guest there, Douglas scratched his signature upon a tavern window pane with his diamond ring. For half a century that signature was pointed to as proof that the country's celebrities once traveled by stage coach, but years ago some vandal stole the window pane and the most prized relic of Elkhorn Tavern was lost.

The tavern was built in 1836 by Wolcott H. Keeler, who arrived in Keeler from New York on June 20, 1835. It is conceded that John and James Nesbitt, natives of Ireland, were the first white settlers in Keeler in 1834, but there is an old feud as to whether Keeler or Tobias Byers, a Pennsylvanian, came next. Records in the land office at Bronson (now Kalamazoo) indicate that the honor belonged to Byers by at least a week's margin.

Keeler bought 40 acres of land from the Nesbitts, who had just homesteaded a large tract, for $5 per acre. Going to the Bronson land office he "located" 440 acres more at "10 shillings" per acre.

In 1835 John Allen of Brush Creek (now Lawrence) took a contract for carrying the mails from Lawrence to St. Joseph and established a stage coach route. The stage route, a sandy trail, was then being opened as Territorial Road from St. Joseph to Keeler. Allen built a road from Reynolds' tavern on the east line of Lawrence township near Lake George to Brush Creek and from there to Keeler, meeting the Territorial road blazers from St. Joe near the subsequent site of Elkhorn Tavern.

Taking advantage of the promised development in transportation, Keeler built his tavern. Lafayette township then comprised practically all of Van Buren county. Planning "secession" and the formation of a township of their own, the early settlers of Keeler, Hartford, Lawrence and Hamilton gathered at Keeler's place for a rump "town meetin'." At the conclusion of their deliberations they held a "raisin'" and put up the frame for the tavern.

Their "secession" meeting bore fruit. The following year the legislature divided Lafayette into seven townships, and Keeler and Hamilton were set aside as Covington township.

In 1839 Covington was divided into Hamilton and Keeler townships and Hartford was taken from Lawrence and made a part of Keeler. Twenty-nine men attended the first Keeler town meeting in 1839, and three Hartford men, B. A. Olney, Thomas Conkline and R. B. Everett were elected to town offices. Keeler men elected to other offices were James Hill, first supervisor; E. H. Keeler, Lyman G. Hill, B. F. Chadwick, W. H. Keeler and Tobias Byers. Hartford was set aside from Keeler township in 1840, four years after Elkhorn Tavern was erected.

To Wolcott H. Keeler the tavern was the nucleus around which a village was to be built. He opened a store and platted the present Rosevelt farm into Keelerville—which proved to be only another paper town.

A few bodies were buried in the cemetery plat he set aside, but these were moved a few years later to the present Keeler cemetery when Keeler Center sprang up and proved the more popular town site.

But Landlord Keeler continued to run his tavern and cater to travelers. As many as ten stage coaches each way a day ran over the route and guests were plentiful, while his tavern was one of the most popular on the route.

In 1850 a young man, just 21 and who had come into possession of an inheritance, stopped off a stage coach to spend the night at Elkhorn Tavern. He was John Rosevelt, from New York, en route to Illinois. The young man bore news from the east and he and Keeler spent the night visiting.

By that time the Michigan Central railroad had been extended from Kalamazoo to Niles, and stage coaches and travelers were growing few. Tavern trade was falling off. Young Rosevelt learned that Keeler wanted to sell, and before daylight he used his inheritance to buy Elkhorn Tavern and Keeler's 430 acres of land.

Rosevelt was not interested in tavern keeping. He wanted to farm and began clearing the land, which was among the most fertile in the township and is still rated as one of Keeler's finest farms.

Young Rosevelt endured all the hardships of a pioneer farmer, but by the time the Civil war opened his land was largely under cultivation. Then prices began to soar. Wheat raced up to $3.50 per bushel, and Rosevelt had broad wheat fields.

By the time the post-war boom began to wane John Rosevelt had $20,000 in the bank and all debts paid. In 1888 he set about the building of a house for his family, which was to be the finest roundabout. It was to be of brick and of mansion proportions.

When the house was finished his fortune of $20,000 laboriously accumulated in the greenbacks of that period was gone. It is a family tradition that he never saw $20,000 in surplus funds again.

But the brick house still stands as one of the show places of Keeler, and is known as one of the most hospitable homes in the countryside.

"Ted" Rosevelt, present supervisor of Keeler township, is the third Rosevelt to operate the place. His father, the late Charles Rosevelt, inherited it from his father, John Rosevelt. This youth of 21 with inherited money in his pocket with which he intended to buy a slice of the rich Illinois prairies, but stopped to spend the night at Elkhorn Tavern and remained there for the rest of his life.

The Keelers gradually drifted away from Keeler—but the township continues to bear the name of that hardy adventurer who chose a site on the then new Territorial road stage coach route and built a tavern that still stands.

On June 20, 1935, one hundred years to a day after the arrival of her grandfather, Wolcott H. Keeler, upon the site of what he platted as Keelerville, Mrs. Charles Palmer of St. Charles, Iowa, came to visit the old tavern and the Rosevelt home—a centennial commemoration of the important part her ancestors played in the founding of Keeler.

MATTAWAN WAS VAN BUREN COUNTY'S EARLIEST AND 'WILDEST' RAILROAD TOWN

Early Days of Railroads In Southern Michigan

"RUNNING CARS" PERILOUS WORK IN PIONEER DAYS

"One of the early stations along the Michigan Central was erected at Mattawan in 1847, according to Martin F. Ryan of Marshall, formerly of Mattawan, in "Early Days of Railroading in Southern Michigan."

Recalling that old Mattawan station, which was eventually destroyed by fire about 1896, Mr. Ryan writes:

"A grain elevator was installed in the upper story in 1878 with a long bridge for teams and wagons to reach the upper story from the highway.

"The old station, known in railway vernacular of the time as Ranch No. 10, was a notable school for turning out new telegraph operators. In fact it was designated by the mature and experienced as a 'ham factory.' Looking backward, one finds the names of the agents such as Buck, Eaton, Depue, Oviatt, Payne, and Fitch. Among a few of the operators who graduated we recall the names of Atwater, Frank Fitch, Will Bedell, Labadie, Keen, Tillou, Frank Eaton, M. F. (Jack) Ryan, John Ryan, Edward Bon Foey, John Malloy and Lew Malloy. Most of these have passed on to another life. Mattawan also produced many early trainmen—the Wimples, Reynolds, Roger and Edw. Ryan and many others.

Those early pioneers passed many pleasant hours reveling under the wall of old Charity Hall, later destroyed by fire.

It was in 1844, just three years before the Mattawan station was built, that the railroad was extended as far west as Albion, and on July 4 of that year the first train pulled into that town. Mr. Ryan tells about those early days:

"Old strap rails spiked to pine sleepers lying on cross ties," says Ryan, "brought a pocket edition of the modern locomotive to Albion on that day. The wonderful little engine had a pair of small trucks in front with one driver on each side, and a tender which was just large enough to carry a couple cords of wood and a few barrels of water and had no more wheels than a one-horse wagon.

"Locomotives had real names then—the smaller the locomotive, the bigger or more formidable the name. Albion's pioneer locomotive was the 'Rocky Mountain' and its running mate was the 'Storm.'

"The coming of the locomotive put a stop to the weary journeyings of the pioneer with ox team and lumber wagons through the forest to find a home.

Twelve Miles in Forty Minutes

"A train carrying passengers at tariff rates did not arrive in Marshall until December, 1845. The little locomotive with its suggestive name 'Antelope,' with a train of four cars came to a halt. The locomotive took a big drink and plenty of material to smoke. A few passengers got off; more got on who wanted to take a ride on the first passenger train on the railroad. The trip from Albion to Marshall, a distance of 12 miles, was made in 40 minutes. At that time there was no other known means of transportation by which the trip could be made in less than two hours.

"Traveling over this new and novel railroad was not without its dangers.

For instance, when the spikes which held the strap rails got loose, the end of the rail sprang up and was termed a 'snake head.' These at times sprang through the car floor and injured the passengers, who rode in a car similar to a coal car, with boards across for seats. The passengers were kept busy dodging and putting out sparks from the engine.

"Some of the locomotives did wonderful running in the fifties, especially if they were behind their scheduled running time. George Lattimer with the 'Challenge' went from Albion to Detroit, a distance of 95 miles, in three hundred minutes, stopping at Jackson and Ann Arbor.

Running by Time Card

"At this time the Michigan Central did not use the telegraph to move its trains. All moved by authority of a time card, printed on cardboard. One passenger train each day was the schedule between Detroit and Chicago after the rails had been completed to the latter point. It took a freight train three days to make the run. These trains stopped over night at Marshall and one night at Michigan City, and their running time was 14 miles per hour. In 1869 there were about 80 engineers in active service.

"The Michigan Central roundhouse where engines were stalled and kept in repair, was located at Marshall during the early days of the road, and Marshall was a terminal where trains were made up for local service. A big passenger station was built here in 1854. In addition to the passenger facilities it was equipped with hotel and dining room accommodations, about 40 people being employed.

In 1848 the first telegraph line was established by the Erie & Michigan Telegraph Co. Wells & Co. was the first express company.

The Coming of Emigrants

"Following the completion of the road to Chicago, rapid strides in the settlement of the wilderness through which the rails penetrated were noticeable. At this time emigration from Europe was reaching its height, and train after train of emigrants passed over the road. These emigrants settled along the line of the rails, some obtaining employment with the railroad, others starting small business enterprises and taking up the land. Consequently community centers were soon settled, some of these growing to large cities in the course of time. It was the dream of the builder of the road, one James F. Joy, who visioned a great railway system, centering in Detroit and reaching on one side to Buffalo, on the other to Chicago, thence penetrating the vast productive praries being opened up, that led to the early construction of the line.

The Great Conspiracy

"In 1851 there developed what was known as a great railway conspiracy which caused the railroad no end of trouble. As the strap-rail gave way to the T-rail and the wobbly roadbed was ballasted, undreamed of speeds were attained by the cars, as trains were called in those days. The train whizzed by spots that heretofore had been regarded as stations. Cattle, wandering onto the right-of-way, no longer had time to escape between the screech of the whistle and the arrival of the cars. As the railroad paid better than butcher prices for the animals killed, the accident toll seemed to mount incredibly.

"By 1849 stock killings had reached such proportions that the officials of the road charged the farmers with either driving their cattle on the right-of-way or permitting them to wander there, and an order was issued saying that the company would only pay one-half the appraised value of any animal killed. This order was inflammatory in its effects, arousing much feeling along the line. Passenger trains were fired on in the night, some derailed, wood piles and small way stations burned, and such a reign of terror inaugurated that the company was compelled to run hand cars or pilot engines ahead of every train passing through the disturbed region after dark. Near Kalamazoo, greasing the rails on a sharp grade caused engineers much grief. Finally the nucleus of the first railroad detective system was put at work and on April 19, 1851, warrants were issued for 37 persons. A special train was sent out at night and 36 were arrested and taken to Detroit.

A Trial Lasting 89 Days

"Before Judge Warner Wing there began May 29, 1851, the most famous criminal trial in the history of the state up to that time, and one that in the point of number of witnesses sworn—more than one thousand—constituted a record. Many leading newspapers were represented at the trial and many prominent lawyers employed. Wm. H. Seward, rated one of the foremost criminal lawyers in the country, was employed as chief counsel for the men arrested. The trial lasted 89 days, during which time one man died suddenly in jail. In so far as the fate of the 36 men mentioned in this story is concerned, twelve of the accused were convicted with sentences ranging from five to ten years. All the men were later pardoned when Kinsley S. Bingham acquired the governship in 1855. It was thus that the great railway conspiracy was ended and the officers were able to carry on the work of railroad construction in all its phases, including the expansion of the sidetrack facilities, the building of stations and adequate fencing for the protection of livestock.

"The Michigan Central built its first telegraph line in 1856 under the supervision of D. Wilmot Smith as superintendent and M. D. Woodford as chief dispatcher. This greatly facilitated the handling of the trains at other than the regular time card points, under which the card rules required a train to wait 30 minutes for a delayed train and then flag ahead until the approaching train was located.

"In Marshall there is an historic spot on the station grounds where, under an old elm tree, now gone, the great organizatiaon of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was born."

OIL, OIL, OIL!

Mr. Moulton,—

I see by the papers that they are going to drill again for oil in Allegan, that is west of Allegan.

Well, I and a friend of mine from Kalamazoo had a friend living in Allegan, that is west of Allegan. That was 46 years ago this month, the first year after I came out of the lumber camp. I and my friend from Kalamazoo went down there on a visit to a man by the name of Oosterman, whose farm was just east of the farm where they had been drilling.

This land was I think one or two miles west of Allegan. I know we went up a good sized sand hill before we got there. It was a grand place. Stumps, all pine stumps, miles of them. They didn't have any wire or rail fences then, just pine stump fences, their backs next to the road but piled tight together. They made good fences.

This was on the south side of the road. On the north side next to the road was sandy land also but sloping further north. The land of Mr. Oosterman ran up to the Kalamazoo river. So when we got there we had a good visit.

Mr. Oosterman was one of our good neighbors in the old country. We lived on the same street there, but he came to this country ten years before I did.

The next morning after we got to his farm in Allegan he took us over the place, and going down north from his house we went to the back of his field towards the Kalamazoo river. On the slope a little way from the river stood the old derrick. It looked to me like a windmill but he explained to us that it was a derrick and that they had been drilling there for oil. They had found some but not enough to pay to pump it, so they pulled up and left, and that was 5 or 6 years before we got there.

Now I see by the papers that they are going to drill again a little way from there, and I am glad to hear it.

Our engineers now days have got a different way to bring in the oil. In those days if the oil did not come right away when they got into pay sand they gave up. They put in nitroglycerine and blowed it, but oil men now claim that sometimes that will not work. Now they pour in some acid that eats open the pores and lets in the oil, if there is any at all.

Some one will be drilling here again before long. They got a showing in every well here and some one is going to find the pool. So if you have not the money to put down a well lease your land by all means.

EARLY CORWIN DAYS

By Edwin McGowan.

To the Republican,—

My father and older brother used to cradle and bind wheat for Uncle Sol and Roy Abbott year after year. Uncle lived to be real aged and at the last sort of lost his mind. He would slip away from the house with only his slippers on and wander down the road a mile sometimes before Roy or the neighbors would catch up with him. It would be hard to get him to turn around and go home because he thought he was on his way home.

Wess Abbott owned a big farm and house, and had one daughter, Helen. My father and older brother worked many a day cutting grass with a scythe, and cradling and binding wheat for him.

Ed. Klett is now the owner of that beautiful farm and home. Ed. was my school mate for 4 months when I went to the Keeler school.

I will now tell how near Mr. and Mrs. Wess. Abbott came to being the foster parents of my sister Ida. The Abbotts wished to adopt a little baby as their daughter Helen was now about 20 years old and likely soon to be married and go for herself.

They wanted a baby then to share their joy and happiness, their fine home and fast growing wealth.

My father and mother had a large family and not much of this world's goods besides a log cabin full of kids.

It seems mother had promised Mrs. Abbott she could have a chance to adopt the next baby which she was expecting soon. Mother thought the baby would have a lovely home and parents with means to give it all the opportunities that wealth could give, as they were friends and near neighbors she could see it often.

When the baby arrived mother was paralyzed. She could neither talk, walk nor move her body. Sister Rosetta came home from her place of work and took care of mother and the baby. In a few weeks the baby had wriggled her way into sister Rosetta's heart, and the attachment was so strong it would take an earthquake to shake it loose.

When the baby was a few weeks old Mr. and Mrs. Wess Abbott drove up to our cabin with their nice team and shiny buggy. They had robes, blankets, shawls, a cloak and little dresses and expected to take the baby home with them.

Mother had now changed her mind and did not wish to give the baby away, but she could not talk to say so. She and the family had a code by which she could say yes and no. If she wished to answer yes to a question she could nod her head slightly, if no she could shake her head slightly.

This did not always work for the muscles of mother's neck would sometimes play a trick on her and cause her head to nod when she wanted it to shake.

So when the Abbotts and father and sister Rosetta gathered around mother's bed and asked her if she still wished to give the baby away, the muscles in her neck played the trick by nodding her head for yes instead of shaking it for no. There were smiles of joy in the Abbotts' faces at this, but they were of short duration for sister Rosetta sprang up like a wild cat. She snatched the baby up in her arms and stamped her foot on the floor so hard it caused some of the chinking to fall from between the logs of the cabin, and she said, "You shall not take the baby, I will take care of it and keep it myself."

The Abbotts left without the baby, but they were deeply disappointed and never really got over it, and Rosetta felt they were never quite the same to her.

Guess I was jealous of my baby sister at first. You could hardly blame a baby boy for being jealous after he had been the baby and pet of the family for over two years. And then to make bad matters worse, every time friends or relatives or neighbors came to the log cabin and saw the baby they would throw up their hands and say, "What a sweet, pretty, chubby blond blue-eyed baby," and they would take it up and shower it with kisses.

I knew enough to know that my nose was broken and I was not 'it' any more. I retreated to a corner and pouted and wished those folks that wanted the baby had taken it away. I did not know that boys were not supposed to be pretty and be kissed.

But I soon got over my spell, the baby and I became real pals and continued so even after sister Ida became sweet sixteen. It was then I thanked sister Rosetta for putting her foot down hard and saving her to us.

We passed many happy hours at the organ, playing and singing together, and when there was a party on and I failed to get a girl to go with me, I was sure of sister Ida, and she never failed me. There was no better or sweeter girl in the woods around Corwin, than she.

All for this time.

THIS WEEK

Officer Lou Taylor, under orders of the village council, is doing a good job of marking the village streets. He is using square posts that stand about 4 feet above the ground. They are dipped in creosote, painted white and lettered. It will take about 90 posts to do the job and the total cost will be about a dollar each.

Howard Graham is doing a nice job of lettering. A difference of opinion arose over the correct name of one of the important streets. The letterer made it St. Marys street an old timer said it should be St. Mary street, and our opinion was that the correct name is St. Mary's street.

According to the official map of 1875 it is St. Mary street, according to the official map of 1905 it is St. Marys street.

The street was probably named for Mary, the mother of Jesus, often called the Blessed Virgin Mary or Saint Mary. It is not likely that the name was of Catholic origin as in the early years of the village the Catholic church was located on that street.

"Isn't it strange how princes and kings,
And clowns that gather in sawdust rings,
And Fifth folks like you and me,

Dear Friend Arba,—

We were down to Long Beach about a month ago and spent several days with Mary Dyer Worth, and also called on Conde Upton and his sisters. We decided to issue an invitation to you and Sela to come out to California next summer to visit the Golden Gate Exposition at San Francisco, and also as many Decatur people as you could, so I am writing to you to invite you to come. AN INVITATION (Here is a letter that quite overwhelmed us. We have had a keen desire for years to make the great western trip and our brother Will in Seattle has given us a standing invitation to see his part of the Pacific coast, but here is something definite as to time and place in California and among friends that date back to the days when we first toddled to school and Ida Trowbridge, our kindergarten teacher, lifted us into our seats.

Somewhere among our souvenirs there is a picture of the pupils of that room. It was taken so long ago that our teacher, even in her angel form, would frown if we should tell the date. Miss Trowbridge stood at the side and the four small boys named in the letter following: Leslie, Conde, Sela and ourself, composed the front row. Now two of us are here and two in southern California, and the invitation is out for us all to be together again next year.

Sela has already begun working out the route and by the time winter sets in he will have every town, every stopping place, every scenic attraction and every detour along the route of the long highway set down on paper. Yes, and he will have a complete schedule of each day's travel which we will keep to the number now and the cause of [illegible] but all continues to go well with the four of us a great reunion may be held under one of [illegible] trees of the Yosemite Valley next summer. We thank you, Leslie, and your sister for such a good one that we cannot refrain from passing it on to all of our friends.)

Railroad History

When the End of the Road Was at Ypsilanti

The Republican Is Indebted to W. H. Howland for This Story of a Century and a Year Ago. His Letter of Explanation Follows:

Jackson, Michigan.

Dear Arba:

I copied this story of the first passenger train west out of Detroit from an Ypsilanti paper. I neglected to get the name and date of issue, but I can get it.

I copied it one year ago, the date of the first train from Detroit to Ypsilanti was February 3, 1838.

And the first train to arrive at Kalamazoo was Sunday 10:30 a. m., February 1, 1846. Over the old strap rail, the name of the engineer was Chester Danforth and the name of the engine was St. Joseph.

Mr. Danforth was born in Vermont August 22, 1822, and came to Michigan with his parents in 1834, settling at Detroit. Later he became an engineer on the road, and was on board the first train ever entering Chicago over that line. He died November 7, 1907. His wife died in 1903. In 1875 he was running the Shiawassee No. 155 on the Saginaw division.

If you can make a story out of the whole thing combined, all well and good, but if there is anything you do not understand lay the papers to one side and the first time I am in town I'll call. W. H. Howland.

(Later)

Mr. Chester Danforth was in no way connected with the first train.

One hundred years ago Ypsilanti was in the public eye and the public prints. Local and national history was being made here. The first train ever to run into the city was making its initial trip February 3, 1838, over the state-owned railroad. Incidentally, it was the longest run to date ever made by a train in Michigan and marked Ypsilanti as the most remote rail terminus in the state. Ypsilanti is doing little today to commemorate the centennial of that epoch-making event, except to note the anniversary. But on February 3, 1838, according to existing reasonably abundant and likely reliable accounts of the event, Ypsilanti was in considerable of a modern dither over the affair. Days had been given to preparing for the occasion, a public holiday had been declared, and all state officials and the state's leading personages had been invited to participate or attend. A public feast, and rumor has it, abundant other refreshments, were ready to welcome and warm the hardy souls who dared that adventure of a 30 mile trip from Detroit.

Heroic Efforts Back of Event

Back of the arrival of Ypsilanti's first train were the heroic attempts of Michigan pioneers to make their state the equal of the world in transportation matters; some of the first failures of private railroad enterprise and history's first instance of government ownership of railroads. Trains had been operating for several years in Michigan and other railroad lines were either functioning or soon to be operating when Ypsilanti heard its first railroad locomotive whistle.

Five railroads were in existence or in prospect—the Erie and Kalamazoo had been operating since November 2, 1836, when it ran its first train, a horse-drawn affair, from Toledo to Adrian, and in the summer of 1837 put into service the first locomotive west of the Allegheny mountains. It was this line that gave Michigan the distinction of possessing the first railroad west of the Atlantic sea coast. Previously, in 1833, the Detroit & Pontiac railroad had received the first railroad charter in Michigan, but had not yet begun construction. The Detroit & St. Joseph had built tracks from Detroit to Dearbornville, now Dearborn, as the first steps of its ambitious dream to have its western terminus at St. Joseph on Lake Michigan, and was preparing to extend its line to Ypsilanti. Daily train service to Dearborn was already in prospect. Financial and other difficulties, however, were making the progress of this road so unsatisfactory and defering activities on other ambitious railroad dreams that public clamor and civic ambition thrust the state under Stephen T. Mason, its first governor, into the most ambitious of public ownership enterprises of contemporary times, since becoming known as a program of internal improvements. This called for the construction of three railroads and the digging of canals that were to criss-cross the state. The three railroads were to be known as the Northern, running from what is now Port Huron to the navigable waters of the Grand river, somewhere between Grand Rapids and Holland; the Central, which involved the purchase of the existing Detroit & St. Joheph, running from Detroit to the mouth of the St. Joseph river, and the Southern, commencing from the mouth of the River Raisin, near Monroe, to New Buffalo in Berrien county, south of Benton Harbor, Progress was greatest on the Central route, being the work under process of construction by the Detroit & St. Joseph company and the greater portion of the state's energy was centered upon this road.

Had Right of Way Through Forest

When the state took over the Detroit & St. Joseph the company had a right of way 100 feet wide cleared through the forest as far as Ypsilanti, and from Detroit, westward approximately 13 miles of roadbed graded after the fashion of railroads of the period. By January 1, 1838, the work had progressed to the point that a depot had been established on the Campus Martius, in Detroit, on the site of the present Detroit City hall. Cars were running regularly to Dearborn and Ypsilanti had been promised service early in February. When the line finally did reach Ypsilanti, at Honey Creek, it represented a total expenditure of $298,056.23. Out of Detroit the railroad ran along what is now Michigan avenue in the city. Outside the city and more grenerally between Dearborn and Ypsilanti, the builders, because of the damp springy nature of the terrain they had to traverse, ran into construction difficulties. Surmounting them involved a novel plan of construction, known to them as the "block system." It would hardly be adaptable to the uses of modern railroads with their fast, heavy trains, but it was considered an engineering achievement and was copied throughout the country. Construction of the Central line, histories indicate, became the great project of the period, and the men prosecuting it appear to have been efficient, aggressive and thorough. To be ready for the inauguration of traffic, they had purchased in Troy, N. Y., two passenger coaches not unlike the old stage coaches, and each carrying 24 passengers. These reached Detroit just before the close of navigation and were transferred to the state's railway yard near the capitol in Detroit, (the present Capitol park, formed by the junction of Griswold and Shelby streets), and the public awaited the days when they might enjoy the luxury of travel the coaches seemed to promise. But anticipation changed to disappointment when the sheriff of Monroe, armed with a writ of replevin, seized the cars requested by the Riven Raisin & Lake Erie Railroad Co., who made claim that they had been first purchased by that company and privately marked for it before the sale to the state. What ever the result of the legal proceedings, the cars were lost for the opening of the road; but undaunted the authorities soon had John G. Hays, a Detroit craftsman, at work on a new car which was soon completed. The car was christened the "Governor Mason," had a capacity of 36 persons, and in elegance and equipment apparently equaled those seized by the Monroe sheriff.

First Passenger Train Makes Trip

On Saturday, February 3, 1838, the first passenger train made its initial trip from Detroit to Ypsilanti. It was an event of more than ordinary importance, and as stated, was celebrated with befitting pomp and ceremony. On the morning of the day most of Detroit's population turned out to witness the train's departure. It consisted of the crude little locomotive, with the cord wood piled high upon the tender; the "Governor Mason," then three cars of lesser elegance and three rough cars that had been improvised for the occasion.The governor and state officers were granted the distinguished honor pf passage at the head of the train, after them the members of the legislature, then the Brady Guards, for years Michigan's most famous and georgeous military organization, and distinguished citizens. The only existing description of the locomotive is that its whistle made a sound that was "about halfway between a grunt and a groan."

Three Hours Needed for First Journey

Three hours later the train clugged into Ypsilanti, through it was the boast of the newspapers afterwards that the train was capable of the astounding speed of 15 miles per hour. At Ypsilanti every inhabitant and his brother appeared to have been on hand, and settlers from distant points had driven in to see the modern miracle; and to join in the hearty and perhaps boisterous welcome. It seems to have been an unstinted one. One account of the trip and arrival is given by Alpheus Felch, evidently at that time connected with the railroad enterprise, and later a member of the internal improvements commission, governor and United States Senator. In his account of the journey he recorded that the party "proceeded to Ypsilanti very pleasantly and with little or no interruptions and were received by the citizens of that place with liberal and gratifying hospitality. A public entertainment had been provided and the company sat down to it in right good earnest after their long and chilly ride. After dispatching a hearty and substantial repast, (other records describe it as a dinner for several hundred persons), interchanging kind words and feeling with the citizens and examining the novelties and beauties of the town, the company started upon their return."

Address Peak of Welcome

The peak of the Ypsilanti welcome, aside from the dinner, appears to have been the address by General Van Fossen, who seems to have been a successful promoter not many years removed from the east and already apparenty an outstanding Ypsilantian, and who in 1841 was appointed to the Internal Improvements Commission. After his address he presented an engrossed copy of it to Governor Mason. The manuscript is still in existance. It is owned by Charles T. Hemans of Lansing, regent of the University of Michigan. It is phrased in the exuberant style of the old days, and General Van Fossen, to describe it in 1938 language "went to town" in his remarks. "In viewing the commodious train of cars now before us," he said at one point, "we read the high destiny to which the enterprise of our citizens will conduct us."

Frequent Stops on Return Trip

The return journey was not as successful as the outbound one. It began near mid-afternoon and about midway to Dearborn the "mechanism of the locomotive," as Governor Felch describes it, began to act up, "causing frequent stops. Before that we had been rolling along very comfortably. Then at Dearbornville there came a dead halt." It seems that the boiler sprung a leak. "The engine," according to the Detroit Daily Advertiser of February 6, 1838, "flatly refused all further service for that night. Neither persuasion, coaxing nor coercion could urge forward another inch that most intractible and asinine locomotive. It was left to digest its obstinancy in its own way. Horses were procured, but these stumbled and blundered about the holes and precipices till they well nigh overset the cars. However, no hurt was done, all was at length righted and horses, cars and cargo proceeded on "their way rejoicing." Without further accident, but somewhat late in the evening, the company once more reached their beloved city of Detroit, to the unspeakable joy of wives, children and friends, benumbed with cold yet burning with glory.

Judging from other accounts of the return journey, Governor Felch forgot to record for posterity the fact that some of the adventurers either lost or became disgusted with train-riding and walked to Detroit arriving there in the small morning hours, while the Detroit Advertiser evidently thought it expedient to overlook the hilarious condition of the returning travelers, who had enthusiastically sampled the liquid portions of the Ypsilanti welcoming.

First Passenger Train Out of Detroit February 3, 1838

Ypsilanti was the terminus of the Central for another year when the line reached Ann Arbor in 1839 and, thereafter, Jackson in 1841; Albion in July, 1844, Marshall in August, 1844; Kalamazoo in February, 1846, and in 1855, Chicago.

Four Trips Made in Day

A week after the first train run to Ypsilanti the Detroit Advertiser in its February 13 edition reports that "the cars on the railroad made four trips on Saturday (Feb. 10), between Detroit and Ypsilanti. The space traveled over would make about 120 miles. None but those who have experienced the delays and vexations of the old mode of conveyance can realize the advantages of the new. In the same issue, the railroad advertised that "Notice is hereby given that the railroad cars will leave this city for Ypsilanti at half past 9 o'clock a. m., each day, unless otherwise directed. Passengers are accommodated with cars of a convenient and highly approved construction, propelled by powerful locomotives, Emigrant wagons and freight, merchandise, produce, etc., are transported at lowest rates. Average running time to Ypsilanti about two hours."

By mid-summer of 1838 the railroad evidently was doing good business, as it reported that its rolling stock now consisted of four locomotives, five passenger cars and ten small freight cars, and in the first two years of its operations, according to the general superintendent's annual report of 1849, its annual receipts for ("First passenger train run out of Detroit February 3, 1838, over the Michigan Central railroad, Detroit to Ypsilanti) sources in operating between Detroit and Ypsilanti were $80,000 per year while the expenses during the period were $44,451

"Since the cars commenced running on the Detroit & St. Joseph railroad from Detroit to Ypsilanti, February 3, 1838, to February 25, 1838, the receipts for tolls have averaged $1,000 a week."

Detroit, February 26, 1838.

The City Council adopted a report giving the state permission to construct tracks from the depot at Campus Martius down Woodward avenue to the river, providing no cost shall accrue to the city.

March 12, 1839.

A splendid line of daily post coaches is now running in connection with the Central Railroad from Ypsilanti direct to Chicago. The proprietors flatter themselves that better coaches or better horses cannot be found on any other road of the same extent in the United States. None but civil, sober and experienced drivers are countenanced.

100 years ago, April 16, 1838, receipts from tolls on the Detroit and Ypsilanti Railroad on Thursday amounted to $400 (four hundred dollars).

Early Days of Railroading in Southwestern Michigan

Old Letter Discloses Reasons Why St. Joseph Never Became the Western Terminus of the Michigan Central.

By Dana P. Smith, in Lawton Leader.

In 1837 Michigan was a young and growing territory with Stevens T. Mason the "Boy Governor" at its head. Those were the boom days and from governor down, the people were filled with an enthusiasm to boom Michigan which nothing could discourage. The first venture was to build three railroads about 50 miles apart from Detroit to Lake Michigan. These railroads were not to have or allow any connections with out-state roads, but were intended wholly for the use and benefit of the people of the state. Michigan was almost a wilderness, but the lack of paying traffic did not deter the boomers, as they figured that the increase of paying traffic would keep pace with the building of the railroad.

To build the proposed railroads the legislature authorized a loan of $5,000,000. Bonds were issued secured by a mortgage upon the resources of the Territory, and were sold to the Morris Canal and Banking Co. of New Jersey for which the Territory never realized more than $2,200,000; but the territory paid the full $5,000,000 in bonds in the end.

The Michigan Central was chartered in 1832 as a territorial project and construction started. By November, 1832, the right of way had been grubbed as far as Ypsilanti and graded as far as where Dearborn now is, about 10 miles. In January, 1838, the road was in operation as far as Dearborn. On Feb. 3, 1839, the first passenger train was run into Ypsilanti. The sincle coach was built in Detroit and named "The Governor Mason." In 1839 the first train arrived in Ann Arbor, and it was not until 1846 that the railroad was built into Kalamazoo.

In the year 1846 the state treasury became empty, the state's credit was gone and the railroad had been so poorly constructed that it was falling to pieces. There was nothing that the state could do but get out of he railroad business. The railroad was accordingly offered for sale.

In New York state, John W. Brooks, a civil engineer who was superintendent of the Syracuse and Rochester railroad (now the Auburn division of the New York Central) heard of the opportunity to purchase the Michigan Central and came to Detroit to investigate. He made a trip over the line to Kalamazoo and returned to Boston where he enlisted capital to purchase the road. He soon came back to Detroit and began negotiations.

The legislature tried to load down the charter to the new owners with all kinds of unreasonable amendments only one of which will serve as a sample of the others. It was that there were never to be any Sunday trains run on the road and that the board of directors must all go to church twice on Sunday.

Finally a deal was consummated at a price of $2,000,000 for what had cost the state $5,000,000, plus interest. For this sum of money the new owners got the 145 miles of track between Detroit and Kalamazoo on which at that time there were but four passenger stations. The cars and engines at that time were valued at $68,000, the largest single item of which was a 12-ton locomotive valued at $4,000. This whole lot of equipment was only about half as valuable as one modern locomotive. Locomotives of those days were feeble affairs, some having only one drive wheel on a side making them very "slippery" in starting a load.

The 145 miles of track was badly laid. From Detroit to Ypsilanti the track was 6 inch square timbers on which strap iron ½ inch thick and 2½ inches wide was spiked. This had been in use eight years and was in bad shape. All of it had to be relaid with T-rails weighing 60 pounds per yard. More locomotives and cars were needed and all of this put a severe financial strain upon the new company.

John M. Forbes was president of the company and Geo. B. Upton, treasurer. Mr. Forbes was a very able financier and had great influence with men of capital, and so was able to keep pace with the growing demands for money to improve the railroad. On Civil Engineer John W. Brooks was laid the responsibility of operating and extending the road, as he was the only experienced railroad man available. Next to improving the track and rolling stock he devoted his attention to extending the line west from Kalamazoo.

The first cars were made in Detroit as there was no railroad connection with the east. The first passenger cars were about 20 feet long with a row of seats along each side facing in and a row of seats along the center, back to back facing out. At first trains were run each way from Detroit and Kalamazoo, starting in the morning. Running at night was looked upon as dangerous.

Much could be written about the history of the railroad between Detroit and Kalamazoo, but space will not permit in this article so we will move along to the extension of the road west of Kalamazoo.

Under the terms by which the company purchased the railroad from the state they were obliged to complete the road to Lake Michigan within three years or pay a forfeit of $25,000 for each year of delay. The charter did not specify at what point on Lake Michigan that they should make their terminal, but it was understood to be St. Joseph, as it was the only good port available at that time and already had a small settlement on the bluff. Then the possibility of an extension south into Indiana or west around the south end of the lake was something to think of. During the last part of 1846 and the first of 1847 Engineer Brooks was busy surveying the line through to St. Joseph and constructing the line west from Kalamazoo.

The towns between Kalamazoo and Niles had not yet come into being. Paw Paw was a hustling pioneer village in the woods and aside from a few lone wayside taverns marked the only settlement on the proposed line. The surveyed line passed through Paw Paw one block south of the present court house, and on west on a generally direct line to St. Joseph. While working west from Paw Paw one of the surveying parties boarded at Wm. Lee's home about three miles southwest of town.

In the meantime grading and track construction was going briskly forward out of Kalamazoo. Modern grading machinery had not come into use earth moving was done with slip scrapers and wheelbarrows. The wheelbarrow work was mostly done by Irishmen lately come to this country. For these hardy men wheelbarrow work was not hard and so expert were they that they could wheel a load of dirt along a single plank trestle 20 feet from the ground without any trouble. East of Mattawan on the old road bed is the remains of one of their camp villages where in the evenings after work the Irish graders held high shindy with their countrymen, in which play with the stick was prominent. Irishmen would fight each other, but no one else could unless he wanted to fight them all.

The spring of 1847 came and with the warm weather rapid progress was made in constructing the railroad westward. The grade was nearly to the Kalamazoo-Van Buren county line. The big cuts east were rapidly being conquered and once out of these, rapid progress would be made across the level country to Paw Paw, which town was already feeling the stimulus to business through having a railroad, and before many weeks they expected to have connections by train with Detroit. Up to the middle of May they had every reason to expect that their dreams would come true. As far as any one knew at that time the railroad would go to Paw Paw and St. Joseph. Little did they know that thirty days would change the whole prospects for the settlement of southwestern Michigan.

A story has been handed down the years that certain prominent men in Paw Paw like I. W. Willard, Peter Gremps, Dr. Andrews and others were to blame for diverting the railroad away from Paw Paw but such is not the case. There are no facts to show that these men or any one in Paw Paw did anything to hinder the railroad in any way. The diversion rested upon an entirely different foundation which the following facts will show.

In May of 1847 President Forbes and his financial backers decided to make a trip to Michigan and see the railroad that they had bought and also look into the matter of extending it west from Kalamazoo. They arrived in Detroit late in May to determine what was needed to put the railroad from Detroit to Kalamazoo in condition and to assure themselves that the extension west was wisely planned. In order to give an idea of the reaction of these business men to the things they saw on their trip west to Chicago, part of a letter written by President Forbes on their return to Detroit, is quoted.

June 11, 1847

"We reached Detroit at 1:30 in the night, and landed in the mud; slept an hour or two and had to get up and go to find T. Howe; Brooks, our mainstay, having gone west. We decided to follow and started at eight or so on our own railroad.

"For the first few miles the country was dreary; flat with a good deal of surface water, through forests mostly, but dense and melancholy ones, water under foot and huge decaying trees lying about; the trees generally tall and with no foliage except near the top.

"We found the railroad in a most deplorable condition, the iron broken up often into pieces not a foot long and sometimes only wood for spaces of several feet. In other places short pieces of iron almost athwart-ship, but our protection was in its being so short that no snakeheads could reach the cars. This bad road lasted about 80 miles, the bad country about 30, when we came to a little drier soil and passed through several flourishing villages. Here we began to see the famous oak openings — noble trees just far enough apart to let each take its handsome natural shape, just as a park should be; but sad to tell we seldom saw the openings in their beauty for the trees had generally been girdled and stood naked and dead (some of them dying, having been girdled this year), and fine fields of wheat growing right up to their trunks and fields varying from 20 to 200 acres each; but few flowers to be seen, and the houses far from our New England houses in neatness. At night we reached a dirty tavern at Kalamazoo where the road terminated.

"At Kalamazoo we learned that Brooks had gone to Niles and we resolved to follow him. Arranged to start in a barouch with four horses at 4 a. m. We sat up until 11:30 talking with our engineers whom we sent to get information about our routes, and then turned in. In an hour Brooks arrived and came to my room and after an hour's talk we decided to take him with us and push for the celebrated city of St. Joseph, 56 miles distant. The roads were execrable, full of deep holes and gullies where we had a right to expect a capsize, but the weather was lovely beyond measure and on the whole we enjoyed our drive excepting that, not daring to drink the water, our tongues were parched like fever patients.

"At four o'clock we reached the marsh which surrounds St. Joseph. Figure to yourself a pestilential black mud, quivering and shaking under its own weight, with tufts of grass, rank and uneven, a deep river in the midst and sand banks where the mud ceases. Running up from this was a steep but small bluff extending into the lake, on which the city stands. Two handsome houses built in 1837 and I believe now empty, two large wooden taverns, one now untenanted, and a few other indifferent looking places and some stray houses along the river, complete the picture of this famous city, which had sprung up in a night and withered next day. The only pleasant thing was the view of Lake Michigan, blue like the ocean, and wide.

"We started out to make our observations accompanied by pretty much the whole town, some half dozen people, who took care we should not be alone a moment for fear we should not appreciate fully the beauties of the place. We went over to Uncle Sam Russel's Eden which has a fine map of land laid out into cities and is called North St. Joseph (now Benton Harbor). Nothing would induce me to visit this place again unless I could carry Mr. Russell with me and witness his first interview with his domain.

"We left St. Joseph next morning for Niles—26 miles—and arrived there to dinner. The country dull for 12 miles and then tolerable. Monday morning at 7 we started along the lake shore for Michigan City; a beautiful day, the lake just like the ocean, plenty of deer tracks. Got there at 11 and examined the harbor to our satisfaction and at 2 p. m. embarked on the steamer for Chicago taking leave of Brooks who returned to Detroit. Found Mr. Ogden [Wm. B. Ogden, first mayor of Chicago] on board, a very agreeable man who came to Chicago 12 years ago when it was a wilderness, and now there are 15,000 to 20,000 people there. Arrived at Chicago at 5 p. m.—hotter than Tophet. Established ourselves in an immense hotel and, the pangs of thirst being unbearable, we here broke into lake water astonishingly and happily without bad effects. Mr. Ogden came for us in his carryall and took us to drive about the town. Some of the houses are on the bluff looking out upon the blue lake and it was lovely at sunset beyond imagination."

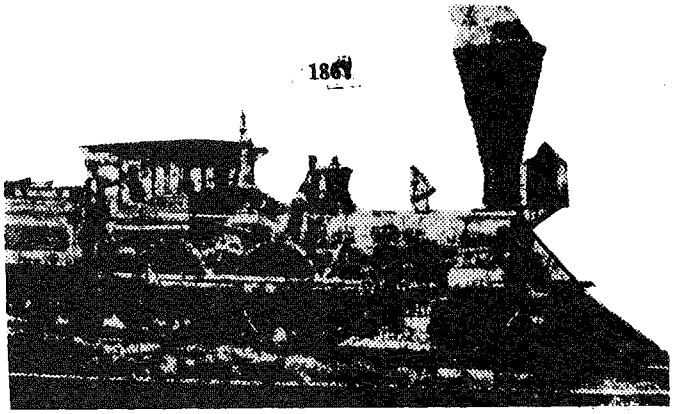
The railroad magnates had no desire to repeat their strenuous trip back across the state so they took a steamboat back to Detroit around the lakes. Once here they reviwed their impressions of the investigation of the extension west and concluded about as follows: That St. Joseph as a terminal for a railroad across the state was entirely unsuitable for the following reasons. First the surroundings of the town were unsuitable for a large terminal yard. Benton Harbor did not exist. The St. Joseph river curved around the bluff south and entered the lake a little south of where Silver Beach is now and was made dangerous in rough weather by shifting sand bars in the mouth of the river and about it. The town at that time was insignificant and taken altogether their opinion of the place was very unfavorable.

Second if the road terminated at St. Joseph all freight and passenger traffic would have to be transferred to steamboats and in bad weather or in the winter would be subject to ruinous delays as well as expense in handling freight. They resolved to look further. At Chicago they had found a booming, growing city already the metropolis of the west but smaller than Detroit, having a population of more than 10,000. They liked its situation beside the blue water of Lake Michigan. They admired the business enterprise of its citizens. Their trip around the lakes had convinced them that they had nothing to fear from lake shipping as the distance was too great to compete with their railroad. Surely Chicago was the place to terminate their railroad and the decision was so made.

Mayor Odgen of Chicago had showed them ever attention and encouragement even offering to sell them land for a terminal for $1.25 per acre, which they refused and regretted it afterward as they never again were able to secure a terminal on their own land in Chicago.

As soon as the decision to terminate the railroad in Chicago was made, orders were issued accordingly. Engineer-Superintendent Brooks called his surveyors off the Kalamazoo-Paw Paw-St. Joseph line back to where Mattawan is now and started the survey of the new line. They deflected the line to the left and curved around the hill where the old depot stood, thence on a nearly direct line for Niles. Construction followed the survey and Paw Paw was left four miles to the north of the line of the railroad and St. Joseph alone and lonely on its bluff beside the big blue water.



DISMANTLING OF A RAILWAY PIONEER STATION

By Martin F. Ryan.

The Edwards Lumber Company of Battle Creek are at the present time dismantling the Marshall passenger station. The whole structure with the exception of the extreme east end is in the process of dismantling, with salvage of virgin white pine including huge timbers, siding, etc., being carefully separated and piled up in individual allotments, and in this connection many people are coming from distant points to purchase the almost extinct white pine of the pioneer days.

The east end of the station will be preserved and remodeled for the use of a passenger station and a ticket and telegraph office. This section will be lowered considerably from its present height and when finished will present a very attractive appearance as a modern railway station.

The old station was erected in 1860 on the south side of the present railroad tracks but later was moved to its present location. At the time of its moving the modern facilities for moving huge and rambling structures of this kind had not reached that perfection that prevails today, and in this connection it is notable to observe that the contractor who took the job actually went broke before he had finished it, and it was then that the president of the road, at that time Mr. H. B. Ledyard, engaged the services of a contractor in Detroit, and he finished the job.

When the structure was built in 1864 it was a combination hotel and passenger station. A three-story structure with spacious bed rooms for guests, private parlors luxuriously furnished in the styles of those railway pioneer days, dining and lunch rooms decorated in the height of fashion, a passenger waiting room for women, and another for men, telegraph office, ticket office, cigar and tobacco rooms, etc.

Overlooking the high structure was a tower, resembling the ancient towers of early Europe. In its halcyon days the Marshall station was the center of great activity with passenger trains arriving and departing, travelers thronging the waiting rooms and the dining parlors, and it was not unusual for travelers who desired to stay over night to be turned away because of lack of rooms.

In those days there was a constant trek of travelers westward bound to extend America's frontiers and the Marshall station, being approximately half way between Detroit and Chicago, was used as a stopping over place for the.

During the summer months many people from the south came to Marshall and made their home at the station for vacation periods. The numerous surrounding lakes teeming with the bluegills, bass and perch afforded excellent fishing for sportsmen. The surrounding forests of white pine, oak, beech and maple afforded the vacationists all the thrills of the big woods.

In the winter months the station was the social center for the elite of the state of Michigan. It was at the station that the fashionable crowd gathered to dance the cotillion and waltz in the spacious dining hall which was cleared for such occasions.

They came in sleighs and cutters, trains and stage coaches from points as far distant as Detroit, Lansing, Michigan City and Toledo. Elegant ladies adorned in stylish bustles, with sparkling diamonds and rustling silks, danced with pioneer men noted for their long sideburns and handle-bar mustaches.

The registers kept at the time disclose the names of many prominent national figures in the field of politics and finance, who stayed at the Marshall station as guests.

During the 80's the emigration from Europe was at flood tide. The people of distressed countries were hearing of a new world in America where there was adventure and opportunities for all. Large numbers of emigrants came from Ireland, Germany, Holland and Great Britain.

Train after train of emigrants passed through Marshall, and as all trains stopped there for lunch, the sight of those weary emigrants was a source of wonder and amusement to the boys and girls of the village, who invariably gathered in numbers to watch the trains.

The writer has in his files a letter written by one young villager to another wherein he relates that while waiting at the station one day, three emigrant trains arrived. One of these trains was filled with Dutch Hollanders on their way to the west. The day being hot, the wood coach windows were all open and the Dutchmeh had their heads protruding from the window openings, with long circular pipes in their mouths.

This mischievous young man relates with glee how he ran alongside the coaches and snatched five pipes from the mouths of the startled emigrants. In those days pipes were scarce, and while youngsters of the village were undoubtedly having a fine time, certainly those weary travelers who lost their pipes must have suffered great anguish, as no pipe procured in the new land could replace the one that came from the land of their birth.

Tragedies

The history of the Marshall station is interwoven with romance, pathos and tragedy. There was the incident of the train that arrived at the station with travelers hurrying to the lunch counter, and when the train departed there was discovered a lovely baby girl on the counter, evidently abandoned by some unfortunate mother. The baby was adopted by a family in the village, grew up, married and finally settled in Texas.

Another episode was that of a traveler who through sorrow took upon himself the task of ending his own life by stripping a bed sheet and hanging himself from a rafter in a third story bed room.

And then there was the episode that marked the murder of Byron Sibley in the '80's. Sibley was a native of the village. The Sibleys circulated in the most exclusive of social circles. Byron, following graduation from school entered the local telegraph office at the station as a student, and in the course of a year had mastered the Morse code, and was accepted as an employe of the Michigan Central. Eventually he received the appointment as regular night operator at the Marshall station.

Sibley was a dapper dresser and with his natural pleasing manners became a Beau Brummel of the social set. It was one fatal evening that Sibley left the Tontine hotel, now named the Marshall Tavern, to assume his duties at the telegraph office at 7:00 p. m., and it was about 8:00 p. m. that he was excused from duty for 30 minutes by the train dispatcher.

It was shortly after midnight that his lifeless body was discovered on the east side of South Marshall avenue, across from the old John Adams foundry, having met death by a bullet fired from a concealed spot while Sibley was walking along the street.

Famous Visitors

Many celebrities stopped off for lunch or stayed over night at the station. Included among them were Gen. U. S. Grant and family on October 19, 1875, and P. T. Barnum, the great show man, July 6, 1875. An old register of the period discloses that many registered under false names. There is a Don Quixote of London, England, and a Chas. Ross of Denver, Colo. Also there were many Spinners registered and they usually gave their address as Spinnerville, one state or another.

The station in the 60's was the terminal where stage coaches came to pick up passengers. The stage coaches had horns which were blown when they came within a half mile of Marshall so preparations could be made to take care of their horses. The owner of th stage coach line was David Hendry, who came to Marshall in 1847 from Vermont. His first business venture was a freight line from Detroit to Marshall with four horse teams. In operating the stage coach line he used 60 horses, the coaches stopping at Bellevue, Olivet, Hastings, Charoltte, Coldwater and Union City.

For a time the Michigan Central Railway grounds served as a farmers' market, where stove wood from the surrounding forests, vegetables, fruit, etc., was hauled in by wagon.

With the advent of the Wagner and Pullman sleeping cars and the dining cars, the activities of the tavern features of the old station began to wane, until later they vanished entirely.

Up to the time a couple weeks ago that the contractors began dismantling the old station its outward appearance remained the same as in former years, but within, only memories remain of the once resplendant interior. The upstairs private parlors, family rooms and bed rooms, where once the throngs of travelers circulated up and down its three stories of rooms,, there now reigns a mournful silence.

Union Organized

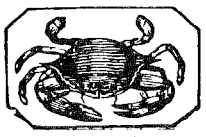
While the old station and its personal history goes back into the twilight of railroad and stage coach history, it also is related to a national historic event, for it was here 76 years ago that the American labor union movement was born. Seventy-six years ago there stood two giant elm trees on the station grounds like sentinels to an unforgetable past, and it was here under those elms that the Brotherhood of the Footboard was organized by a dozen locomotive engineers, which later became the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Today the only thought of that historic meeting occurs when Jackson Division No. 2 opens with a master gavel carved from one of the old elms.

The gavel in Engineers' hall at Jackson is mute and reveals nothing of its historic past. It was June 1, 1863, that 12 men meeting under the elms planted the seed for the conservative and potent organization that spreads over the Americas today.

There are a couple of women who worked at the station still living in Marshall who served in the tavern department when young girls. Thus it is fair to assume that their innermost thoughts could be well expressed in the words of the poet, Thomas Moore:

"When I remember all
The friends so linked together
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted;
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed,
Thus in the stilly night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me."



THE DECATUR WATER WORKS

Built in 1895 It Has Paid Good Dividends to the Village. Jarious Halleck Has Been Employed in the Plant 36 Years.

The best paying institution of the village of Decatur is the municipal water works. Outside of taxes which are paid in cold cash by the owners of property it is the village's only source of revenue.

Jarious Halleck has been manager of the water works 27 years.

Jarious Halleck has been connected with the plant almost from the start. He began work there in 1902 and has been manager since 1922.

The water works plant was installed in 1895. James Pearl of Benton Harbor built it, furnished everything including pipe for Main street and two blocks on each side, and across on the south side, for $18,000. The job could not be duplicated today for $50,000. One dollar a day was then considered good wages for labor.

The big fire that burned the Duncombe House and 14 other buildings occurred in March, 1895, when the water pipe was lying on the ground beside the trenches.

The firemen from Dowagiac came here with their engine but could not accomplish much. They pumped the big cistern at the foot of Main street dry in no time at all. It was the last big fire of the bucket brigade. The cistern still exists under the pavement, but it is used only as a catch basin to drain the street.

The water works plant was completed and officially turned over to the village on the first day of September, 1895, and one of Decatur's biggest celebrations was the gala day on September 2nd.

The day was celebrated with a baseball game, dances, sports of various kind and contests, and closed with a big display of fireworks shot from the top of the standpipe. The fire in the spring was for the time being forgotten, an immense crowd from the village and surrounding country joined in the celebration. It marked the beginning of a new and bigger era for Decatur. Three years later the municipal electric light plant was built, but that is another story.

Jack Johnson was the first manager of the plant and he had no assistant. There were no meters and every water taker was on a flat rate of six dollars a year. There were about fifty takers that first year.

Sprinkling Hours

Jack started up the pumps at six o"clock in the morning and blew the whistle to notify the takers that they could begin sprinkling. Then he blew the whistle again at 8 o'clock to inform them that they must quit. The sprinkling hours in the evening were from 5 to 8 o'clock, also announced by the whistle. There was a dollar fine assessed against any taker caught sprinkling before or after hours.

The entire village was run according to the sprinkling hours. The stores opened at six in the morning and most of them closed at eight in the evening. The post office kept the same hours and allowed about 15 minutes for the takers to get down for their evening mail after the whistle was blown in the evening. There was no village carrier.

One day a post office inspector visited the local office and made some inquiries regarding its conduct. When told the post office was kept open till 8:15 to enable patrons to get their mail after sprinkling hours he gave a sort of a grunt but said nothing. A few days later an order came through from the Department at Washington that the office should be closed at 7:30.

The order was obeyed, but it met with a strong protest from the patrons who were water takers. Complaints went in to Washington of the injustice done the patrons. One irate patron demanded that the office remain open as before. We said that we had an order to close at 7:30 and felt we must obey it. The complainant replied, "I guess you'll keep open if the Postmaster General tells you to," and we replied that we surely would. The Postmaster General never told us to and the people finally became reconciled to the new hours. Not long after that the sprinkling hour was shortened to 7:30 p. m.

When the electric light plant became a part of the municipal system I. B. Galbreath of Grand Rapids, an efficient electrician, was made manager of both plants and Jack Johnson became his assistant. They worked together about a year when differences arose with the village board, the proposition having become more complicated. The men quit and went to Battle Creek where they worked in the Malta Vita breakfast food plant.

Charles Lisk and Henry Pierce became their successors. Charlie had not had the necessary training for an electrical job of that size, and after about six months he resigned.

William Weisenborn of Chicago was hired to take his place and Lisk was made assistant. Henry Pierce went to Kalamazoo and began the career which has since made him famous in Penny Wise's column of the Gazette.

Weisenborn did not harmonize exactly with the board and after about a year a delegation of councilmen went to Battle Creek, smoothed out the differences with Mr. Galbreath and he came back and took charge again.

That was in 1901. Charlie Lisk remained as assistant. Jarious Halleck began in 1902 as a helper. Galbreath and Lisk both quit in 1912. Vay Morlan was then made electrician and Jarious Halleck assistant. These two worked together six years. Then Otis Howe took Vay's place and remained until 1922 when the Michigan Gas and Electric Company bought the electric plant and the two systems were separated.

Otis continued with the electric company until 1927 when he was made manager of the plant at Dowagiac.

Jarious Halleck has been continously with the plant since 1902 He had never been away a week until the first of last June when he suffered an attack of appendicitis which necessitated an operation and kept him out till the twentieth of July.

Today at 66 he says he feels as fine as a fiddle and he never did better work. The Decatur water system is in perfect condition. There are three pumps that pump an exhaustless supply of pure water from a depth of 116½ feet. The standpipe is 12 feet in diameter and stands 115 feet high, the brick foundation being 55 feet high and the steel tank 60 feet high. This is kept continually full, so that there is never a lack of water for any emergency.

Jarious Halleck, the manager, who has helped us with this story says, "Now, don't say anything about me," but we have a different idea. No municipality, private owner or corporation could have a more capable or faithful employe. His job is is his life. He considers it his responssibility and everything about the plant must be as near perfect as it can be made. He has no hours when his time is needed there. He will pile out of bed at any hour of the night when the occasion requires it, or he can be of assistance to a patron. The village will never know the value of the services he renders until the demands of time make necessary the appointment of his successor. Then we shall all know, and we hope that time will be far in the future.

The water works started in 1895 with about fifty taps. It now has 512, 25 of which are inactive.

There are 7 two-inch taps. One is the school house which pays a flat rate of $60 a year. Five are storages which pay from $50 to $100 each per month while they are operating. The other is the village hall which pays no revenue.

There are 12 taps in Lakeside cemetery and 4 in Harrison cemetery from which no revenue is derived. There are two drinking fountains on Main street and one in the Tourist park from which there is no revenue.

There are about 425 houses in the village and all but 50 of them have water taps. Thirty are out of reach of the plant. There is only one house on Delaware street not using water.

There were originally 24 fire hydrants, now there are 50. There is no revenue from fire hydrants.

The income from the plant will average about $4,000 a year.

We will close this story with a few remarks about the far-sighted and progressive village board which brought about the special election and had charge of installing the plant.

The special election was held in November, 1894, and was a vote on a proposition of bonding the village for $20,000 for installation of water works. It carried by a big majority.

The board was composed of Marvin Hinkley, president; Frank C. Stapleton, clerk; Dr. N. E. Hooper, Perry Young, Lyscom Brigham, Dexter Brigham, Jacob Byers and Frank Potts, councilmen; Arthur L. Moulton, village attorney.

Water dues are payable to the village clerk on the first of May and November. A list of those who fail to pay is turned over to Halleck and he calls on the delinquents for the amount due. He says he has but little trouble collecting and the water accounts are in fairly good shape.

He says, "I never get mad at anybody. I learned years ago that it doesn't pay. If someone is inclined to get mad over his bill I laugh it off and he soon gets over it. We never want only what is right and if mistakes are made they are adjusted."

Jarious Halleck has a book which he prizes highly. It is a neatly bound volume entitled "Sixty Years," published by James B. Clow and Sons of Chicago. The book was written by Will Clow who established the company when a young man of 18 and is still with it as chairman of its board of directors.

James B. Clow and Sons install, equip and repair water works machinery. Our manager seldom has troubles he cannot handle, but if something does come up that he does not understand he knows he is sure to obtain the needed assistance from Clow.

A SKETCH OF MY UNCLE, FRANKLIN FASSETT

Written by Mrs. Nellie T. Conklin, about the year 1895.

The article below, the subject of which is "An Unkown Hero," is a chapter of family history that was written by Mrs. Nellie Conklin, widow of the late Elmer Conklin, and granddaughter of James Fassett. Thinking that it might be of interest to friends and acquaintances she gave me the privilege of placing it in the hands of our editor of the Republican.

As the "Unkown Hero," Frank went from his home to Lawrence on the fateful day of his enlistment.The little brother who, blinded by tears, clung to his hand all the way, was no other than the late Seth Fassett, whose megnetic music at times, no doubt, owed its charm to an underlying sadness, unconsciously expressed, as memories of the matchless companionship of a beloved brother brought visions of the childhood days floating between him and the crowds he so cheerfuly entertained.

—Capitola Fassett.

AN UNKNOWN HERO

Many years ago a great number of the children of the Eastern states became uneasy and dissatisfied with the conventionalities of life in an old settled community and the small profits to be obtained.

Eagerly joining those who were pushing forward from all parts of the East they headed for that portion of the west that was the mecca of so many pioneers, and which we now know as our own great and good State of Michigan. What stories and traditions are handed down from the unwritten history of our state! and how eagerly we, as children, listened to the tales of those bygone days!

We were told how the deer bounded across the paths of children on their way to school; how the bear was found by the spring which now wells up in a flower garden; how our grandparents rode to church and merrymakings behind slow going oxen; and of many pleasant and exciting incidents of those times which have vanished forever.

We look upon those sunlit days and serene nights softly illuminated by tallow candles or glowing in the light of open fireplaces, and feel the fascination of that free wild life, till we long to roam the unbroken forests and explore the rivers and silvery lakes, and know our country as it was when ruled by the gentle Pottawatomie.

It was in the early forties that one of these migrating families made the long tiresome journey from Maine.

They, however, had not come penniless to a new land and were not to have the trials and hardships of their brother pioneers who founded homes in the wilderness..

This was the family of James and Eliza Fassett, parents of the Unknown Hero, Franklin, in memory of whom this sketch is written. Very reverently I undertake the task of presenting some incidents in the life, and a few traits of character of one of the vast army of our country's heroes whose sturdy good sense and love of freedom and justice were inherited from pioneer ancestry.

The family lived for a time in Quincy, Branch county, where he and a sister older were born. Also a younger brother came before the time of which I write when they came to Lawrence to live and Franklin was six years of age, and soon thereafter distinguished himself by his fearlessness and courage.

He was the captain and chief of the band of village boys who were his obedient followers.

No desperate raids upon the bears and wild Indians which were supposed to hide in cornfields or skulk in the woodlands on the banks of the river, but were headed by him.

No tree was too tall to climb, nor swimming hole too deep for him to explore.

All this fine fearlessness and daring were united in a sturdy frame, though the face showed a delicate, sensitive beauty. Not alone was he distinguished for physical courage. In those days there were no bands of mercy, and boys were allowed to hunt and trap and do much as they liked with their captives.

It was somewhat remarkable that he should exert a peculiar influence over the rougher element among his companions, so that in his presence none dared stone a defenseless frog or injure any of the shy wild creatures of the forest which they captured.

We find in all times there have been natures having untold depths of pity and charity, in strong contrast to those who have such capacity for self pity that it excludes all else but their own woes and sorrows—though armies clash and kingdoms fall.

There are many stories told of Franklin's kindness of heart.

One day he came home with a long-limbed yellow hound that was so nearly starved as already to be a fit subject for a student of anatomy. Tears rolled down the boy's cheeks as he begged his sister to spare for the dog the cold food left from the dinner table. So he was fed and cared for until entirely recovered and able to again join in the chase.

One of the villagers turned out, and abandoned to its fate, an old broken down horse; but Frank soon enlisted the sympathy of his followers, and never did a horse fare better through the long summer days, as an enclosure was made of brush and grapevines where he lived for some time in peace, free from slavery and the whip. Frank sometimes caused the family much amusement by the strange characters he befriended.

One day he brought home to supper a solemn little colored boy whom he had found wandering around town seemingly forlorn and hungry.

There were brown puffy biscuits which were passed to him and accepted until six were devoured, but at the seventh he concluded that he did not "lac em" because "too saft." He found, early in life, that too great an abundance of good things pall on the senses; but Frank was satisfied,—the little stranger did not go away hungry.

When he was about fourteen years of age one of his dearest friends moved away. The next day after he had said good-bye to the Fassetts, Frank was found fencing-in a footprint left in the sandy path by his friend and sobbing as if mourning over his grave.

As he grew to manhood he became a marked person in the community. He still retained the power of swaying, by some subtle influence, all with whom he came in contact; and the secret was, that he approached his fellow men with love and charity in his heart—love for all their virtues, and a boundless charity for their faults.

He quietly sought and befriended those in need,—not so much by substantial favors of course, as he earned his own way, but by the gift of his ever cheery sympathy. Young men told him of their sweethearts and their plans for the future. Old men talked with him of religion or of the shrewd philosophy of which they knew, such as the signs of the weather or the secrets wrested from nature as they cleared the forests or guided the plow.

The mother, who had gone about with grief repressed, spoke freely to him of the little child who had died.

Thus the name of the great passion that swayed him was that divine thing,—true love of humanity.

I was brought up on the traditions of Uncle Frank by my mother and Grandma Fassett. Their stories of his great kindness and most beautiful character were further confirmed by the finding of letters among old papers left by my parents. Though I had often heard them speak of J. R. Baker, a lawyer who lived in Lawrence for some years and later moved to Paw Paw, I had not thought of him for a long time until finding the letters. He was the great man of Lawrence at the time, a man of fine education and some wealth. Incidentally it was he who gave the town its park. He became greatly attached to Frank and wanted to adopt and educate him, and formed many plans for his future; in fact Frank went to Paw Paw and lived with him for a time until, evidently, owing to some unreasonable notion, Grandfather Fassett appeared one day and took him home, though he was advancing rapidly in his studies under Lawyer Baker, and with brilliant prospects for the future.

He went, obediently but sorrowfully, and nothing was now left for him but to work on his father's farm which had been acquired not far from Lawrence.

It was now that the sorrows of the black man were the constant theme of the people of the north. Freedom, the White Emblem, had a dark stain upon her garments and in the growing tumult of the times it was thought that naught but war could cleanse it. Like unto the old miracle of the outpouring of crimson blood to make all things pure.

One night an event occurred which greatly excited the people.

At twilight the northern sky began to glimmer with pale northern lights. An hour later the light grew and deepened to orange,—then to blush like a beautiful sunset gradually deepening until it rolled a sullen sea of blood.

Suddenly lances of light like marching armies moved across the sky; they met—clashed, and host followed host with bayonets of light, and the whole north swam and reeled as the ariel foemen grappled upon the field of battle.

Then, marvelously, above the contending multitudes a fiery banner unrolled. The clashing armies dissolved and disappeared and long after, the flag floated triumphant and alone.

People sat up the night through and watched the wondrous drama of the sky; the superstitious wept and prayed and old men recalled stories from history of how a brilliant display of northern lights always presaged a national calamity.

Franklin Fassett, who of course was among those who witnessed the unusual display, said in his heart, "The war may come but the old flag will prevail."

As time passed vague rumors became a reality and the first year of the war dragged its weary length. The second year Frank enlisted and his sunny presence became the joy of his regiment, but alas, his history was now short for he fell under the scourage of a slow fever and died obscure and unknown like thousands who, if they could have lived, would have made still more glorious, the history of our country.

Could such a character have been broadened by a liberal education, (advantages easily obtained by young men of today)? One dreams of what might have been his future.

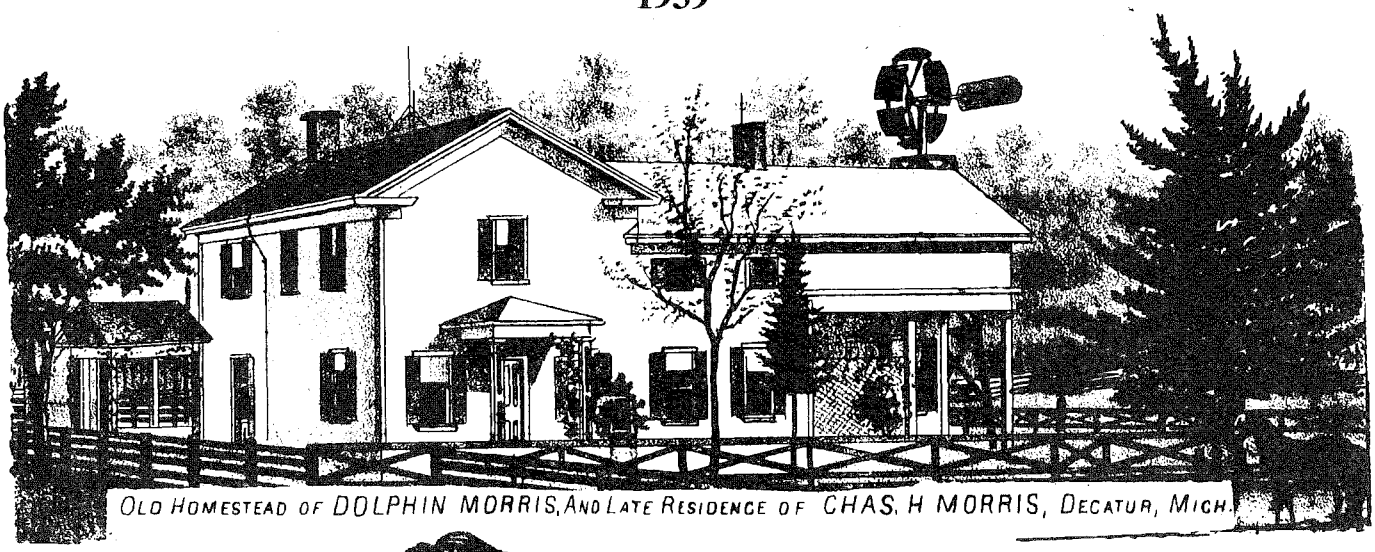
Such a nature had in it the subject of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," as did Arthur Henry Hallam whom we all learn to love as we study that beautiful poem which sings its way into our hearts. Franklin had none of the advantages possessed by Hallam, but, though their walks in life were so widely different, their spirits were akin.

He had a deep and tender conception of the relationship of all things; of man's attitude toward Nature, of his true relationship toward his fellow creatures, and his rightful attitude toward God.

Thy leaf has perished in the green,
And while we breathe beneath the sun
The World which credits what IS done,
Is cold to all that MIGHT have been.

So here shall silence guard thy fame,
But somewhere out of human sight,
Whate'er thy hands are set to do
Is wrought with tumult of acclaim.

—In Memoriam.



OLD HOMESTEAD OF DOLPHIN MORRIS, AND LATE RESIDENCE OF CHAS. H MORRIS, DECATUR, MICH.

CHAS. H. MORRIS.

MRS. CHAS. H. MORRIS.

The Morris Murder Mystery.—One of the remarkable tragic sensations of the West during 1879 was the mysterious murder of Henry Morris and his wife at their residence on section 35, in Decatur township. On the morning of Monday, September 29th, the dead bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Morris were found lying in their home, where they had been shot down the previous night by an unknown assassin, whose identity has to this time remained hidden despite the most earnest efforts towards his discovery and the offering of large rewards to stimulate his pursuers. The mystery surrounding the tragedy was deepened by the evidence that a desire for plunder had nothing to do with the murder, since nothing of value was carried away, although valuable property was within easy reach. Van Buren County offered a reward of $2000 for the capture of the murderer, but the constant exercise of the powers of the country's most skillful detectives has thus far brought nothing to light.

Early Decatur Days

By A. S. Abbott.

Detroit, Mich., Jan. 25, 1939.

THE REPUBLICAN UNDER ANDY

Early days of the Republican were none too good financially. At times there were considerable periods between pay days. The last few weeks I was there, Andy Johnson made mysterious trips to Dowagiac, for what purpose I did not know.

C. P. Sweet was about to establish a paper at Kalkaska, a town my father platted, and I went there to assist him. The first issue of the Kalkaskian was soon born.

I had not been north very long when a letter came from Andy saying that Mr. Buffington had bought out Mr. Blackman, and how would I like to see a white-haired old gentleman paying the help regularly every Saturday.

Some time later I heard that Andy Johnson had become owner of the Republican.

Recollections of this Editor.

(Andy Johnson bought the Republican in 1883 of Robert L.(Bob)Warren, father of Hon. Charles B. Warren, Ambassador to Mexico and Japan and President Coolidge's choice for Attorney General.

Andy had risen from devil to Editor in the Republican office, but his financial improvement had not kept pace with his rise to eminence.

He bought the office in the way that the prophet Isaiah told his people to buy food:

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and ye that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price."

Andy bought of Bob, and Bob bought of Buffington, and Buffington bought of Blackman, and Blackman bought the equipment, and it is doubtful if any of them had more than $100 in currency to pay down.

We worked for Andy three weeks in the summer of 1887,—kicked the job press 10 hours a day and averaged a thousand an hour. Wages 50 cents a day. Andy had a contract to print Frank Tucker's show bills for a dollar a thousand, and he used a lot of them.

Andy never seemed to have any money and probably the financial situation in the show business was the same as in the print shop.

When our first Saturday night on the job came Andy called us into his sanctum and said. "You have done a pretty good week's work and I suppose you would like your pay." We replied meekly, yes, thank you. Andy said, "Well, I can't pay you tonight, haven't got a cent. If I don't ever pay you, you'll get your reward in heaven."

When school opened we quit Andy and went to work in Browning's drug store outside of school hours and Saturdays for $2 a week.

Andy finally paid for the work done for him, but he was a long time doing it.

He used ready prints. Four pages were home print and four pages were furnished by a ready print house in Chicago. The ready prints arrived at 11:15 a. m. by express and the C. O D. was $3 plus the express. Andy generally had to go up and down the street soliciting job printing and advertising or collecting old accounts to get enough money together to take the ready print package out of the express office. But those were happy days, nevertheless.)

Fun On Lake of the Woods

My brother built an ice boat one fall. It was a good strong one. There was little snow the following winter and the wind swept Lake of the Woods clear, and the ice was splendid for sailing. The Leavens boys put in commission an ice boat soon after. Their boat was light and frail, and they expected to sail right around us.

A race was soon on, in a strong breeze, and both were traveling side by side close to a mile a minute, the Leavens craft gaining slowly, when one of their runners entered a crack in the ice. The frame of their boat was instantly reduced to kindling wood, and the Leavens boys slid a long distance on the glare ice. They suffered only torn clothes and some skin minus. They never rebuilt their boat.

(We have often wondered why the boys of the present time do not rig up ice boats and get fun out of Lake of the Woods. Back in the seventies and eighties there was all kinds of fun going on there and we have been told of exciting trotting races being pulled off on the ice there.)

Lowering the Lake

The boys of Decatur did not approve of having the lake lowered the four feet that was talked of. We thought it would spoil our fine swimming hole, and the beauty of the lake. The work proceeded however, and soon a swift stream of water was going through the ditch.

We got some pleasure out of it, however. With a paddle to steer our row boat we swept down the ditch into the forest for a long distance at a furious pace. We had to tow back with a rope fastened at bow of boat, but there was a good path.

Old Sayings

Following are a few of the old sayings, handed down from generation to generation, that have no substance in fact:

Friday an unlucky day: Begin no new work.

Break a mirror: Seven years of bad luck.

Passing beneath a ladder: Brings ill luck.

Thirteen at table: One will die within one year.

Dropping broom: Not married for a year.

Dropping a picture frame: Immediate death in family.

Black cat crossing path: Disaster.

Dropping dish cloth: Company coming.

Spilling salt:- Always causes a quarrel.

Curiosity Did Not Kill a Cat

Little Lucy had plied her mother with many questions about Santa Claus, fairies, witches, etc., till her weary mother told her not to be so curious, for curiosity killed a cat.

Lucy said: Ma, was it our cat?

Mother said: No!

Well, was it your mother's cat? asked the little girl.

Mother again said: No!

Lucy asked, whose cat was it then?

My child, said the mother, it is just an old, old saying. Curiosity never did kill a cat that anyone knows of.

Yours,

A. S. Abbott.

OPOSSUMS

Orlando Ball is an old time trapper and buyer of furs. He saw the stuffed opossum in the Republican office and was hardly able to identify it. He knows his opossum, but our specimen is a little off color and off shape. The taxidermist did not do a perfect job.

Orlando Ball says that this animal has become numerous and a nuisance to the farmers, so much so that the state has declared open season on them the year around.

They have cleaned out his flock of guineas, the quickest bird of the domestic fowls. An opossum will kill a chicken, wind its tail around the chicken's neck, and drag it away to its den. Opossums are seldom seen in the day time. They live and do their mischief at night, like some people.

Home Coming at Hill School

The school known as the Hill school, Keeler, District 5, Van Buren county, will hold its first home coming on Sunday, September 3.

This old school, located two miles north of the Red Mill, is rich in pioneer history. It was first begun in about the year 1847. The old building was replaced by the present structure in 1875.

The school board members at that time were Mart Klett, Willard Wilkinson and Solomon Stewart. The land was leased to the district by Joe Dunham for school purposes only. The great oaks on the school ground were mature even then.

The name, Hill School, was given it because of the Hill family who had resided in the vicinity for so long. Mrs. Kate Hills, mother of the late Guy Hills, was one of the early teachers.

As far as can be learned the three oldest living pupils are Mrs. Ida Keith Ryder, mother of Mrs. Harold Brooks, of Dowagiac; John Johnson of Dowagiac, and Frank Tacey, who has always lived in the district.

The oldest living teachers are Irene Broadhurst, California; Mrs. Carrie Durkee Olds, 1886, Hartford; Gertrude Yeckley, 1885, Decatur; Lydia Shephard Harris, 1887, Kalamazoo; Nellie Buck, 1883, California.

The oldest records of the school are the daily registers dated 1887. Many of these early pupils and descendants are still living in the vicinity. Four families,—Garrett, Russell, Evans and Wilkinson,—have sent the third generation to this school, there being three living generations in the Wilkinson family,—Mrs. Belle Wilkinson, Mr. Marion Wilkinson and Lucile and Donna Wilkinson.

A picnic dinner and program are planned for the day. All pupils and teachers and their families are invited to attend. Any one having pictures of the school or pupils or any old report cards, cards of merit, etc., are requested to bring them.

All teachers present will have roll call to be answered by their former pupils with some experience they have had while attending the school.

ANOTHER STORY OF THE COLD NEW YEARS

Myron Hinkley, editor of the Clovis (California) Independent, has this to say about the Cold New Years:

"Your inquiring reporter has so far failed to find anyone who can remember hearing of the "Cold New Years," which occurred in the early sixties in the eastern part of the country, and so far as we know set an all-time record for cold in the states of Michigan, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio.

"The story goes—as told by my mother, that on New Years she attended a party with other young people. They were having a good time, when suddenly her older brother appeared and said he had been sent to take them home. His father had noticed that after raining for a short time it turned suddenly cold. The cold increased so rapidly that he became worried and sent for the ones at the party.

"By morning it was so cold that animals not well protected were frozen in their stalls. Rail traffic was tied up. Farmers found it difficult to get out to chores. The extreme cold lasted about twenty-four hours and then moderated."

This cold New Years as described recently in the Republican was the News Years of 1863. Myron's mother lived in Decatur or Hamilton at that time, we think it was Hamilton. The name was Lumbard. She married Marvin Hinkley of the Hinkley Stave factory about the year 1870. Their son Roy and daughter-in-law, Mrs. Henry Hinkley, are still residents of Decatur.

Miss Martha Van Duzer passed away at the county hospital near Hartford at 5 o'clock Sunday afternoon, August 6.

She was taken to the hospital the fore part of last week. At times she was somewhat deranged and in one of these spells Wednesday night she jumped out of a window. She was on the first floor and the fall was not over six feet. A bone in her ankle was broken and she was hurt on the forehead and hip. After the fall she went down rapidly.

Miss Van Duzer was born on the farm in Hamilton township which was her home till the time of her death. The date of her birth was August 4, 1856, and she passed her 83rd birthday last Friday.

In her younger days she was employed as bookkeeper and sales lady in Decatur, and she spent many years in similar work in Dowagiac. She retired to the farm in the spring of 1914.

That same year she took Charles Scribner from the Children's Home at Coldwater, and he remained with her till she was taken away last week.

Among the keepsakes at the farm was a newspaper clipping announcing the death of Miss Van Duzer's mother, Mrs. Eliza Phelps Van Duzer, which occurred at the home in Hamilton December 24, 1902, at the age of 75. The mother was married to Charles Van Duzer in Norwalk, Ohio. The family came to Michigan in 1854 and located in Hartford and six years later moved to the farm in Hamilton. This would indicate that Martha was born in Hartford instead of on the farm.

Miss Van Duzer was one of five children and the last survivor. Parshall, the oldest, resided in Decatur many years and died here. His children have kept in close touch with their aunt Martha, and the oldest, Mrs. Ethel Traynor, and family, are driving through from North Dakota to attend the funeral.

The clipping said of Martha's mother,—She "possessed almost unlimited energy which she retained as long as her strength lasted. During her widowhood she managed every detail of her farm and did, herself, much work which few younger women would have attempted. While faithful to whatever she considered her duty, she was especially generous to orphan children, having given home and care to nine homeless ones during periods of time varying from two to fifteen years." This description of the mother fits well, as to energy and generosity, that of the daughter who has just completed her work on earth.

Funeral services will be held at Newell and Son's funeral home this Thursday morning at ten o'clock, and burial will follow in Hamilton cemetery.

Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Smith Celebrated Their 65th Wedding Anniversary on Sunday.

The 65th wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Smith of Decatur, former Kalamazoo residents, was observed Sunday with a family picnic at Wolf Lake fish hatchery.

They have 10 children, all living. They are, W. C. Smith and E. A. Smith of Fairfield, Ia.; Mrs. L. F. Sandburg, Burlington, Ia.; Mrs. O. R. Thompson, Kalamazoo; Mrs. Dave Clark and R. C. Smith, Boone, Ia.; H. C. Smith, Des Moines, Ia.; Mrs. H. M. Wilder, Ionia, and D. M. Smith and W. R. Smith of Decatur.

There also are 24 grandchildren and nine great grandchildren. Mr. and Mrs. Smith are 88 and 82 years old, respectively. Both enjoy fair health. Mr. Smith works in a large vegetable garden and Mrs. Smith does her own housework.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith have resided in Decatur three years. They reside in one of Mayor Ritter's houses on East St. Mary's street. They came here from Kalamazoo, but their original home was in Iowa.

Mr. Smith was born in Fairfield in 1851, and in 1860, when he was nine years old, he saw Abraham Lincoln. He distinctly remembers him because the president was so tall and slim.

Mr. Smith will be 88 years old the 8th day of Septemebr. In his early life he worked 11 years in the coal mines of Iowa. He was a mine foreman, and he and his oldest son owned the mine.

Mr. Smith was a powerful man in those days and could handle most any man of his time in a wrestling match.

His oldest son resides in Fairfield and has been county clerk there for a long period.

Six of their ten children attended the celebration Sunday, as did also Dr. and Mrs. N. H. Greenman of Decatur.

OLD TIMERS RECALL EXCITING DAYS OF OLD

Roy Foster and the Editor Put Their Heads Together to Relate the War Between Decatur and Lawton Back in the Elegant Eighties.

(We miss Roy Foster. He died a few months ago at the age of 83 or 84, but whether it was three or six months ago we cannot tell. Time travels a fast pace with us these days. Roy lived in the past, but never presented a gloomy outlook when comparing it with the present. He was fond of recalling events of long ago, but only from the standpoint of the local historian. If we wanted to know about something that happened in Decatur, Hamilton or Keeler fifty to one hundred years ago, Roy could supply the facts from his retentive memory.

The last time we ever saw him was the time he wrote this story of the Decatur-Lawton ball game. He gave no intimation that he was so near to the end of life's journey. His mind was full of this great event of fifty years ago. He talked while we typed. In a fe wdays he was taken sick; in In a few days he was taken sick; in

The story was typed and laid aside and now it is printed without changes and dedicated to the honest, kindly man who helped to prepare it.)

Ed. Vought in his letter last week mentioned the Decatur ball club that made this village famous during the eighties, but he did not tell about the time our boys went to Lawton to play.

That was undoubtedly the most exciting event in the history of Decatur. We would at least have to go back to the time of the Civil War to equal it.

Lawton also had a great ball club. They were not only ball players but scrappers, and Decatur was not slow in maintaining her superiority through the "manly sport" if necessity seemed to require it.

Lawton had money, too, in those days. The grape farmers were prosperous, and the townspeople were of the temperament that conceded no defeats.

Decatur and Lawton had the outstanding ball teams of this section of Michigan. Decatur had the swifter team, but Lawton would not admit it.

Lawton came here for a game. They had re-inforced their team with the best players they could find, and came to win. They put up a great contest in Barton Park. Every store closed for the event. The whole village and the country people round about were there and Lawton came, backed by a hundred or more enthusiastic fans.

The visitors played a good game, but Decatur won. Men, women and children all were excited. Betting was heavy and several hundred dollars of Lawton grape money stayed here.

After the game, Lawton, still unvanquished, challenged the Decatur club to another game to be played in Lawton the next week, and our boys accepted the heallenge.

It may or may not have been said, but the report went through the crowd, that Lawton men were boasting that if they could not beat us playing ball they could whip us in a fight.

Johnnie Pelton came up from the game flourishing a roll of bills and shouting out an offer to bet fifty dollars that Lawton would win the next game. He met Ed. Rawson in front of Carney's drug store, flourished the bills in front of his face and repeated the offer.

"Don't know but I'll take you," replied Ed. as he opened his wallet and withdrew therefrom a fifty dollar bill. That was a terrific bluff to Johnnie. His bills were all ones and twos, and when we left the scene he was still floundering with them, trying to make fifty dollars out of the lot. The circle around the betters lost interest and dispersed, and we never learned whether or not the bet was made.

The day of the game at Lawton dawned bright and clear. People began early to come in from the country. Some drove on to Lawton and some left their teams here and went by train. Village people went by any way they could get there. Freight trains were more numerous in those days and all that stopped here eastbound took on a load of boys and men. There was also a procession of walkers along the track. There probably were as many Decatur rooters at the game as there were inhabitants of Lawton.

This story from now on is reported by Roy Foster:

I lived in the country then, at Foster's corners. I came to town about noon and was sitting on a bench in front of Deacon White's barber shop when Seth Felt of Keeler came along.

He said, "Come on and let's go to Lawton to the game, there's going to be some fun there." We caught a freight and rode to Lawton in the caboose.

The game was begun on time. I think Will Taylor was the umpire, and everything went along smooth till the beginning of the ninth inning. Decatur was two scores ahead when they began that inning which never was to be finished.

A Lawton man was at bat and Frank Thomas was pitching. I don't have the least idea what was the matter with the balls he pitched, but all of a sudden the Lawton batter left his place at bat and went up to Frank. He probably said something pretty harsh, for Frank hauled up and slapped him in the face so hard that it whirled him around.

That was the beginning of the war. Frank Stapleton, catcher of our famous 'Bantam Battery,' followed the batter to the pitcher's box to back Thomas, and the crowd began to rush to the center of the diamond.

Mike Ryan was the first outsider to get to the men. He shouted above the hubbub, "I am the marshal and we've got to have order here." Mike was not a large man, but he once wore the army blue in the Civil War and had the reputation of being unafraid.

A Lawton player told him he might be the marshal of Decatur but he wasn't the marshal of Lawton, grabbed him by the collar of his coat and gave him such a shove that he went through the crowd and slid on his back along the grass.

A big powerful farmer went up to Ed. Rawson. They proved to be friends and shook hands. The man then went into the battle for Decatur. He faced a Lawton man who was aching for a fight. He knocked the Lawton man down three times and asked him if he wanted any more.The Lawton man said he had had enough and that was the end of that.

Charlie Duncombe, Sr., a Decatur backer from Keeler, got into an argument with the Lawton blacksmith but that was as far as it went. I heard the blacksmith say, "You may be a better man than I am financially, but not physically."

There was no more ball playing and I don't know how the game was decided. The crowd filled the diamond and argued awhile, and then gradually scattered.

A gang of Decatur boys caught a freight for home about five o'clock. They packed the roofs of a number of cars, and as the train was pulling out angry Lawton boys threw stones at them but I think no one was hurt.

The game was the talk of the town for years afterward.

JONT. SAYS

(We say he is 80 years old today.)

Eighty years ago this December 14, 1939, there was a baby boy born. He must have been a good baby for he cannot remember of hearing it cry.

There is another boy who was 80 last May. We played together for 6 or 7 years. Both were good boys. This was along the West Valley road. The Cass county traffic came down the Fifield hill to Decatur.

Grand pap (that was Hoosier for grandfather) would hitch up Jane and Mary to the old linch pin wagon and drive to town across the Old Swamp road laid with poles covered with sand. There were turnouts a short way apart so that teams could pass. The tamarack trees along this road would shake and wave for several rods on each side of the road as the team was going along.

The Old Swamp road was just mud, and the old red bridge across the big creek was about 12 feet wide.

The buildings on Main street were built of wood. Grandmother traded her eggs and butter for brown sugar and coffee. The coffee had to be browned at home in the old elevated oven on the cook stove.

They did not need much sugar for they had plenty of maple sugar at home. They did not buy any meat. They had pork, chickens, ducks and geese.

Socks and stockings were knitted at home. Maybe they bought some calico and goods to make suits for the two boys. If they wanted some luxuries they bought crackers and cheese, the round crackers that sold for $1.25 a barrel, a stick of candy for the boys, the large stick with red and white stripes, for a penny each.

Now for the home across the Old Swamp road, the only road at that time that crossed the swamp. We saw no vehicles but wagons on this trip. The boys stepped around in those copper toed boots and home made clothes.

My father died when I was about 2 years old and left my mother and me 80 acres of land, all woods. As I grew older I helped to clear the most of it. I was at one end of a cross cut saw many a day cutting stave bolts and heading to take to the stave factory at Decatur.

Then we made ties for the railroad in the time of the old locomotives with large smoke stacks. There was the turn table, tread power, run by one horse. All of the freight cars were switched by one horse. Those were the times when things were slow but sure.

That old song, "Take Me Back to the Old Home," does not appeal to me. I do not want to go back to the old home, no one is left there. They are all gone but Elmer Morris.

Such was life 60 to 80 years ago.

THE BIG FIRE IN 1871

By R. T. Treen.

Mr. Weissert's article in the Sunday Gazette recalls to me the exciting happenings of the day of the great fire in Michigan.

I was only a small boy of about eight years of age, but the day's events so impressed me that I always remembered it. We were then living at a place known as Wagers' Mill—about four miles north of Gobles. All was woods and swamps around us, and our house was almost adjoining the mill yards, and the log piles and saw dust was the play-ground for us small children.

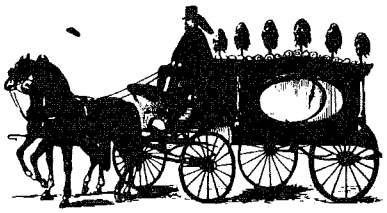
On the morning of the big fire, the surrounding community was alarmed for the mill was the mainstay and support of quite a few people, many of whom had boys in the yard, and if it should burn it would be a real calamity to the community.

As the fire approached from the west, all who dared leave their homes hastened to fight the fire in an effort to save the mill and small store. The wind blew blazing pine cones and fire brands for long distances, and the woods seemed to be all afire, and smoke was intense. The men organized into squads—each squad to fight the fire in certain runways or section of the mill yards.

My small brother and I with gallon pails of water watched around the house and nearby stables for any fire-brands that might alight around the premises, and would run and put them out—thus doing our little bit towards saving our house and the mill. The smoke was so dense we could see but a short distance, and the fighters worked without stopping until it was apparent the mill was safe. So dense was the smoke that they did not know when night came and when my father came home almost exhausted it was 10 o'clock. His clothing had caught fire from flying sparks so often they were a sight, and his vest pockets had burned out so the contents were lost.

At times the sawdust would catch fire and blow a sheet of flame that required real bravery to face, and while there was plenty of water handy, it was hard work to get it where it was needed quickly. I remember a man was driving along the road by the mill yard when a large burning limb of a tree fell onto his wagon bed, barely missing him.

The sight of the old Wagner's mill, and its acres of log yard have long since disappeared, but doubtless there are many still living who remember it, and its importance to the community at that period of Michigan's development.



DEATH COMES TO W. H. HOWLAND

He Was a Native of Decatur Who Added Luster to Its Name. He Became Famous as a Railroad Engineer by Doing His Daily Work Well.

Will Howland paid his last visit to Decatur about four weeks ago. He seemed to enjoy every minute of his stay here, and there was no indication that it was to be his last visit. He spent some time in the Republican office and we shall never forget the pleasant hour we passed with him.

Railroading was the particular subject that would always come up in his talks with old friends. No one knew the road better than he or could talk about it more entertainingly. He carried with him a small account book filled with dates and notes to verify his memory.

We shall greatly miss his pleasant greeting.

William Howland, 81, of 501 N. Park Ave., died Wednesday afternoon, October 4, at 1:30 o'clock in Mercy hospital, Jackson, following an emergency operation. He was born April 24, 1859, in East Decatur, Mich., and was employed by the Michigan Central railroad 57 years.

Beginning in 1872 as a waterboy in a section gang for his uncle, James Mahoney, Howland later became an engineer and piloted crack trains for many years. Guiding a snorting, steaming locomotive through a maze of red and green signals, ever watchful for danger and more speed, he became known as "Wild Bill," and was the envy of old time railroad men. He rode his engine with effortless ease, and his ability to get the maximum speed and observe railroad rules was uncanny. It was natural for him to make perfect stops at stations, never overrunning and losing time by backing up into proper position.

He became a legendary figure on the road. He had courage, keenness and ability, and like all railroad men he had a pet stunt. Decatur was his home town and every time he passed through here, the sharp plast of the whistle sounded and echoed through the village streets. His friends knew that "Wild Bill" had been in town for a short visit.

Visiting officials always rode in trains with "Wild Bill" Howland in the cab. He took his last ride as engineer in 1929, being pensioned May 1, 1929, after a long career without one mishap.

Mr. Howland is survived by three daughters, Sister Mariola of the Holy Cross order, Notre Dame, Ind., Mrs. Franklin Shearer and Mrs. Frances McDermott, both of Jackson; one brother, George Howland of Jackson; two sisters, Miss Nell Howland of Jackson and Mrs. Anna Kelley of Kalamazoo; and four grandchildren.

Funeral services were held in St. John's Catholic church Saturday morning at 8 o'clock, at which Requiem High Mass was said by Father Kraft. The honorary bearers were retired railway engineers and the active bearers were railway engineers and friends. The burial followed in Immaculate Conception cemetery, Silver Creek, Father Carroll of Dowagiac conducting the service at the grave.

Among the large assembly of relatives and friends who attended the services at Jackon and the cemetery were Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Creagan, Arthur Creagan, Thos. Mahoney, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howland and Catherine, and Fred Kirk of Decatur, Mrs. Mable Creagan Dillon of Paw Paw, Mrs. Marian Creagan Robbins, Mrs. Anna Kelly and Mr. and Mrs. Leo Kelly of Kalamazoo, Mr. and Mrs. John Agar (Catherine Creagan), Mr. and Mrs. Carl Creagan, Elizabeth and Frances Creagan of Grand Rapids.

The funeral party, about fifty in number, arrived in Decatur on the return trip from the cemetery at about 1:30 p. m. Here they were guests of Mr. Howland's nephew and Mrs. Herbert H. Creagan, at a welcomed buffet luncheon.

In Memory of Edith Keables MacArthur

Two weeks ago this paper printed a brief account of the death of Mrs. Edith Keables MacArthur which occurred in Chicago the last day of March. It was altogether too brief a sketch to give to one who had taken such a prominent part in the life of this village when the village and its enterprising population were young. Decatur is but 91 years old and it may be strange to some of her inhabitants that there are still a few people growing old with her. When both were in their budding prime few there were to match Edith Keables in brilliancy and accomplishment. She was truly a belle of the town.

Her niece, Margery Keables Forsythe of Chicago, says,—

"I have sat down to write something for the paper about Aunt Edith and find that it is impossible. She had done so many things and had been in so many places that it is hard to make a short article. I am enclosing data which you can use in any way you wish.

"I know she had gone back to Decatur many times, stayed only a little while and then gone on. For the past few years there was no one in Decatur for her to visit. She had kept up a correspondence with George Leavens and before she died had me return to him a painting by Edward Leavens, his brother, an artist who had died in Decatur many years ago."

Edith Keables MacArthur was born September 20, 1856, to Dr. John T. and Susan Woodruff Keables. The notes do not say so but we think she was born in Decatur. Her father was practicing medicine here when the Civil war broke out and went from here to aid the wounded and suffering at the front.

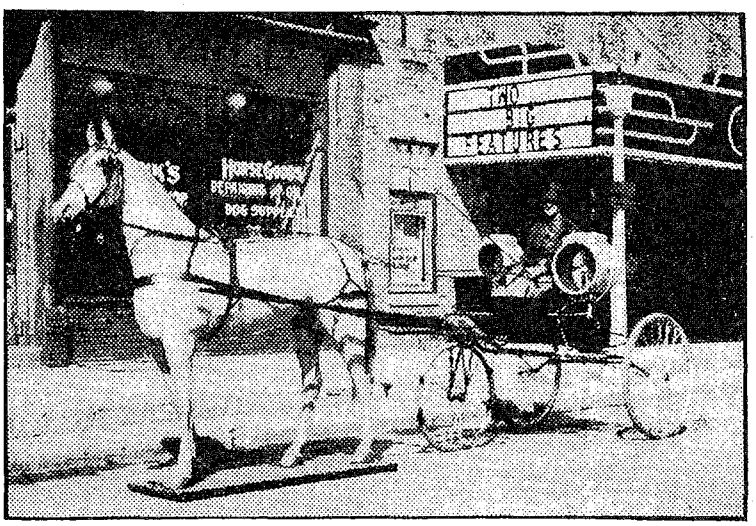
She was married to Henry Ward MacArthur November 18, 1887, and he died in Arizona in 1896.

Mrs. MacArthur won a Master's degree in music under Alberto Jonas at the University of Michigan in 1898. She studied under Sgambati in Rome, Italy, in 1902-3 while acting as accompanist for Gertrude Charles Metzger.

She taught the piano, voice coaching and public school music and was a choral and orchestra director for many years.

She was well informed on all questions, musical and political, and was a brilliant conversationalist. She had a large circle of friends throughout the United States with whom she kept in touch through correspondence.

Still A One-Hoss Shay



This is the old gray mare—model, size and make—owned by Frank Lanning, Decatur harness maker who still does a flourishing business at a trade believed long ago extinct. Hitched to a three-wheeled buggy, with Mr. Lanning handling the reins this model horse stands on a Decatur street after it had occupied a place in a Celery Festival parade.

Frank Lanning and His Wooden Horse

The Benton Harbor News-Palladium published a New Year's edition that contained 140 pages with stories and advertising covering the greater part of southwestern Michigan. One of the stories was about Frank, the harness man, and his wooden horse. This horse stands at the front of his shop where it is plainly seen from the window. The story as printed in the Benton Harbor paper follows:

Decatur, Dec. 31.—Far more scarce than wooden Indians are harness dummies, and Frank Lanning's wooden horse is one of them.

He wanted two when he got this one but Henry Ford has the other in his Greenfield Village museum. The Detroit motor car manufacturer obtained his white horse from a harness shop in Hudson, Mich., the day before Lanning arrived on the scene to buy it.

Frank Lanning is Decatur's harness maker, although there's little more to it nowadays than mending leather and selling a few accessories. His business is still pretty fair, he says, for the Dutch farmers who cultivate celery and onions on the black muck land use horses extensively; tractors become unwieldly on low ground.

Back in 1934—that was before Mr. Lanning shattered one leg in leaping from a carriage during the Decatur Celery Festival parade—he was feeling prosperous and bought a harness dummy.

It was and is a noble animal. "A Hamiltonian," he calls it, "a buggy horse of the trotting breed." For years it stood in the windows of W. Hare & Son, former buggy and harness manufacturers in Noblesville, Ind. It was there Ira Sweat, 44-year-old Negro who helps Lanning in the winter months, recalls having seen it when a boy.

"This white horse must be at least 50 years old," the Decatur man explains, "for Ira told me his pappy said it was there before he was born." Sweat remembered that as a boy, he stood with nose and chin pressed against the glass of Hare's showroom, where the white horse as part of a team, stood hitched to a handsome surrey. Mr. Lanning found it, in 1934, in a back room of the abandoned factory covered with dust.

Where the other harness dummy of the Noblesville team went, Mr. Lanning doesn't know.

He's proud to own this one, however, for it is a relic of an era when leather craftsmen were in great demand and took a genuine pride in their work.

"I worked for such a man," says Lanning. "He's still in Decatur, man by the name of W. VanAntwerp, now past 80 years old. After working for him a couple of years 38 years ago, I did general farming until I bought him out in 1930."

Lanning hobbled across the floor to the white horse, still using crutches a bit awkardly although nearly a year has passed since the shattered leg was amputated and replaced with a wooden one. He put one arm over it for support, and patted it fondly. "I guess I've got more affection for it since I got a wooden peg like he has."

The one man in Decatur who perhaps knows more of wooden horses than either W. VanAntwerp or Frank Lanning is the latter's father, C. M. Lanning, of Decatur, who observed his 90th birthday last August 17. He's proud of the show window animal, too, but for a different reason. "It's a fine picture of a horse, and horse-breeders nowadays don't raise animals showing such fire and spirit as this one."

FRED B. BUYS TWENTY YEARS IN DECATUR

Twenty years ago Monday, March 13, Fred B. Buys bought the clothing store of Charles E. Criffield and himself and family became residents of Decatur.

Mr. Buys was already well known in business circles of southern Michigan, but this was his first venture in Van Buren county.

He first engaged in the retail business with his older brother Edward at Batavia, a small town in a good agricultural community six miles west of Coldwater. Several years later he sold his interest in this business to his brother and in 1904 bought a hardware store in Colon. He did a successful business there until 1917 when he sold out. The last five years of his residence in Colon he held the agency for Ford automobiles.

His next venture was in Three Rivers where he had the agency for the Dodge and Buick cars and conducted the big garage on the St. Joe river.

In 1919 Mr. Buys came to Decatur. We have succeeded so far in holding him here and hope that he will not move again. Following his purchase of the clothing store he bought the S. N. Thomas residence on Phelps street and the family became at once a part of the business and social life of the village.

Mr. Buys has performed his duty in a public way, having served on the village council and in other offices. He is public-spirited, a liberal contributor to public enterprises and charitable needs, and an esteemed citizen.

Mr. Buys is a good visitor. We get to talking with him and forget the work that is waiting to be done in the printshop. He isn't much of a man to talk about himself but by adroitly drawing him out a designing reporter can work up an interesting life story and one that any young man might read with profit.

He has moved around some in his life time of something over three score years (telling his age would be telling our own), but never has located far from his birth place which was near Burr Oak in St. Joe county. When he was eleven the father bought and moved onto a farm near Coldwater, and from there our townsman went out into the world for himself.

He worked in an express office in Three Rivers for his room and board and attended Sage's Business College. Then he attended the Tri-State Normal College at Angola, Indiana, then put in five years as railway postal clerk on the run between Chicago and Cleveland, and after this period of preparation he entered the store at Batavia.

It was before the package era in the grocery business. Everything sold was wrapped in the store and it took practice to wrap some merchandise well. Fred remembers distinctly his first attempt to wrap up a pound of tea. When he got it to a point where it would not leak the package was as large as a cotton bat.

In those early days eggs brought 6 cents a dozen and butter 7 cents a pound. The store keepers bought butter of the farmers, worked it over in the basement and sold it to the Jackson Cracker Company at 3 cents a pound profit.

There were hard times in those days. We had not seen the last of the panic of 1893 and the first presidential campaign between McKinley and Bryan was one of the most intense the country has ever seen. It was Bryan with free silver and McKinley with the full dinner pail. The men on the street at Batavia paid the telegraph operator to bring the election returns to the Buys store and it was headquarters for an excited crowd all night. It took some of the free silverites a long time to get over the sting of defeat and they heaped curses upon Mark Hanna whom they called McKinley's boss.

TWENTY SHORT YEARS

On March 13, 1919, I purchased the clothing, men's wear and furnishing stock of Charles E. Criffield. Yes, I have been with you for 20 years. It would have looked a long time ahead, but seems so short thinking back. How many improved changes!

I got on a train at Niles; the conductor said it did not stop here. At Dowagiac I tried to get a taxi. The driver said it would be worth $6 if he could get through. I waited for the (Booze) Special.

Now we drive there for a pleasure ride. Our streets were then mud chuck holes.

The school house had recently burned. That recalls that I have had three locations in my 42 years of retail business and have helped by taxes to build a new school house in each town. But we are all thankful for our good school building and efficient corps of instructors, none better anywhere to be found in a town of this size.

I have never regretted becoming a resident of Decatur, for I believe we enjoy exceptional advantages in our diversified farming; neat, well-stocked stores; churches, schools and a community of "good" folks that I would like to associate with for another 20 years. Fred B. Buys.

Kenneth Lyle Raises Many Turkeys

By Miriam Smith in Kalamazoo Gazette.

A turkey gobbler, won at a raffling match, started a hobby for Kenneth Lyle that is fast becoming a major farm business.

When Kenneth graduated from Michigan State College in 1927, he returned to his father's farm in Paw Paw township. As a pastime, he began raising rabbits, then geese and later mallard ducks. These were all given up in quick succession, as the market for them was poor and they could be grown only in limited quantities.

Survives Christmas

The day before Thanksgiving in 1932, Kenneth won a turkey gobbler at a local raffle. The family had already purchased its Thanksgiving turkey, so this gobbler was turned loose to await Christmas. At Christmas time, the Lyle family was invited away from home and the prize gobbler lived on and thrived. By early spring, it had reached maturity, so it was decided to purchase two hens and, if possible, raise a few turkeys for family use.

That first year, after rains, weasels, diseases and the many other hazards which decrease turkey crops had taken their toll, there still remained 22 strong, healthy birds, which were soon sold.

From these 22 birds, the flock has gradually been increased until this spring nearly 800 poults were hatched. Each year, the Lyles became more experienced in the handling of turkeys and they were quick to adopt new methods and better equipment which enabled them to successfully cope with the many problems faced by turkey raisers.

In 1937 the Lyles decided to enlarge their plant. They had hatched about 150 poults the year before and, in 1937, with the addition of another brooder house and another oil burner, they raised 300 turkeys for sale. By Christmas all of these birds were sold and at least 100 orders turned away.

Kept in Small Yard

Up to this time the breeding hens had been allowed to run in an apple orchard during the winter and in the spring they laid their eggs in barrels placed under the trees. Since turkey hens start laying eggs around the first of March, many of the eggs were chilled before they could be gathered. During the winter of 1938, the 35 hens that had been saved for breeders were confined in a small yard which opened into a large shed. In a few days, the hens were roosting in the shed and when the laying season began, the barrels were placed in the shed and all the hens laid inside. Since then the season's hatches have averaged 80 per cent or better, which is a very high percentage.

Fifty hens and six gobblers were saved for the 1939 season, due to the fact that the demand for turkey eggs was exceptionally good. The early eggs were set for the farm flock and the later eggs, about 2,000 of them, were sold to a large hatchery. The average price for turkey eggs for the season was 16 cents each. A few less than 800 poults were hatched this year. One hundred were later sold and about 600 are ready for the holiday trade. More equipment was added this year and three brooder houses, heated with Jamesway oil burners, are now in use.

Fed Scientifically

The Lyle turkeys are fed scientifically from the day that they are hatched. The turkeys are gradually fattened from the day that they are placed in the brooder houses. After a few weeks of the starting ration, the poults are gradually changed over to the home made ration, which is a mixture of home-grown grains and concentrates. Corn, wheat, oats, and barley are combined with bran, alfalfa, leaf meal, meat scraps, soy bean oil meal, corn gluten meal, bone meal, dried skim milk, calcium carbonate, cod liver oil, and salt in the proper proportions to make a 22 per cent mash. They have found that barley makes a very good substitute for corn in the growing mash and usually the barley crop comes on just when the corn supply is getting low.

Starting about September 1st the turkeys, which are then on the range, are fed a mixture of cracked corn, wheat and oats in equal parts. This is fed in addition to the growing mash, which is always before them. In the middle of October, the cracked corn is replaced with whole corn in the same proportion.

Clover and alfalfa have both been used as pasture. The 1938 flock of 450 turkeys was pastured on a five-acre clover field and approximately an acre of oats and rape. Oats and rape make an excellent turkey pasture, but care must be taken not to plant the crop too early or it will have made too much growth by the time the 12-week-old poults are ready to go on the range, the latter part of June. The oats and rape mixture should be planted about the middle of May.

The birds are pastured on one-acre plots at a time and every two or three weeks, the fences are moved to new ground. The feeders are moved to clean ground every other day and fresh, clean water is before the birds at all times. An automatic waterer was installed during the summer of 1938 and connected directly with the house pressure system. At the time this system was connected, the 450 turkeys were drinking 50 gallons of water every day.

Turkeys consume an amount of feed which seems impossible to persons unfamiliar with raising them. Figures on this year's flock are not complete, but Kenneth Lyle's accounts show that up to Thanksgiving last year, the 450 turkeys had eaten 2,000 pounds of turkey starter, 17,650 pounds of growing mash, 1,700 pounds of turkey concentrate, 3,800 pounds of cracked and shelled corn, 3,800 pounds of wheat and 1,900 pounds of oats.

A Big Night For Odd Fellows And Rebekahs

Public Installation of Officers of Decatur, Lawton and Marcellus Lodges and Awarding of Jewels to John Rafter and Edward Price.

A great event in local Odd Fellows history was the meeting Tuesday evening. It was the celebration of the 120th anniversary of the organization of the lodge in the United States.

The lodges of Rebekahs and Odd Fellows' of Marcellus, the Odd Fellows of Lawton and Kalamazoo and the Rebekahs of Benton Harbor joined with the Odd Fellows and Rebekahs of Decatur in a public installation of officers and awarding of jewels. There were also visitors present from Three Rivers and other lodges.

Grand Marshal of the Grand Lodge Glenn Hammell of Kalamazoo conducted the installation and he was assisted by the members of the other lodges.

Jewels for faithful membership over a period of years were bestowed upon John Rafter, 37 years, and Edward Price, 34 years. This was done by the grand marshal who praised their loyalty and good work in the lodge.

The three lodges of Odd Fellows of Lawton, Marcellus and Decatur decided to put on a contest for memberships, the lodge obtaining the largest number to be given a supper at the expense of the other two.

There were 160 present. Supper was served in two sections, the hall not being large enough to serve them all at once.

The guest of honor of the Decatur lodge was August Knoll who has been a member 48 years. On account of ill health this was the first time he has been able to attend in five years. He is in his 85th year.

S. G. Reynolds, a visitor from Lawton, has been a member 49 years. He gave a very interesting talk. Arthur Bruner of Kalamazoo, who joined Decatur lodge 30 years ago and was also married in the lodge room, told of his pleasure in being here.

On account of printing so soon we are unable to give a further account of this fine meeting. More of it will be told next week.

THE CHILDREN OF THE BATTLE-FIELD

By James G. Clark.

(Older readers of the Republican recalled with interest the poem, "The Picket Guard," or "All Quiet Along the Potomac."

Mrs. Ira Cole cut it out and pasted it in her scrap book and then brought in another Civil War poem which has the same patriotic-pathetic ring. It too is worthy a place in this column. It is taken from the old Sanders' Union Fifth Reader, a school reader that was very popular in the years following the war of the Rebellion.)

The following touching stanzas received the prize offered by the Philadelphia Christian Commission for a poem on the death of Sergeant Humiston, of Portville, N. Y., who was found dead at Gettysburg several days after the battle, with his eyes fixed upon the ambrotype of his three children.

Upon the field of Gettysburg
The summer sun was high,
When freedom met her haughty foe,
Beneath a Northern sky;
Among the heroes of the North,
Who swelled her grand array,
And rushed, like mountain eagles forth,
From happy homes away,
There stood a man of humble name,
A sire of children three,
And gazed within a little frame,
Their pictured form to see;
And blame him not, if in the strife
He breathed a soldier's prayer:—
"Oh, Father! guard the soldier's wife,
And for his children care!"

Upon the field of Gettysburg
When morning shone again,
The crimson cloud of battle burst
In streams of fiery rain;
Our legions quelled the awful flood
Of shot, and steel, and shell,
While banners, marked with ball and blood,

Around them rose and fell;
And none more nobly won the name
Of Champion for the Free
Than he who pressed the little frame
That held his children three;
And none were braver in the strife
Than he who breathed the prayer:—
"Oh, Father! guard the soldier's wife,
And for his children care!"

Upon the field of Gettysburg
The full moon slowly rose;
She looked and saw ten thousand brows
All pale in death's repose;
And, down beside a silver stream,
From other forms away,
Calm as a warrier in a dream
Our fallen comrade lay;
His limbs were cold, his sightless eyes
Were fixed upon the three;
Sweet stars that rose in memory's skies
To light him o'er death's sea.
Then honored be the soldier's life,
And hallowed by his prayer:—
"Oh, Father! guard the soldier's wife,
And for his children care!"

Charlie McCarthy Making a Movie

Hal Kern, Formerly of Decatur, Was Film Editor of "Gone With the Wind."

A nationally known columnist began his column a few days ago with this heading: "We are getting tired of:" and he mentioned a dozen or more much talked about affairs and things. We agreed with him in some of them but not in the first,—"The anthropomorphism of ventriloquists' dummies (Charlie McCarthy).

Nobody has ever called Charlie a little tin god, but many make him, for his very exceptional ability to entertain, a little wooden god.

When Mrs. Myrtle Cary called on Edgar Bergen at the San Francisco fair last summer she said it required a squad of policemen to clear an opening in the crowd there to see him, so that he could get to the entrance of the theatre where he was to give his act. That does not indicate that he is losing in popularity. Perhaps the columnist was at a loss for something to say that day. It happens that way occasionally.

Charlie Rawson picked up a magazine supplement to a newspaper and the first thing in it that caught his eye was a picture of Eddie and Charlie hard at work in their newest film opus, entitled "Charlie McCarthy, Detective."

He brought it into the Republican office and we were as interested in it as he. Then we lent it to Dr. Bope and a dozen more read it and enjoyed the McCarthy humor. To none of us did the former Decatur boy and his dummy appear to be slipping.

This is what the magazine says about Charlie at Work:—

The hardest job Edgar Bergen has to do in making a motion picture is to decide whether Charlie McCarthy is being funny or not. And if you get Charlie off into a corner by himself, he will tell you his biggest worry before the camera is whether Bergen is being funny enough. Both agree, however, that what they like least about acting for the films is the call of "Quiet, please!" before each scene.

Once the camera turns, no one within sound of Charlie's voice dare show the slightest applause or laughter at their reactions to his lines. If you don't think that's tough on Bergen and Charlie, too, of course you don't know the pair.

"In radio, and on the stage, too," remarks Bergen, just after he and Charlie have finished a scene for Universal's "Charlie McCarthy, Detective," their filmplay of the moment, "we play to an audience. If they laugh, we know we're going over. If they don't we know we must do something about it. But in pictures I never really know whether we are being good or bad."

"Oh, yeah?" pipes up Charlie. "I always know how you are."

Bergen gives the young fellow a black look and goes on: "When we rehearse, we have a chance to see how the stuff goes over with the crew [illegible], but by the time we have taken several takes for the camera, I'm always in a state of great uncertainty."

"You mean you're up in the air," chimes in the irrepressible Charlie.

"I can't tell much by looking at the fly rushes, either," Bergen continues, ignoring the interruption. "I only know what I don't like. Honestly, I can't get enthusiastic about my own work."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughs Charlie.

"What I mean," adds Bergen quickly, "is that I can't get enthusiastic unless there's an audience to applaud it."

Bergen, moving away from Charlie, leans over to talk confidentially. There's one thing about working in movies, he adds, that he really likes. That's playing alter ego for Mortimer Snerd.

"It's fun, after being with Charlie alone so long," he says. "Though Mortimer has been on the radio, too, he is, strictly speaking, a screen character, planned to be Charlie's opposite. Charlie will talk on any subject whether he knows about it or not, but Mortimer is stupid and admits it. Also, he's afraid of women, which Charlie not certainly is not."

But our neighbor did not see all that was in this magazine which would lend especial interest for Decatur people. For one thing the story ended upon a [illegible] story of the filming of "Gone With the Wind."

The last picture, a large three-col[illegible] cut, carried this explanation, "Hal's Gone With the Wind in 20 metal cans. Film Editor Hal Kern's job was to cut film from 1,000,000 to less than 20,000 feet."

Hal Kern was a Decatur boy. He is a half brother of Mrs. Jessie Kern Savage, teacher in the Decatur High school. (We can't miss this chance to tell it, although knowing that Mrs. Savage does not court the publicity.) Her own brother, Rob. Kern, is equally talented in this line of work, being film editor for United Artists and editing some the best films screened, among them being "David Copperfield."

When the Cozy shows a particularly fine picture there is pretty sure to be thrown on the screen the name of one of the Kern brothers as editor of it.

David Selznick bought the screen rights of "Gone With the Wind" for $50,000. He bought the rights before the play was published, and it was lucky for him that he did. When the book was published it immediately jumped to the head of the best sellers, and probably no other book in a generation has equalled it in popularity.

Selznick has been 2½ years in photographing the story and the cost of production it is $3 million dollars.

The magazine story continues:

"Over 450,000 feet of film have been shot. From this immense footage Hal Kern, film editor, ordered 140,000 feet printed. About 20,000 feet will be shown at the preview. Later this will be cut to about 17,000 feet for the road show and to less than that for general release. This means the preview will run close to four hours, the road show around 3½ hours."

The show will open with a preview in Atlanta, Georgia, some time this month; after that it will be shown in 10 cities simultaneously during 1940, and it will be more than a year before the general public can see it at popular prices.

DR. WARD COLLINS TAKEN BY DEATH

He Was a Native of Hamilton, a Graduate of the Decatur High School and a Noted Physician of Kalamazoo.

On Christmas day Dr. and Mrs. Ward Collins were guests at the home of the latter's brother, Jay Lyle. Dr. Collins was apparently well and happy and they all had a delightful holiday together. At two o'clock the following Friday morning Mrs. Collins was awakened by this heavy breathing and found him to be unconscious.

She called his brother, Guy Collins of Hamilton, and her brother, Jay Lyle, also his sister, Mrs. Geo. B. Rogers in Kalamazoo. Mr. Rogers had been confined to his home by illness for several days. There was a quick gathering of the family and consultation with his physician, and Dr. Collins was taken to Bronson hospital where he passed away without regaining consciousness.

Dr. Collins had been closely associated all of his life with Decatur and Hamilton. Older residents knew him as a friend, they were proud of the record he had made in his chosen profession and of his high standing as a citizen. His death is a personal loss to a host of friends as well as his relatives. The following notice of his death appeared in the Sunday issue of his home city paper:

A cerebral hemorrhage at 2:10 Saturday afternoon ended a life of long and renowned service by Dr. Ward E. Collins, prominent Kalamazoo physician and authority on children's diseases. He died in Bronson hospital where he was admitted Friday morning after suffering a stroke.

Funeral services are to be held at 2 Monday afternoon from the Truesdale chapel, with Dr. John W. Dunning, president of Alma College and former pastor of the First Presbyterian church here, officiating, assisted by the Rev. Charles Johnson, associate pastor. Burial will be in Lakeside cemetery, Decatur, Mich.

U. of M. Graduate

Dr. Collins was born on a farm in Hamilton township, Van Buren county, September 27, 1883, son of John H. and Mary Ellen Beattie Collins. He attended the district school and in 1901 was graduated from the Decatur High school. In 1906 he was graduated from the University of Michigan with the degree of Bachelor of Arts and two years later completed his medical course at that same institution.

After graduation Dr. Collins served an interneship at Henrotin Memorial hospital, Chicago, and in December, 1908, located in Kalamazoo. In 1921 he pursued a special course in pediatrics at the University of Minnesota, since which time he had limited his practice to diseases of children, in which he had been unusually successful.

World War Veteran

November 28, 1906, he was wed to Miss Ethel Lyle, of Paw Paw, who with a son, Marshall Collins, survive.

On July 10, 1917, Dr. Collins was commissioned a first lieutenant in the medical corps of the army and the following August went into active service. In October he was sent overseas, where, before returning home in April, 1919, he was promoted to a captaincy.

For a year upon his return to this city he served as a member of the Medical Reserve Corps, having been promoted to the rank of major. Later he was obliged to resign as a result of his medical practice.

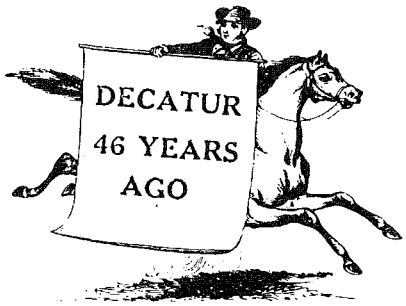
Other survivors are Mrs. George B. Rogers, Kalamazoo, a sister; J. Guy Collins, Decatur, a brother, and a granddaughter, Martha Louise Collins of Kalamazoo.

Had Many Interests

Dr. Collins was a member of the Kalamazoo Academy of Medicine; the Tri-State Medical Society; the Michigan State Medical Society; the Central States Pediatric Society and the American Medical Association and the American Academy of Pediatrics.

He also was a member of the Kalamazoo Elks, the Phi Rho Sigma, a medical fraternity; the Clinical club; the First Presbyterian church; and the Kiwanis club.

Dr. Collins was held in highest esteem both in and out of the medical profession and was recognized as an authority on children's health and diseases. He enjoyed a large practice in this city and vicinity, and was examining physician for several insurance companies.



Mrs. Nora Coons and son, Ed. Foreman of Dowagiac, called on the Republican last Saturday.

Mrs. Coons was a daughter of Alvah Bellis and is a sister of our townsman, Chancey Bellis. She renewed her subscription to the Republican and brought three large pictures of Decatur in 1893. They were taken by Allie Auton, then the Decatur photographer, who a few years later was drowned in Lake of the Woods.

The first of the three pictures was taken on Decoration day, 1893. The band is playing on the four coners and horses are hitched to the park fence at the foot of Main street. There is a full row of stores on both sides of the street except for three or four vacant lots north of Rawson's Kandy Kitchen on the east side.

Where the Republican office now stands is the Arnold dry goods store and in place of the Kandy Kitchen is John Shaad's boot and shoe store.

The old Duncombe House with the board sidewalk in front is an imposing building, and the street lamps of ancient memory, stand out prominently on the corners. Decatur is as it was in April, 1893, when we left the Browning drug store to find a job in Chicago.

The other two pictures were taken in June of the same year. They show the smoking ruins of four of the store buildings that stood between the Chadwick store, now the Stewart buildings in which Gale's hardware is located, on the north and the Brigham building on the south.

The fire which destroyed them started in the Browning drug store and burned also the Knight and Rathbun stores and the Stapleton barber shop.

Mrs. Coons was then married to William Barns and they lived over the Frank White barber shop, then a two story frame building located on the site of the present shop. They moved to Dowagiac that same fall.

The trees in Railroad park had just been set out and had not yet grown large enough to obscure the view of the depot.

LAMENT OF THE IRISH EMIGRANT

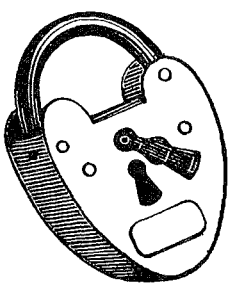
(This is a song written about the famine in Ireland when so many people died. The man who wrote it is supposed to be leaving Ireland and coming to America to make a new home for himself. It is a well remembered song of the childhood of Mrs. Ira Cole and she copied it from memory for the Republican. Tomorrow being St. Patrick's Day, this is a suitable time to print a good Irish song.)

I'm sitting on the stile, Mary,
Where we sat side by side,
On the bright May morning long ago,
When first you were my bride.
The corn was springing fresh and green,
And the lark sang loud and high,
And the red was on your lip, Mary,
And the love light in your eye.

The place is little changed, Mary,
The day is bright as then,
And the lark's loud song is in my ear,
And the corn is green again.
But I miss the soft clasp of your hand,
And your breath warm on my cheek,
And I still keep listening for the words,
You never more may speak.

'Tis but a step down yonder lane,
And the little church stands near,
The church where we were wed, Mary,
I see the spire from here.
But the graveyard lies between, Mary,
And my step might break your rest
For I've laid you, darling, down to sleep,
With your baby on your breast.

Yours was the good brave heart, Mary,
That still kept hoping on,
When the trust in God had left my soul,
And my arms' young strength was gone.
There was comfort ever on your lip,
And the kind look on your brow,
I bless you, Mary, for that same,
Tho' you cannot hear me now.



The early railway history was not written without its tragedies. On an October night in 1863 the village of Lawton was the scene of a horrifying train wreck that took the lives of nine people and seriously injured 28.

In the dark days of 1863, when the Civil War was raging, at a time when the bloody battle of Shiloh had taken the lives of 26,000 men, including some from the flower of Van Buren county manhood, a state fair was being held at Kalamazoo. Looking forward on those dark days, it is remarkable to observe that despite the tragedies that afflict the human race, the horrors of war, plagues and starvation, humanity will take time off to sing, dance and partake of recreation as an antidote to relieve the suffering.

The Kalamazoo state fair held in 1863 was a gala event, drawing visitors from all parts of Southern Michigan. It was on the race track at this fair that "Dexter" the famous horse, covered the mile in 2:40. At this time the only means of transportation was the horse and buggy and the primitive railroad of the Michigan Central. To take visitors to the fair a special train had been provided, picking up passengers at stations and rural crossings all along the line between Niles and Kalamazoo. This special, in charge of Conductor Nick Summers, arrived in Kalamazoo in the forenoon with hundreds of merry visitors for the fair, and to witness the feat of the record breaking horse "Dexter."

In the late evening as dusk was approaching, a large crowd assembled at the station at Kalamazoo to return to their homes along the line of the road. It was soon discovered that there were not sufficient coaches to take care of the crowd. To meet this emergency, two box cars were fitted up with wooden benches for seats. While this was being done the train dispatcher allowed a westbound freight train to proceed with orders to take siding at Lawton and let the special pass at that point. The conductor of the freight train was the well known Charles Billings of Marshall, Michigan, and one of his brakemen was his son, Frank Billings, later to become a well known engineer of the road. It was Frank's son, Hylar Billings, that for many years was connecting Mattawan, an investigation held some time after proved that some one, either through ignorance or malice pulled the iron pin from the iron link that fastened the box cars to the coaches soon after leaving Mattawan, and as it was a down grade movement the box cars would travel as fast as the grade would allow and the momentum attained at the time the pin was pulled. The coaches attached to the engine would naturally travel faster than the box cars that were detached. Subsequently the coaches arrived at the Lawton station, and passengers were leaving the coaches, suddenly like a thunderbolt from the sky the two loaded box cars crashed into the rear coach with terrific force, crumbling and splintering the wooden coach like matchwood.

Horrible screams of anguish and terror rent the midnight air as the crowd around the Lawton station rushed to the rear of the special train. Nine passengers were found dead and twenty-eight injured. Occupying one of the coaches were a young man and a young lady, the former, James Mahoney of Decatur, Mich., and the latter Mary Case, also of Decatur, both of whom had attended the fair at Kalamazoo. James Mahoney afterward became a popular rail track foreman, and was an uncle of Wm. H. Howland, a locomotive engineer, known as "Wild Bill" due to the fact that he was assigned to piloting presidential specials over the Michigan Central, also assigned to running the Wolverines. Mr. Howland is now retired and living in Jackson.

In the wreck crash James Mahoney sustained a leg injury that as long as he lived caused him a limp in walking. Mary Case sustained injuries that prompted the company to settle with her by giving her $3,000 in cash, a house and lot and eight vacant lots in the village of Decatur. Also in the coach was Percie Nash, a ten year old girl, who later became a school teacher. It is believed that the only living survivor of that train wreck at the present time is Percie Nash, living at Bangor, Mich. In the village of Lawton at the time there was no hospital and only one doctor, and there was no telephone. But in the darkness of the night, horses and buggies were utilized, also track hand cars, which traveled in various directions to obtain assistance.

By Arba N. Moulton, Editor

The writer has received from the teacher, Miss Catherine Mahoney, another packet of local history stories prepared for the Raider Review, edited and published by the pupils of the high school. The name of the writer of the story is not given and will be published later if furnished.

I am selecting this one first from the sizable number of excellent contributions for the reason that Mr. Fassett himself had promised to write the story of his life for the Republican but he was taken by death before the work was accomplished. The composition received the highest mark — A — by the teacher.

AN OLD MUSICIAN

Seth Fassitt was born in Lawrence, Michigan on January 8, 1856. Being a very patriotic man, the Civil War had a great influence on his music.

His business, which was the land and stock, took him many places. He took his violin everywhere he went.

He taught violin in all parts of the country. The pieces and exercises for the students he wrote himself. He refused to write for many music houses.

Although being almost self-taught, he had a perfect violin position.

Even though he had not heard Ole Bull, a Norwegian composer and violinist, play, he admired him greatly.

Ole Bull was born in 1810. His violin had a flat finger board and bridge that he made himself.

Chopin and Ernst introduced him in Paris in 1832 which brought him recognition as a virtuoso. He gave concerts all over Europe and came to the United States five times.

His favorite composers were Mozart and Paganini. The public liked best his own compositions which are seldom played today.

He died in 1880, the greatest violinist of his time.

Seth Fassitt started his career by playing between acts in theaters. At one time he was so moved by a scene that when it came time for him to play, instead of playing the scheduled song he played one fitted to the scene. When he was asked to repeat his performance he was not able to do so. The song had just come to him and he was never able to play it again.

He married Capitala Briggs in Keeler, Michigan. All four of their children were musically inclined.

On warm evenings friends and neighbors would often gather in the front yard to hear the Fassitt family play.

His granddaughter, Larida Scott, who has a special aptitude for music, graduated from Olivet College and later became a member of the faculty in the department of music.

Seth Fassitt died on May 2, 1937 at the age of 81. His family and friends will remember his as an unusual and talented musician.

THE OLD VIOLINIST

Years have come and passed away
Silver threads have turned to grey.
Time has changed to silver hair.
Bring my violin to me again,
Let me feel its gentle strain.
Let me feel those chords once more
E're I pass to yon bright shore.
Now my back is on the stream,
I can see its waters gleam.
I can see where angels roam,
Dear violin, I'm going home.

MOTHER LOVE

Through the gallery I wandered
With its paintings on the wall,
Then paused before a group of mothers
By famous artists one and all.

Silently I stood and marveled
At the artist's skillful stroke
In each face, each line, each feature,
Human nature plainly spoke.

Faces full of life and laughter
Happy mothers, young and gay
And there were those whose brows were furrowed
And whose hair had turned to gray.

Peasant mother, meek and lowly,
Love light shining in her eyes,
As tenderly she held her infant,
Softly crooning lullabys.

Princess grand and duchess haughty,
All from higher ranks of life,
Some faces spoke of sweet contentment,
Some of sorrow, care and strife.

Mother queen in all her splendor,
Crown of jewels and pure gold,
Costly gown of silk the rarest
Gleaming in each lovely fold.

Then a thought came surging o'er me
Oh, to be a ruler grand.
And to reign upon a throne
In some far and distant land.

On my head a crown of jewels,
Wealth and power at my command,
Vast riches, fame and fortune,
Reaching far o'er sea and land.

But I noted as I studied
Faces traced with lines of care,
That a life of self denial,
Love and patience had put there.

Cheeks that once bloomed like roses
Now were faded lily white,
Eyes that had so brightly sparkled
Were now dimmed to mellow light.

Then I turned to the Madonna
Hanging there upon the wall,
Mother of the loving Christ Child,
Who had come to save us all.

And my thoughts now grave and solemn
Carried me to heights sublime,
While within my heart was stirring
Had that sacred trust been mine.

Mother love the wide world over
Carries its toll and care,
Hope and pride and tender yearnings
Mingled with a mother's prayer.

Mother love, however humble
Though the tiny cot may be
Or however grand the mansion
Fills each home with ecstacy.

For however great the distance
That our weary footsteps roam,
Mother love will ever follow,
Like a guiding star leads home.

Thoughtfully I stood and pondered
But one wish was left for me,
Just to be the truest mother
That God meant for me to be.

TWO BEAUTIFUL INLAND LAKES

Both Within a Few Minutes Drive of of the Village of Decatur

This is a story of two lakes within easy driving distance from Decatur. In fact a good walker can walk to one of them in an hour. James Cotton, who is the inspiration for this story, says he could have done it when he was a young man, but now that he was 64 the fourteenth of March and is out of practice he would not like to undertake to do it in that length of time.

The two lakes are supposed to be equal distance from this village, going out on the town line road they are exactly equal distance. As near as Jim can say it is 4½ miles from Main street to the nearest point of either lake.

Now we will name the lakes. They are Eagle lake and Christie lake. Eagle lake never had any other name. In the early days, when the white man first came into this country, a little more than 100 years ago there was a big tree on the west shore and in that tree three bald eagles built their nests every year. That gave the lake its name.

James Cotton remembers that tree well and he remembers seeing eagles flying to and from it.

Some fifty years ago the late Edson Woodman, father of our neighbor, Eddie Woodman, pastured sheep on that place. One time during a big storm lightning struck the tree and killed about twenty of the sheep that had stopped under it for shelter. The tree was so badly damaged that it died in a few years, and now there is nothing to indicate the place where it stood.

In the early days the land where the pine tree stood was known as the old Abbott place. Mr. Abbott was one of the first settlers of that community. He died away back in the Civil war time and years afterward his widow married David Woodman, father of Edson.

Eagle lake is located in the southwestern corner of Paw Paw township, and Christie lake in the southeastern corner of Lawrence township. The two lakes are now more than a half mile apart, but when this country was in its primitive state there were only about 20 rods of land between them.

Lewis Goens, who is past 82 and has lived practically all of his life almost between the two lakes, says he can remember when they were only 20 rods apart and when a boy he skated across Eagle, walked across to Christie and went on skating across that lake.

The two lakes are each a mile long but Jim says Eagle is the wider and deeper. On the maps Christie appears to be the larger but our informant bases his judgment on the fact that Eagle lake was in his younger years 79 feet deep at its deepest point off the Hinckley cove, and Christie lake was only 60 feet at its deepest point, east of the sandbar.

Both lakes are fed by springs, but it is not generally known that Eagle lake has an outlet. Jim insists that this is true, and if any one knows he does. He has tramped its shores and boated and skated on its waters for the past sixty years.

There was an original outlet that came out on the Palmer-Hamilton line on the south side. It wiggled along down toward the Gooding crossway and went into the McLeese drain. A ditch was dug on the line and Jim was the first man to plow up the old creek bed. The ditch is there yet but is dry.

About 40 years ago there was a spring freshet and the lake rose to a point high enough for the water to run down the ditch, and carp weighing from 5 to 20 pounds, swam down it. Ed. Lyle, Clifford Hamilton, James Lennox, Lewis Graham and James Cotton took pitch forks and went along the ditch in the day time and forked the carp onto the banks and took them home. Some ate them and some didn't. You know carp are not the best for eating purposes.

The carp swam along the ditch to the drain where hundreds of them were caught by the farmers. They went as far as the John C. Lyle farm.

The carp got into Eagle lake from the Gates drain. Mick Gates had a carp pond and the dam broke and let them through. Carp are in Eagle lake to this day.

When Jim and Dr. Greenman attended the Plopper school they hid their bait can in a hollow stump and their fish poles and paddles in the bushes, and on the way home they would stop and catch a mess of fish.

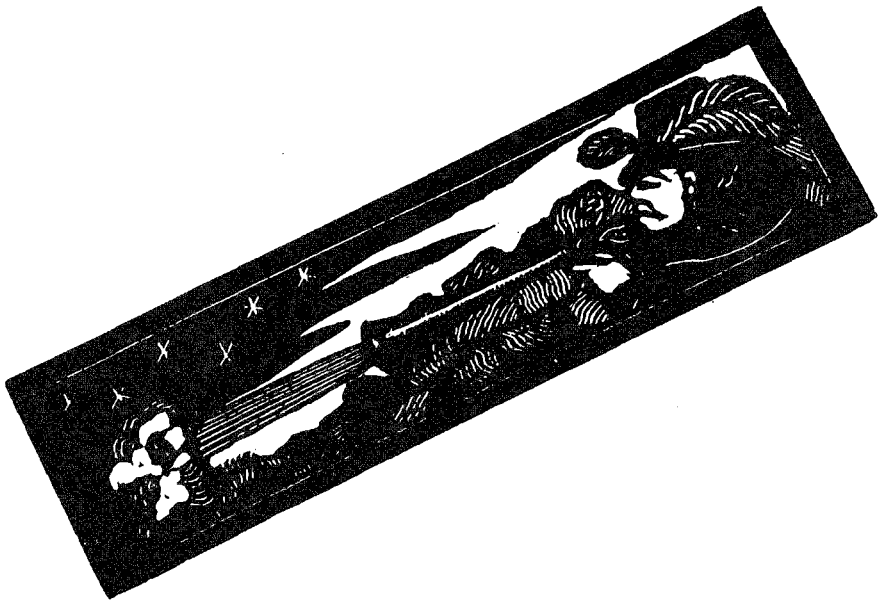
Christie lake was first named after the Christie family who settled on the west shore in an early day. In more modern times the name has been changed to Prospect lake, but the old timers like the name" Christie" better, and it is now known by both names.

Tuesday Lewis Goens came in. He was born in Cass county 3 miles from Pokagon, 83 years ago last November, and the family moved over into the Christie lake neighborhood when he was 8 years old.

That was in 1863. His father, Stapleton Goens, was too old to enlist in the Civil war.

In 1863 the land around Christie lake was owned as follows: William Greenman owned about ¾ of the southern shore, next was the Stoddard brothers, then came the Christies, then Clapp, then Tom Irwin, Jesse Sherrod and Thomas Winburn. These men surrounded the lake.

The men who owned around Eagle lake beginning on the southeast side were the Cuddebacks, Ase Hinckley, Gooding, Daniel Abbott, Hiram Sherrod, Tyler, Lurkins, John Lyle, Evans.



OXEN USED TO HAUL GRAIN IN PIONEER DAYS

Long Lines of Wagons or Bobsleighs Lasted as Late as Midnight.

By Charles A. Weissert, Kalamazoo Gazette Staff Writer.

Decatur—With a framework of hand-morticed timbers so huge that builders of today are amazed at the size, the old Michigan Central elevator, for 90 years a dominating landmark, stands today a sturdy memorial of the time when Decatur was one of Southwestern Michigan's principal shipping points for grain, hay, and dressed hogs.

The elevator, one of the largest in Van Buren county, was built when the railroad was extended west of Kalamazoo in 1848, old residents say, and was patronized many years by farmers who came many miles in heavily-loaded wagons hauled by oxen or horses. Some of them drove in from remote pioneer settlements in wooded sections of Van Buren and Cass counties.

Frame of Oak

This structure, 60 feet high "carried its age" so well that the firm of Carl Wickett and Company, of which Fred McWilliams is manager, recently bought it for modernization purposes.

Some timbers in the frame are 18 inches square. Many are 12 by 14. Some were cut from great logs, in local sawmills. Broadaxe experts, following an art almost forgotten, hewed out some of the others.

The frame is oak. Most of the boards are whitewashed.

Laborious Job

In the early days, before mechanical equipment for filling bins was installed, the grain was laboriously dumped by hand from the customers' wagons, which were driven up to an outside platform level with the second story. This platform, on posts about 30 feet high, was broad enough for a team and wagon to turn around. It was approached by an incline viaduct about 300 feet long.

In the early days considerable time was required for unloading the grain and older residents recall seeing long lines of wagons or bobsleighs, the last of which was sometimes not unloaded until midnight. This was especially common in the prosperity era after the Civil war when wheat quotations ran very high.

Freight cars have steadily increased in size. The capacity about 40 years ago was 600 bushels of grain. Today, it is 2,000.

Today, by throwing a switch, mechanized equipment fills a car in five hours. In the early days, when men carried the grain in dumpcarts, two days were required.

Ancient Dumpcart

In the elevator is preserved one of the ancient grain dumpcarts, really big bins on wheels, used for filling freight cars. The age of this relic is unknown but it is believed to date back to 1848. It holds about 15 bushels.

In addition to grain, farmers brought many sleigh loads of dressed hogs. These were shipped frozen to the Chicago market. Today, they are sent alive to the stockyards.

For many years, this village, named for Stephen Decatur, the famous naval officer, was a great trading center and also a shipping point for lumber, stave bolts, hand-made shingles, and other forest products from the pine woods north of here. It also was the terminal of the stage line which Maj. William Graves, Niles, operated between here and South Haven, serving en route Lawrence, Bangor, and Breedsville. These clumsy vehicles, drawn by four horses, carried passengers, mail, and express.

The line was put out of business when the Kalamazoo and South Haven railroad was completed in 1870.

One of the pioneer landmarks along the New York Central Railroad between Kalamazoo and Niles, is the elevator which the railroad company operated at Decatur from the time the track was laid about 90 years ago, until the building was sold to the Wickett firm. The buyers, who had been renting floor space in the old structure, have been making a number of improvements.

In pioneer days when large quantities of grain and dressed hogs were brought to the elevator for shipment, there was an unloading platform about 30 feet above the ground, the teams being driven up an inclined trestle. The platform was large enough for the teams to turn round.

The hand cart, or bin on wheels, is a genuine antique for it was used for conveying the grain from the bins to the freight cars before the mechanical apparatus which does the work in a fraction of the time was installed.

Bullets Killed Man And Wife

Slayer Stole Victims' Horse, Escaped

DECATUR — No many Decatur people can remember the famous Morris murder of 1879, but most can still recall hearing their parents tell about it. And nearly the entire community was moved to recollections with the burning last Saturday night of the famous murder house.

The house, located three miles southeast of Decatur on a lonely country road, was built long before the murder by Dolphin and Nancy Morris, Van Buren county's first white settlers.

Dolphin and his wife came here from Ohio in 1829 to homestead a piece of land just across the Cass county line. There they built a rude log cabin wherein were conducted the county's first school lessons and church services, and where the first birth and death were recorded.

PROSPERS

Within a few years, Dolphin had become prosperous enough to acquire 1,100 acres of land, become a stockholder in a new bank at Paw Paw—and to build the house in which his son and daughter-in-law were to be murdered.

Until Saturday night, the two-story frame building stood on a rise overlooking the Morris homestead. It had remained vacant 20 years, frequented only by the curious and teenagers seeking a lark.

The historic home, believed the oldest standing in the county, was acquired by Dolphin's youngest son, Charles, upon the father's death in 1870.

And there he lived until the night of Sept. 28, 1879, when an assassin's bullets killed both Charles and his wife, Esther.

According to one family historian, Charles and his wife had retired about 8:30. A little later they were aroused by a caller. Morris got up, without dressing went to the door, and stepped out onto his front porch.

GUNMAN MASKED

A masked gunman, standing there with pistols ready, sent two fatal bullets into the surprised man's body. The first shot struck him in the chest, going through the body and lodging in the siding of the house. As Morris fell, another shot was fired, the slug striking him in the neck and lodging in his back. Either of the shots would have proved fatal. Morris was found where he fell and death was later declared instantaneous.

Hearing the shots, Morris' wife sprang out of bed, snatched a little [illegible] shotgun from the bedroom wall, and ran [illegible] assistance. She came face to face with the masked assailant. Esther turned and fled, firing through one room after room as he fired shot after shot at her retreating form" according to one account.

As she entered the door of the bedroom, another shot missed her, striking the wall across the room. The next shot is believed to have ripped through Esther's left arm, crashing into the open bureau.

Terrified and wounded, the luckless Esther sought the protection of her bedroom closet. But the murderer threw open the door, stood over the fallen woman, and sent two more shots through her chest.

HAD NO CHILDREN

The Morrises left no children. One son had died in infancy, and Mrs. Morris was expecting their second child at the time of the murder.

A Miss Jennie Bull, who worked for the Morrises, had gone to bed about 8 that night, and strange to say, insisted that she was not awakened by the shots. She first discovered the two bodies next morning.

As investigators were later able to piece the evidence together, the murderer went to the Morris barn, saddled the dead man's best horse, and rode away. Two days later, word was received that the horse had been found in South Bend by riders of the Anti-Horse Thief Association.

PRICE ON CAPTURE

The gunman made good his escape on the stolen horse. The Pinkerton Detective agency of Chicago made an investigation and worked on the case several weeks before sending back word that the man could be captured for $1,000. It was felt to exorbitant a price, however, and worried by doubts, members of the family finally dropped the matter.

The only possible motive known to the family was that Charles Morris was disputing a debt he owed a one-man loan agency in Decatur.

The money merchant was believed by some to have hired the gunman. In a final desperate effort to solve the crime, townsmen donned masks and forced the money-lender from his home into a nearby woods.

There, under the supervision of a local doctor, he was stretched from a rope in a vain attempt to make him confess. The doctor saw to it that he was "given all the rope he could stand and live," but no confession was ever made, and the much frightened suspect quickly found new interests in the West.

GOOD AND BAD SIDES OF FLORIDA

(Mr. Washburn went with his son Kermit and family on a trip to Florida. They went before the Christmas holiday and were gone about six weeks. Their headquarters during most of their stay were in a trailer camp at Palmetto. He here favors the Republican with some of his impressions of this part of the South.)

Yes, we went to Florida and did I like it down there? Yes and no. Many things I liked and some I certainly did not. Perhaps I expected too much.

I felt ashamed at the way our government has permitted slums to grow or form so close to our Naval base at Key West. In some places only a picket fence separates backyard rubbish and filth from grounds occupied by government buildings, offices and living quarters for the boys we try to teach to respect the places that stand as representative of our enlightenment and power. Certainly a man with a scoop shovel, a horse and draywagon such as are used in many Michigan villages, could make a fine improvement in the appearance and maybe in the sanitation of places not far removed from grounds owned or controlled by one of the greatest powers on this earth.

Along the East Coast we saw many fine houses fit to be palaces of kings, with grounds appropriately landscaped and cared for, while across the street from them were walls so high that we could not see the Atlantic Ocean as it dashed with a thunderous roar against the beaches or whatever was there. No buildings occupied the east side of the street but on the west side those palatial homes had second story porches with broad porticos from which the home owners and their servants could view the majesty of the sounding sea, but from which the tourists who had driven a thousand miles, maybe to enjoy were barred by a wall of stone and concrete from getting even a glimpse. They could only wish and listen.

Farther inland we saw many fine gardens and citrus groves but even here Jack Frost had preceded us and had frustrated some of man's worth while plans.

Silver Springs gave us, perhaps, as much pleasure as any sight we met. Water issues in such volume that a fair sized stream is formed—two or three rods wide and several feet deep. Down this we rode on a good sized launch for four or five miles. We saw many fish and turtles and sunken logs which had lain too long a time for me to dare to tell. On the shore we saw a colony of monkeys that had been planted there. Like their brethren in cages they caught peanuts thrown to them by the passengers, and then asked, in their way, for more. How like humans they are getting, or have got, to be!

Clearly on much of the trip here described I was in no mood for much pleasure, but I could not avoid seeing many interesting places and things which undoubtedly I will bore you with when we meet again.

DECATUR TO HAVE CELERY FESTIVAL

THREE DAYS CELERY FESTIVAL WILL BE HELD THURSDAY, FRIDAY AND SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 20 AND 21.

Decatur will celebrate with a big three days Celery Festival the coming fall.

The dates will be Thursday, Friday and Saturday, September 19, 20 and 21.

This is an ideal week to have it, not too warm and not too cold. Celery will be in good shape to display and all crops will be nearing maturity.

When the word went out that the celebration might be dropped this year a protest went up both from the village and the nearby country. It became evident that the people want the Celery Festival. Another meeting was called and this tiime there was a satisfactory response.

The meeting was held in the council room last week Thursday evening. A new organization was perfected by the re-election of W. T. Beek, president, and Raymond Gale, secretary and treasurer. New articles of incorporation were signed, and when sent in and approved by the state agricultural department, will insure the Festival $300 with which to pay premiums. There are about $90 on hand, and with the money obtained from concessions and what will be contributed by the business men the financial success of the celebration should be insured. The cost last yeai was something over $900.

Another public meeting will be held in the council room next week Thursday evening at which time committees will be selected and preparations for the big show will get definitely under way.

The greatest thing the officers and committees will need is co-operation, both from the townspeople and the surrounding country. If a thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well, and to insure the best of which we are capable it will be necessary for all to take an interest in the work and help in every way they can. We can do big things if we all work together, and it is really worth while.

Now is the time for growers of crops to have in mind making an exhibit. It is better to have no display at all than to have a poor display.

Visitors will come here from cities and other distant places. They will come with the idea of seeing what we raise and possibly of locating here. A fine exhibition of the products of the soil raised in this community will have a direct bearing on the selling price of property here.

This Celery Festival is not intended to be a money making affair, although if other features of it are not neglected it should pay a profit to those holding concessions. It is intended first as a public spirited affair to attract our relatives and friends from a distance, to please our summer visitors and to put new life into our community.

Railroads Precede Founding of Decatur; Truckers Do Business

MICHIGAN CENTRAL ESTABLISHED ITSELF BETWEEN HERE AND SO. HAVEN IN 1948

By Franklin W. Ryan

Although the plat for the Village of Decatur was not laid out until 1850, the fact that the community had become a transportation center some time before that is evidenced by the fact that for several years before the railroad superceded it in 1848, there was a well established stage line between Decatur and South Haven.

The transportation of people and produce of the community and into the community had become of such major importance by 1848 that a Plank Road Company was organized between Decatur and St. Joseph. The The capital stock was $30,000 and the commissioners were Solomon Wheeler, B. C. Hoyt, Henry Morton, Samuel McRoys, Henry Coleman and W. H. Keeler.

M.C.R.R. Established Here in 1848

By 1848 the Michigan Central Railroad had passed through Decatur and had been extended as far as Niles. By 1849 the line was extended to New Buffalo, and by 1851 the railroad had reached Chicago. The railroad opened up vast potential markets for the produce of Van Buren county and the Village of Decatur. A great lumber industry rapidly developed in this community and in 1870 the largest population the village has ever had was recorded. From that point the vast timber rapidly became depleted and the population of the village accordingly. However, in the early 1900's the muck land in the area began to be developed and by 1910 the population trend had turned upward until it reached 1,286.

Muck Provides Opportunities

In recent years the production of celery, onions, peppermint and other crops from the rich muck soil; and grapes and other fruits from the higher ground have increased to such an extent that they are shipped to every part of the country to swell the larders of the nation. As one might expect, the flow of such a stream of produce requires the services of many transportation systems. In addition to the New York Central Railroad, the village is served by the Associated Truck Lines, Keeshin Transport Line, MacNamara Truck Line, and the Midwest Transit Line for the transportation of freight; and the Indian Trails Bus Line and the Greyhound Bus Lines for the transportation of passengers.

Here Are Private Truckers

In addition to the numerous transportation lines there are also a number of private truckers. Among these are Pete Wanco, 216 W. Sherwood, who trucks vegetables to Indiana towns; Clifford Tweedy, 317 W. St. Mary's, who trucks vegetables to Niles, Constantine, Sturgis, and surrounding areas; and Gilbert Mead, 319 W. St. Mary's who trucks to grocers in South Bend and other Indiana cities.

A Grand Good Citizen of Early Van Buren Co. Days

Philotus Haydon of Hamilton

As reported in this paper last week Miss Ione Haydon sold the Haydon homestead that had been owned by her grandfather, Philotus Haydon, her father, Arthur Haydon, and herself 112 years. Her grandfather was one of the all time outstanding citizens of Van Buren county.

In the history of Van Buren county published in 1880 there is a brief biography of Philotus Haydon written by his neighbor and friend Capt. J. R. Hendryx. It is of special interest at this time and is republished herewith.

PHILOTUS HAYDON

No man who ever lived in Van Buren county was more universally honored and esteemed while living, and more sincerely and generally mourned when dead, than Philotus Haydon. There are many now in easy circumstances living in this vicinity, where Mr. Haydon lived from the year 1836 to the time of his death, who often refer with emotion to the timely assistance he rendered them when struggling for existence in the early settlement of the country. Never was he known to take advantage of a man's necessities, never taking more than simple interest—and often none at all—on even a note. No honest man, however poor, was ever turned away empty-handed when applying to him for assistance. If by misfortune he lost a horse or an ox out of his team, he knew right where to go to supply its place. No one who ever knew this large-hearted man, and reads the above, will say that it does him more than simple justice.

Mr. Haydon was born in Montgomery Co., N. Y., in the year 1810. When quite a young man he went to Brandon, Vt., and engaged in the mercantile business; there he married Mary A., daughter of Aaron W. Broughton of that place, soon after removing to Hamilton, Van Buren Co., Mich., where he located one thousand acres of land in the year 1836, and began at once to make extensive improvements, and soon had an abundance with which to supply settlers who came in after him. He sold a portion of his large domain, but at the time of his death, which occurred March 10, 1866, owned about seven hundred acres. The fruits of his marriage with Miss Broughton were two sons,—Charles B., born in the year 1834, who enlisted as a private in the 2d Michigan Infantry at the outbreak of our late civil war, and soon rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in 1864 died of wounds received at Jackson, Miss. The other son, Arthur W., was born April 22, 1844, and about the year 1870 married Miss Elizabeth Baker, daughter of Hiram Baker, Esq., of Keeler township, and settled on a portion of the old homestead set off to him by the administrators, where he now lives in a neat and commodious dwelling on a well-cultivated farm, and ranks among the best citizens of this township. Mrs. (Broughton) Haydon died in 1948, and Oct. 24, 1850, Mr. Haydon married Adelia E. Buck, by whom he had three children,—F. Mortimer, born Feb. 24, 1859; Mary A., born Aug. 19, 1861; Blanche, born Aug. 16, 1865. Mortimer is at present engaged in a store in Decatur. Mary A. and Blanche are completing their education in the Ann Arbor University. The mother of these three children died very suddenly in Decatur, Jan. 24, 1877, while coming for her children in attendance at that school. She was a lady of rare accomplishments, loved and esteemed by all who knew her, and, like her honored husband, was most heartily mourned at her death.

Mr. Haydon never professed or talked religibn, but would every day of his life do more real Christian acts than nine-tenths of those who do profess and talk much.

In politics he was a Republican, and was an able advocate of his principles upon the stump. He served in the State Legislature from 1844 to 1851, also in 1859. Was elected supervisor of his township as long as he could be induced to serve.

OLD GLORY'S BIRTHDAY

Our Flag has been waving in the breeze since June 14, 1777, when it was adopted by the Continental Congress. U. S. Marines display the Stars and Stripes along with their regimental standard. At right: Grand Union, rattlesnake and pine tree flags, prominent among early colonial banners.

Romance has trailed Old Glory since it became our national flag 163 years ago. Since that time it has symbolized the hopes, aspirations and spirit of a nation devoted to the cause of liberty.

Prominent among early American flags, forerunners of the Stars and Stripes, were pine trees, rattlesnakes and other designs. The Grand Union flag, with a British jack appearing where forty-eight stars are now shown in a blue field, was the immediate ancestor of our national flag.

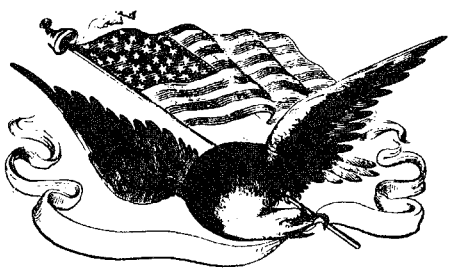
Pine tree flags were displayed by the cruisers of Washington's fleet which operated in New England waters, and such flags bore the words, "An appeal to Heaven."

Rattlesnake designs were frequently used by the southern colonies, and a flag of this type was carried by the U. S. Marines and bluejacks from the Continental Navy, who made a landing in the Bahamas in March, 1776. The rattlesnake symbol, with its motto, "Don't tread on me," also appeared on the drums of American Marines at that time.

The Grand Union flag was popular with naval men and it was sometimes called the "First Navy Ensign." There were scores of other colonial banners, each of which found special favor in the colony where it originated.

Even today there is a certain mystery about Old Glory. Historians fail to agree as to who designed it, although tradition points to Betsy Ross, a Quaker City seamstress, as the maker of the first Stars and Stripes adopted by the Continental Congress on June 14, 1777.

With a deep appreciation of the benefits we enjoy as citizens, each of us should display the Star-Spangled Banner on Flag Day, and by so doing honor the birth of our flag. No flag in the world is more beautiful. No flag spreads its folds over a more highly favored land than ours.



A HISTORY OF THE PLACE FAMILY

Written by Fannie Foster O'Rorke, Whose Mother Was a Place, and Read at the Reunion of the Place Family Descendants Held at the Home of Richard Howard August 27, 1939. This Copy Was Furnished the Republican by E. J. Wild of Corwin.

LAWRENCE LITCHFIELD, gentleman, according to best information, came from Kent, England, between 1930 and 1940 and located at Scituate, Massachusetts on, or near, Plymouth, Rock. The Litchfield and Lincoln families seem to have married at several times but what year Horace Litchfield and Ann Lincoln were married I have no record. Their first daughter, Fanny Kibby, was born August 13, 1815, and if I remember correctly there was a son, Howland, previous to that, as he, as oldest son, signed away all right and title of that family's share of the since valuable salt marshes.

Horace Litchfield was a tanner by trade and possibly lured by possibility of native material, moved to Malone, Franklin county, New York state, a northern city on the St. Lawrence river. The Lincoln family, too, must have migrated, for in the 1890's there were still two spinsters of the family living there.

Fanny Litchfield, 16 years old, was married to Horace Place of Vermont. Place was a clothier by trade, foreman or part owner, of the factory. Here two of their children were born, Elmina in 1833, March 2nd, and Fayette in November, 1834. When Fanny was 17 years old Elmina was born.

Then western Pennsylvania seemed a good place for the location of a cloth factory, and shipping their household effects by boat to Erie, Pa., they drove by sleigh, for I have heard mother say. Her father remarked, "Now take your last look at the old St. Lawrence." Mother always remembered how it looked. The waters of Lake Erie washed upon its banks and all the household effects of the family were swept away. Arriving in Pennsylvania they made their home on a little stream, tributary to the Allegheny river (and we of this generation know how treacherous those tributaries of the Ohio river can be, and also, as well, the Ohio itself) and proceeded to the making of cloth in their own factory.

Another son, Howland, was born and when he was three weeks old the family was aroused by Fanny. "We must run for our lives," with the smallest babe and two other little ones, again they saw all their worldly possessions swept away. Though their wealth did not accumulate the family continued to grow until there were six girls and three sons. Then Michigan allured and as grandmother once told me, "There was no more need for them to move there than for a dog to have two tails." But she was taught the wife must obey so on to a new farm in the wilds of Michigan again they moved. Grandmother, leaving her mother, father, sisters and brothers, with a husband knowing nothing of farming or woodcraft, one little girl, Inez, only beginning to walk. (The M. C. railroad had only been built to Lawton.) Fanny riding in an old farm wagon, over roads such as must have been at that time, out to Nesbitt's mills. So much of the way was swamp, even I can remember when the land from old Brown's tavern half way to the Maxwell place was cranberry bog.

None of the family had ever lived in the country and they had always gone to church. There was service, in a school house, nearly to the Territorial road, so mother started out in a light pink delaine dress, satinet slippers and a small hat with a green baize vail. Can you fancy how her outfit must have looked at the end of that walk through woods, etc. When mother was invited to a dance to be held the same night, such a conference was held as to the propriety, as they had been accustomed to formal invitations, issued about two weeks in advance, and new dresses for each party. Poor grandmother, her conventional soul was stirred to its depths.

Most neighbors were rather illiterate and their language must have seemed rather crude to one whose family made a fetish of education and good English. As I remember, she never could quite reconcile herself to her surroundings.

Mrs. Howard was one lady whom she respected among all her neighbors. Robert Nesbitt was always a good friend. Grandmother Place worked though weakened by malaria and various contagious diseases. When Emory was three months old grandfather died, leaving a family of ten for a young woman (grandmother) of 35 to rear. Poor family—fortunately Mina had been well educated, for that time, in Erie Academy so was able to teach. Commenced when she was 13 years old. Fayette, a most brilliant youngster, commenced working for various farmers. How they lived during that time we can only imagine ten children, the oldest 15, the youngest a babe, a new farm unpaid for, a young woman of 35. She sewed at tailoring, etc. Malaria was rampant. At one time all the family were down with measles, except mother, who had to be up all night to give medicine.

Grandmother's father came from Pennsylvania to be with the family after the father's death—his wife having died—and he was killed by a falling limb of a tree, only a short time after the other's death.

The children walked four miles to school. After being a widow five years, Isaac Rice, who worked for Robert Nesbitt, proposed marriage, offered to make a home for the five older children and to care for the five younger ones. She accepted and while some of the older ones objected, it really seemed a respite, so she accepted.

Rice fulfilled all his promises, took good care of her, paid for the land and while there were three children born to them only one lived, and she at the age of six years was stricken with infantile paralysis, never walking ater. He died after they had lived together 17 years.

At fifty grandmother was the brightest, most interesting person I ever knew. Her use of English was remarkable, how well I remember her corrections of my speech, how humiliated I was that she should have heard me make such errors.

Shall I tell how when the girls were home and all living in the old log house, each Saturday the doors were taken down, and they and the floors scrubbed with soap and sand? They spun the wool and flax and wove their own cloth—Linsey woolsey. Did I tell you her height? She was a little under 5 feet tall, could stand under Mr. Place's arm when it was extended straight out.

All her sisters were gifted, composed and wrote. One sister, Sarah, was editor of a weekly newspaper in Conneautville, Pennsylvania. All occupied high positions socially, the eldest who signed away the rights of the salt marshes was a tanner and the youngest brother was first U. S. Marshall of Dakota before statehood. Another brother went south to Georgia, was a tavern keeper, as hotel men were termed in those days.

How much of this is known to all or any of you I do not know.

JOLT CART.

Seventy-nine years ago there were two good boys born in Decatur township. When 4 years old they were taken to Decatur and bought their first pair of copper-toed boots. They were dressed in home made waists and pants. The pants were buttoned to the waists with six buttons and the pants had two pockets.

Those were the good old times when good boys were the pride of the family. They soon became useful around the old home. Grandmother raised geese and at a certain time of the year they had to be picked and their feathers made the feather beds and pillows that are used to this day in the homes of old settlers. I couldn't sleep if I didn't have a feather bed to lie on.

Grandmother would roll up her sleeves, pick out a goose and sit down in a chair and pick it. The goose would bite her arms whenever it got the chance and the two good little boys would be called on to hold its head. The big nice feather beds she made were laid on straw ticks and the ticks on cord beds.

Did you ever help cord a bed? I guess not, for if you had you would be nearly one hundred years old.

There was a stream of water that started up in the south part of the tamarack woods on the old homestead, now the Delbert Vought farm. The tamaracks made the water red and that is why they called it Red Run. There were two saw mills and a brick yard on the stream. A man by the name of Van Riper owned the brick yard. That was a long time before Kruse owned it. Old Hank Woods and Ezekiel Kimble owned the saw mills.

Red Run crossed the old homestead. Cows were pastured down in the swamp and they wallered in the mud up to their ears. Before they were milked they had to be washed off with a rag and plenty of water.

O, those were the good times. Grandfather would go to the barn and put the gear called harness on the horses and hitch them to the old crotch skeined wagon with keys to hold on the wheels. The spring seat was a piece of ash one by three inches in size set in a fork at each corner of the box with cross boards for seats. This old wagon had to be greased every trip, so they used soft soap for grease. They had plenty of it.

In the spring there were the sugar trees to be tapped by boring an inch hole in the tree, then driving a spile into the hole. Spiles were made of sumac stalks with a stub at one end shaped to fit the hole.

The rest of the spile was cut in half. A sharp hot rod was used to burn out the pith. Then the sugar troughs were placed under the spiles Troughs were cut in lengths about two feet, then chopped or hollowed out to hold the sap which was gathered and emptied into a large boiling pan and boiled to sugar off point.

Then these good little boys would dip out some of this syrup, pour it on snow or in cold water drawn from a 25 foot well, and that turned it to wax.

O, those good old times. The well with rope and bucket furnished all the water we could use. All that had to be done was to bring it up. We used soft soap to grease the windlass and the grind stone.

Of course we had all the wax we wanted, so did Nero, the dog. The sugar was poured into any kind of moulds and when cool was wrapped and put away for home use or to sell.

Those were the times when wood was plenty. Grandpap seemed to like to have the two little boys go with him on most all of his trips. They went with him when he made trips up the Chevelier hill. There the country was most all timber. On the Dan Brewer farm several acres of large trees were slashed or chopped down and burned when dry.

Rutabagas were sown among the tree stumps and logs and grew well as did all other crops.

In those days wild grapes, elder berries, huckleberries and cranberries grew thick in the woods, and all you had to do was to go out and pick them. If you wanted a turkey and you were a fairly good shot all you had to do was go out into the swamp and get one.

There were also deer in the swamp and there were no hunters' licenses to pay. How would you like to go back to the good days?

Now put the gear on the horses and hitch them to the wagon for we are going to Decatur three miles away. We cross the old swamp road that has been made passable by laying tamarack poles across and covering them with sand. There was a turn out place every so often so teams could pass.

The swamp was so soft that the ground would shake or weave for several rods on each side of the road as you drove over it.

As time went on the road was laid with oak stringers. Two inch plank were laid on end and spiked to stringers. It made a good road for several years. I think this cost about $4,000. We crossed our old road bridge and came on into town, the best little town in the state.

We then walked up Main street on a board sidewalk. All but one or two of the stores of those days were built of wood. We went into one of them for a stick of candy and some peanuts with shells on. Grand dad bought salt and crackers by the barrel and some strong cheese, home made butter, plug and smoking tobacco, high shoes and boots.

Your socks were knitted at home. Those were the times when women wore long dresses and used side saddles.

O, I could go on and on, but what is the use? I can look back on the farm and see those barrels of salt meat, ham and shoulders, and sausage put down in lard, a barrel of sorghum molasses and a barrel of good cider, plenty of good red apples.

Two rows of current bushes always yielded a good crop. All of which seems good, but you would not like to swing the old grain cradle or mowing scythe or bind the grain into bundles.

You had to cut down trees with an axe for there were no cross cut saws.

But there were cornstalk fiddles.

LAKESIDE DREAM VILLAGE

(This interview was obtained from Peter Gaertig by Fred W. Green at the request of the Republican.

Have you ever heard the expression "Right under your nose"? It is frequently heard and has lots of meaning. For instance very few know what is going on at the Bagley farm by the Lake of the Woods, recently sold to Peter Gaertig by the last owner, Earl Bishop.

Mr. Gaertig is converting this land into a subdivision and is to erect homes and a number of cottages for a summer colony.

This undertaking is greater than one at first would suppose, but Mr. Gaertig is no amateur at subdividing land and erecting houses. He has followed that business for a number of years, and for a long time knew that the Bagley farm was an ideal spot for a subdivision both for permanent homes and a summer colony.

The time is ripe for home building. Decatur was never so badly off as at present for homes. Our town has progressed in everything except building homes. Mr. Gaertig expects to build homes that will be sold for as low as $1500, 4 rooms with bath and all modern conveniences, gas, electric lights and city water. The location is three blocks from the city limits, and it is expected Decatur will do one of two things, extend the water mains or bring the subdivision into the city limits. But that is in the future.

The homes are to be built of stone and cement, no two alike, they will be surrounded with suitable landscape that will be a pleasure to behold, and will be homes to be proud of. He expects to build a bathing beach, and a swimming pool to be used exclusively by the dwellers residing on the subdivision.

A lighthouse with revolving light is to be erected as a beacon to guide those venturing out on the lake after night fall. Streets will be cut through from one end of the subdivision to the other, and at frequent places cross streets are to be built as needed.

Already some trees have been planted, but to give one an idea of what Mr. Gaertig anticipates doing he tells me he has already purchased a total of 3,000 trees which he expects to plant this coming spring. There are 250 Holly trees, 1,000 Cedar, 100 Rhododendron, 100 Colorado Spruce, 100 Hemlock, 200 Shortleaf Pine, 200 Lombardy Poplar, 100 Weeping Willows, 100 Pine Virginians, 100 Papaws, 100 Magnolia Umbrellas, 100 Magnolia Cucumber, 100 Sweetwood Gum, 100 Sycamore Gum, 100 America Sycamore, 100 Texas Umbrella, 100 Red Dogwood, 100 Magnolia Big Leaf, 200 Red Bud. It is expected these will all be planted in the spring of 1940. Mr. Gaertig calls this subdivision Lakeside Dream Village.

The homes are expected to be of different design, American, English, Colonial and Dutch. Streets are to be a blaze of light. An electric fountain is to be installed, the main entrance is to be arched, all made of field stones. When these improvements are finished Decatur will be proud of the Dream City. It will fill a want long looked for, as there is room enough for a large number of homes and they will be erected as fast as the demand is made.

Mr. Gaertig invites any interested citizen to call on him, either at his home or at the Dream Village where he is now erecting a home for himself overlooking the lake. Decatur has neglected its home building program for many years, and Mr. Gaertig believes this subdivision will stimulate the building industry and will be the means of providing Decatur with homes that people will be proud to own and live in.

He wishes me to say that perhaps there are some who may differ with him about Decatur needing additional homes, but he believes no one will deny there are many homes that are not up to the standard of a first class village which Decatur is. It is entitled to have homes razed that have served their usefulness provided they work no hardship on the people who are using them.

The opening of this new subdivision will pave the way to secure modern homes with up-to-date surroundings that can be paid for almost the same as paying rent.

Mr. Gaertig points out that since Mr. Greenberg has opened his Lake of the Woods Camp for both boys and girls, Lake of the Woods property has had quite a boom and very few are aware of it.

Mr. Ackley has been successful as a resort owner as have many others on the Lake of the Woods Shores. Walter Woods also has erected beautiful resort homes and has seen them occupied every month of the season year. Besides these there is the beautiful home of Mr. Sundstrum, who has pinned his faith on the Lake of the Woods property. All of these have been erected RIGHT UNDER OUR NOSES, with but few knowing of their existence. Truly this is getting to be a great town.

ONE OF THE EARLY FIRES OF MAIN STREET

Back in the early eighties the Decatur business street suffered a serious conflagration. It has suffered many disastrous fires. At one time and another practically the whole business street has gone up in smoke.

This fire of the early eighties broke out in the Lee drug store, a frame building located where Slack's food store is now. It burned a half dozen frame buildings and was stopped at the Shaad store, located then where Rawson's kandy kitchen is at the present time.

The fire broke out about ten o'clock at night. Will Noble was night operator at the depot and Walter Brown was hanging around. There was always from one to a half dozen fellows hanging around the depot, keeping company with the operator in those days. Telegraphy was a favorite trade with the boys and some of our best operators got the idea of learning it by spending their idle time there.

Walt. heard somebody cry, "fire!" and the next minute he was on the street. There were few people out at that time of the night, and there were no telephones and nor organized fire company such as we have today.

Walt's first thought was to spread the alarm and get the people out to fight. He ran to the Presbyterian church, climbed through a window, found the bell rope and rang the old bell till he had most of the town out.

One day last month he was going past the church when Arthur Brigham was ringing the bell for services. It did not have just the right sound and he asked Arthur what became of the church bell of the eighties. Arthur did not know and we are wondering if anybody knows.

Trails End at Eagle Lake

Trails End is a colored summer resort located at the west end of Eagle lake on property originally known as the Old Abbott place. The Abbott family lived there before the Civil War and the head of the family died of cancer during the war period. James Cotton, our informant, cannot remember the first name of Abbott but says his father, Josh. Cotton, took care of him during his last sickness. Abbott's widow married David Woodman, father of Edson and Jason Woodman.

Eugene Hinckley bought the property of the Abbott estate and in turn sold it to Robert Hamilton. The resort property consists of a strip of about ten acres extending along the lake shore.

Hamilton sold the strip to Roy Mitchell of Kalamazoo in 1926, and he still owns it. He divided it into lots and sold at least 18 of them, for 18 cottages have been built there.

Mitchell built a big dance hall and it draws crowds of young colored people every summer. Some of the lots were sold for $400 and it cost $3,000 to build some of the cottages. They are finished for year around living, and contain furnaces, bath rooms and expensive furniture.

Trails End draws its summer visitors from Chicago, South Bend, Kalamazoo, Niles and Benton Harbor.

A couple of years ago the champion prizefighter, Joe Louis, tried to buy 500 acres of land along the south shore of the lake adjoining Trails End, but some of the owners refused to sell. He could not get as many acres in one piece as he wanted and abandoned the plan.

Some of the cottages are occupied the year around. The state road is kept open during the winter and mail is delivered there daily from Paw Paw.

In the early days there was an island in front of the shore at Trails End. Now the water is lower and the island has become a part of the mainland. It contains a fine oak grove and the owner derives considerable revenue by renting it to tenters and for picnic ground.

Decatur Woman Recalls Indians and Ox Teams

One of Decatur's pioneer women is Elizabeth Conrad. She observed her 86th birthday on November 17, last, She is the last survivor of her family and was born at Quebec, Canada, November 17, 1853. A practical nurse, she lives alone today, having retired at 80.

Decatur was virtually a wilderness when Mrs. Conrad came here to live. The town embraced four stores, a hotel, the Duncombe House, the Tase tavern.

Oxen, not horses, were used mostly by the settlers; the Michigan Central ran but one train a week. They didn't hitch-hike in those days, says Mrs. Conrad. She recalls walking to and from Dowagiac and Cassopolis, Lawrence, Lawton and Paw Paw.

In November, 1873, she was married to Nelson Conrad of Decatur. They were the parents of four children, of Kalamazoo, and Mrs. Ella Goble, of Decatur. One daughter, Mrs. Doris Goble, died seven years ago. Soon after their marriage they went to live on a farm south of the village, over the Fifield hill. This was before the land was drained and the new swamp road built. She tells of walking to town and in crossing the swamp, in the wet season, wading through water to her waist.

Mrs. Conrad relates many interesting things regarding their association with the Indians when they first came to Michigan. Two special occurences stand out in her memory, due to the extreme fright she experienced. Although the Indians at all times tried to be hospitable, she tells of one time when she and her playmates came unexpectedly upon an Indian tepee in the woods. The Indians forced the children to enter their wigwam, through kindness only, which the children did not understand, and they forced gifts of moccasins and beads upon them.

Another time when her father was away from home two Indian men came to their home and demanded to be admitted. This the mother refused to do, but they remained until the father rturned. The father was not sure whether it was a friendly visit or not, but was afraid to refuse them hospitality. When night came the Indians laid down on the floor with their feet to the open fire and showed their intentions to remain for the night. Even though their home was a one-room cabin. Mrs. Conrad tells of her extreme fear and how she sat up in bed, between her parents, afraid to lay down all through the night.

Mrs. Conrad scoffs at the present idea of hard times and depressions and tells how her husband cut bolts by hand for $5 per cord. He never received more than 75 cents for a day's labor; how they paid ten cents for a bar of soap and one dollar for a small sack of flour, and how when living on the farm, they sold eggs for five cents a dozen.

AN INDIAN STORY

By: Nellie Sibley

(Myron Stanford moved west from the Detroit area about one hundred years ago and became one of the early supervisors of Decatur Township.)

Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Stanford, at one time, lived in the woods not far from Detroit. They had cleared a little spot, built a log cabin, and planted a small garden. It was about 1838 or 1840. There was an Indian trail near their home and very often Indians stopped at their cabin.

One day a lone Indian called, whose hand had been wounded, and was bleeding profusely. Aunty Stanford washed and dressed the wound. For thanks the Indian smiled — the only time she ever saw an Indian smile.

Not long afterward the Indians went on a rampage, burning cabins, killing some of the inhabitants and taking a twelve-year old girl captive.

One day Aunty had just taken fresh bread from the oven, when suddenly three Indians entered the room. She was startled, especially when one of them stepped up close to her and showed her his scarred hand. He said, "Me no hurt." Then picking up a loaf of bread he left the cabin followed by the other two.

He was the Indian whose wounded hand she had dressed. When outside the door this Indian took a gay feather from his head gear and fastened it by the door, saying, "Indians see — no hurt." Afterward when neighbors' cabins were burned by the Indians, the Stanford cabin was not molested.

Indians never forget a kindness; neither do they forget an unkindness. Aunty Stanford told me lots of stories about her pioneer days when she was young.

A Half Million Dollar Fire

Red and Reynolds Woolfe, Jim Adduci and the Mayor went over to the Houppert Winery fire at Lawton last Friday.

A half million dollar fire would be a good heading for it. That is what they claim the damage was, the Mayor said.

They drove over to see if they could be of any help, but the building was past saving when they got there. The fire started at about 12:30 p.m. and they got there at 1:15.

The Lawton firemen telephoned for the Kalamazoo fire department and the department responded with all kinds of hose which under the conditions, was a great benefit. They strung a quarter of a mile of hose. To do that they had to cut in on the line as a booster, and they did throw some water.

They tapped one of the big tanks of wine and it ran wild and made a pool. They put the hose into the pool and drafted it with water from a creek and poured the water and wine combination on the burning building to put out the fire.

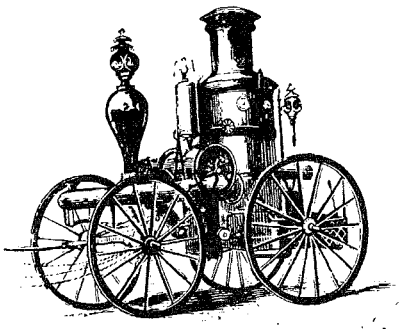
Two trucks from Paw Paw, two trucks from Lawton and the whole fire department of Marcellus, besides the Kalamazoo department were on the ground fighting the fire. It made a lively spectacle and there was a multitude of people there to see it.

The fire was in the upper story and when it got to the ground floor so much water was thrown on to it that it was choked. The wine that was in the cellar was saved. It was unprotected for a while and there was so much of it that it attracted the human beings like flies, and they had to call on the sheriff and his deputies to save it.

The winery is a stock company with William C. Houppert the principal owner. Nobody seemed to know how the fire caught and the origin was put down as unknown. That will satisfy the insurance companies.

They said over at Lawton that the company will begin rebuilding Monday, so it must have been insured pretty well.

Here is a tip to fire fans who are in the habit of chasing fire trucks to fires,—The Peter Pan Bread Company driver was given a ticket for driving over a fire hose at Lawton. He was cited to appear over before Justice of the Peace Larry Davis in Paw Paw. It is a state offense and he will probably get a heavy fine if they convict him.



The Giant Trees in Newton Woods

By Charles A. Weissert in the Kalamazooo Gazette.

To those who like outdoor life, Newton woods, one of the few fragments of Michigan's forest primeval which so far has escaped extensive use of the ax, officers during these spring days some distinctive attractions. Aside from the gigantic trees, some of which tower more than 100 feet, there is a greater variety of bird and plant life than can be found in woods on cutover land.

Before undergrowths are in foliage, the huge trees with buttress-like root expansions extending several feet above ground, can be seen to best advantage. As many trees were cut out years ago, this forest has lost the gloomy density of the wilderness. Here, however, may be visualized the great task which awaited the settlers. The ax was a tiny weapon for one man to use in attacking such immense trunks—from three to six, and sometimes eight feet in diameter—and clear of branches up to 80 or more feet. Through the "foliage roof" the sunlight penetrated only here and there.

Produced Large Crops

Many from the Atlantic states were amazed on arrival to find on their land such immense trees. Over-awed, they stood in the deep shade and listened to the never-ceasing, surf-like sound the wind was making in the lofty branches, some of which were as large as the trunk of a good-sized tree today. Appalled by the clearing job confronting them, some climbed into their covered wagons and started for an open country, ready for the plow. Others remaining, felled tree after tree, until they had a clearing large enough for a log cabin and a garden. By the next year, they might have enough room to plant a first crop amidst the stumps.

A year later the size of the clearing might be doubled —and so on, year after year, the forest was compelled to yield space. Occasionally a settler, with health broken by privations, did not live to see his farm cleared. The soil which grew the many century-old trees produced incredibly large crops until the nutritive element was exhausted.

Newton woods today has a spaciousness lacking in other forests. For observation, there is plenty of distance between the trees, especially among the gray-barked beeches. This is the realm of the woodpecker. Many of these birds are heard continuously hammering high up in the branches. Several varieties remain all winter. There is a noticeable lack of song birds, which prefer fields, meadows, small growths, and sociability of farmyards.

Cover 80 Acres

Although the wood covers nearly 80 acres, round the east side of which flows Dowagiac creek, the tallest trees may be seen from the Decatur-Cassopolis highway which passes through the center of the tract.

As soon as the snow disappears, the forest floor on the west side of the road is for several days covered with Dutchman's Breeches, interspersed here and there with bloodroot, while on the east side there are few of these varieties, but many hepaticas, some of giant size, growing in hollow places between roots of the large trees and on decaying, moss-covered logs.

Newton woods is about 7 miles directly south of Decatur, and about 9 miles north of Cassopolis. The Decatur-Cassopolis road, recently blacktopped, passes through some of the finest scenery in southwestern Michigan. Especially attractive is the view across the valley from the range of hills 3 miles south of Decatur.

ADMINISTERS SACRAMENT OF CONFIRMATION

Most Rev. Joseph H. Albers, D.D., J.C.D., Bishop of Lansing, administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to a class of fifty at Holy Family church, Wednesday evening. The candidates for confirmation are members of Holy Family church, Decatur, and St. Anne church, Cassopolis. The latter is a mission of Decatur.

It was an important event in the parish, and Father Cook's parishoners coming from this locality, Cassopolis and Marcellus were on hand to greet their Bishop and heard him as the successor of the Apostles, deliver the instruction to the confirmation class.

The attending clergy were Very Rev. Joseph V. Coyle, St. Joseph; Very Rev. George Witteman, Benton Harbor; Rev. M. J. Cassidy, Dowagiac; Rev. A. Deleviere, Dowagiac; Rev. J. Beauvois, Paw Paw; Rev. CARL B. SQUIER NEW MANAGER OF LOCKHEED CO.

(The following notice was taken from the Detroit Free Press. Carl Squier is a former resident of Decatur, a son of Harley E. Squier of Buchanan and nephew of Ex-Supervisor Emory H. Squier.)

Appointment of Captain Carl B. Squier formerly of the United States air force and well known aviation expert, as general manager of the Detroit Aircraft corporation's Lockheed division is announced by Edward S. Evans, president.

At the close of the World war Mr. Squier was made chief test pilot at Colem-Bey where he had the opportunity of flying 22 different types of planes and subsequenty was named one of the five pilots assigned to the Peace Conference, carrying dispatches to all parts of the Allied countries.

Upon his return from Europe Mr. Squier organized the Rubber Merchandising company which was purchased by the United States Rubber Company after three years of successful business. His organization work was continued when he spent some time organizing chapters of the National Aeronautical association throughout the United States.

Since the first of the year Mr. Squier has been connected with the Eastman Flying-Boat corporation, another division of the Detroit Aircraft corporation.

REMEMBERS WHEN LINCOLN WAS SHOT

(Arthur Shaw, the writer of this letter, was a son of John A. Shaw for whom the Shaw school district was named, one of the best known farmers of his time in Van Buren county. Arthur Shaw was born in Decatur township and was 4 years old when the Civil War broke out. In his long and useful life he has seen much of the United States, and his work as a teacher of both old and young has taken him from Montana to Maryland. It is quite probable that he is the only person now living who attended the exciting meeting at the Bell schoolhouse in Porter, but if there is another person among the Republican's readers who recalls it, shall be glad to hear from them. We are greatly pleased at receiving this interesting letter from Mr. Shaw and shall look forward to further reminiscences from him.)

Dear Friend Arba:

I thank you for your card of Jan. 2nd. Inclosed find $1.50 for the Decatur Republican for 1942.

I'll be glad to write you about my memories of early Decatur days. I too "wish you a Happy New Year good health and comfort."

I distinctly recall the enlistments made in the civil war by neighbors all about us. I came on the stage of action April 30, 1857.

I remember of watching for my father to come home from Decatur with soldier clothes. We were disappointed. He was told by the officers that they thought with his large family his duty was at home.

A near neighbor was drafted and paid for another man to go in his place.

I recall having gone to the Bell School House in Porter township on the first Sunday after President Lincoln was assassinated. After the speaker had taken his position on the platform a sharp discussion arose about the assassination of Lincoln. The women massed together between the two crowds opposing each other's views.

The women prevented any fighting going on, but there were no more church services, and I do not recall any after that in the Bell schoolhouse.

After that I had to memorize with the pupils in the Shaw school the following:

"Revenge is a cruel sword. It has neither hilt nor guard. Would thou wield this brand of the Lord? Is thy grasp then firm and hard? But the firmer the grasp of the blade, the deeper the wound in thy hand is made. And when the blade from thy hand has flown, instead of finding it bathed in the heart of the foe, thou wilt find it sheathed in thine own."

"Vengeance is mine. I will repay," saith the Lord. "If thine enemy hunger feed him: if he thirst give him drink. In so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

Life is real, life is earnest and the grave is not it's goal, Dust thou art, to dust returnest, was not spoken of the soul.
Let us then be up and doing with a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing, learn to labor and to wait.
Lives of great persons—all remind us.
We can live our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us,
Footprints on the sands of time.
Footprints that perchance another,
Sailing o'er life's troubled main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing may take hope again."

After Lincoln's assassination a crowd had assembled opposite the Wall Street Exchange Building in New York City. Some shooting had been going on before the crowd was brought to order to listen to General Garfield.

He said, "Gentlemen, God reigns and the government at Washington now lives. His pavillion is dark waters and thick clouds of the sky. Justice and judgment are the establishment of his throne. Mercy and truth shall go before his face. God reigns and the government at Washington now lives."

The assembly came to order and there was no more shooting on this occasion about the Wall Street Exchange Building.

I have visited the building in which Lincoln was assassinated. It is now used by the government as a Memorial building of Abraham Lincoln.

Twice I have visited Gettysburg, and committed the Gettysburg address, consisting of ten sentences, containing 267 words and delivered in less than three minutes. I have the address copied on one side of an envelope. Edward Everett who had been governor of Massachusetts, U. S. Senator, Secretary of State, Minister to Great Britain, and president of Harvard, spoke two hours.

Later I'll write you what D. Wickett took me to see when he found me behind the front door in your office.

Gratefully yours,
A. L. Shaw.

THE SONS OF METHODIST MINISTERS

Floyd Odlum, a Decatur High School Boy 25 Years Ago, is Now Considered One of the Country's Ablest Professional Men

Children of Methodist ministers who have served in Decatur have turned out well. That may be one reason why Decatur has had so many good and capable Methodist ministers, — they want their children to turn out well.

Theo. Proutty, who passed away at his home near Los Angeles a few weeks ago, became nationally known as an inventor and was highly esteemed in the west where he had resided some twenty years. His father was the Methodist minister of Decatur during the eighties.

Foss Eldred, the well known attorney of Ionia, who was the Republican dry candidate for Congress in the recent election in the Eighth Michigan district and went down to defeat before the Democratic wet candidate from Saginaw, was a son of Rev. A.N. Eldred, who was pastor of the Methodist church here during the nineties.

A few days ago Mrs. Allie Rosevelt sent the Republican a page from the magazine, "Time", of August, '17, 1931, which contained a picture and sketch of Floyd Odlum who attended the Decatur High school 23 or 24 years ago and whose father was then our Methodist pastor.

This story of Mr. Floyd Odlum and his activities is copied from Time, —

Bigger Atlas

Notoriously miserable has been the record of investment trusts as a group. Notably excellent has been the record of one trust: Atlas Utilities Corp. Last week Atlas, still little known beyond the purlieus of Wall Street, acquired control of two well known investment trusts, and with them, management contracts.

The deals marked the eighth and ninth acquisitions made by Atlas since last October. President of the company is a quiet, modest man of 39 who is considered one of the ablest men in the country yet is as obscure as his company. He is Floyd Bostwick Odlum, whose other chief interests are his vice-presidency of Electric Bond & Share and his vice-chairmanship of its big unit, American & Foreign Power Co. Seldom in the public prints, he was written up two years ago for conducting the "most expensive telephone call." London—New York, 95 Min. $1,425. Slim, nonchalant, sandy-haired & freckled, Floyd Bostwick Odlum studied law at University of Colorado, in New York started work with Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett of Manhattan. In their office he became a close friend of George Henry Howard, seven years his senior. Just as Lawyer Odlum left to take charge of the legal department of Electric Bond & Share, so, two years ago, Lawyer Howard left to become president of United Corp.

In 1924 the two men formed a private investment trust, first called U.S. Company, later Atlas Utilities Corp. The original investment of $40,000 was the base for the trust.

First of the two trusts bought by Atlas last week was Ungerleider Financial Corp., formed in 1929 under the management of Samuel Ungerleider & Co., whose senior partner is cheery "Ohio Sam" Ungerleider. The other was Sterling Securities Corp., formed three years ago by the interests which sponsored Insuranshares Corp. It has two Hayden, Stone & Co. men on the board, was one of the first two investment trusts listed on the New York Stock Exchange (the other: General Public Service Corp.) Assets of the two trusts at the end of last year were $9,000,000 and $20,000,000 respectively. Atlas now has $25,000,000 in assets, controls a total investment structure of $48,000,000. Despite their many duties, friends Howard & Odlum still have time to go trout fishing together at the Howard camp, Mount Hansfield in Vermont.

I AM AN AMERICAN
(Our MacArthur)

On old Luzon he saw cold death
Fall cruelly from the sky,
And the "Stars and Stripes forever"
Is his lusty battle cry.. . .

He vows retaliation,
And he shall not wince or hedge—
For "The Stars and Stripes Forever"
Is his solitary pledge. . . .

Thru our dogged, dismal struggle
And our trying, dying days
"The Stars and Stripes Forever"
Is the only prayer he prays. . . .

For, ebullient in his spirit
And flaming in his eye
Are "The Stars and Stripes Forever"
Till the day that he must die!

Bert Kidman Retires After 55 Years at Blacksmith Trade in Decatur

COURTESY BENTON HARBOR NEWS-PALLADIUM

Bert Kidman Has Re-established His Business With The Times

Gone is the spreading chestnut tree, gone are the horse and buggy days, but not the village blacksmith. That is, not this blacksmith. At the age of 55 years, Bert Kidman still finds his trade lively and plentiful. Different from many blacksmiths who deserted the trade with the advent of the automotive age, Bert assumed a philosophical attitude toward the transformation taking place before his very eyes.

Autos Can't Be Shod

True the auto couldn't be shod as horses were, but there were many things that could be done. Thus, Bert Kidman called upon his knowledge of carpentry, his resource of imagination, and even on a mind of inventive turn and created for himself an important place in the life of growing Decatur. Today he is a specialist in building racks for trucks, mint-setters, and even shoeing a horse or two now and then.

Came Here 30 Years Ago

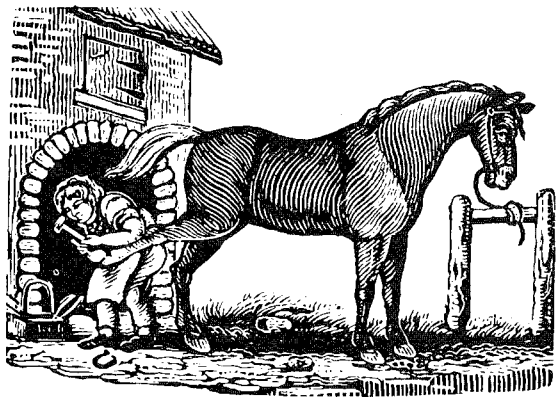
Bert Kidman came to Decatur 30 years ago from Fritzburg where he had learned the Smithy's trade in his father's shop along with his two brothers. At that time there were five shops in Decatur and plenty of business for all. A broken leg received from a kicking horse, a course in blacksmithing taken with the International Correspondence School, days when he employed four men, shod race horses, belonged to the Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and attended their convention winning first prize on a barred shoe forged entirely with a hammer, are experiences Mr. Kidman well remembers.

Recalls Recent Projects

In recent years he recalls a horse pulling contest he staged at the 1939 Celery Festival, furnishing and forging three tons of metal used in the construction of the Village Hall, and rigging up four trucks for Rural Electrification Projects in Van Buren and Cass Counties.

Is Civic Minded

In the many years of residence in Decatur, Bert has reared two daughters, served the community for 18 years as a member of the school board and served as president of the Rod and Gun Club in past years. The fact that he is now working on a folding chair in his spare time is ample proof that Bert Kidman still has a real interest in life.



Wm. I. Washburn, A Soldier of the Civil War

(E. R. Washburn went South to Florida with his son Kermit and family. They left Sunday before Christmas and returned the 19th of January. While there they camped at Palmetto, across the river from Bradenton. James Elliott and family were at Bradenton and returned home with them. Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Haefner are still there. We have often asked Mr. Washburn to write for the Republican and a few days ago were rewarded with these interesting remembrances of his family history.)

Memories awakened in the mind of E. R. Washburn when he, with Kermit and family were passing through Murfreesboro, Tennessee. These memories are from stories told by Wm. I. Washburn to his family of which E. R. W. was the second son.

Murfreesboro is located in the somewhat rugged hill country of middle Tennessee and here was fought one of the important battles of the Civil War. Father's part in the battle was the driving of a six mule team hitched to an ammunition wagon. He had been enlisted in Company D, 101st Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He had been stricken with that dread disease, the scourge of so many soldiers in the wars of former years. He became so emaciated that his weight dropped from 180 pounds to less than 100.

Leave was given him to go to his home in Huron Co., Ohio, to recuperate and at the end of the furlough he returned to the army and was given an easier job, that of driving an ammunition wagon, where he could ride instead of being always on his feet. The Confederates stampeded the mule train by shooting down the lead teams. Many wagons were overturned and father was caught under his and held there till the battle was over. A stone the size of a man's fist was under him and the loaded wagon was holding him firmly, so that, struggle as he might he could not free himself. Finally his comrades freed him, but he never entirely recovered from the strain of that long hard struggle.

That experience eventually helped him to get an increase of pension, from eight to twelve dollars per month as the board of examiners agreed that the much enlarged veins of his lower limbs were in part at least, due to his severe struggling to free himself while held under the overturned ammunition wagon. The increase in pension proved a boon to him in the support of his family. Much later the government greatly increased his pension enabling him to pass his later years in comparative ease.

An interesting bit of romance took place in the pioneer life of my parents. Father was born in Greenwich township, Huron Co., Ohio, July 18, 1843. His father was of Quaker parentage but his mother was not, so grandfather was dropped from membership in the Quaker Church because he married out of the church. Mother was born in Ripley township, adjoining Greenwich on July 11, 1850, of partial Quaker descent. They were fairly near neighbors and as the children grew father often went to her home to rock the baby in her little hewed walnut log cradle.

As they grew older they attended the same district school. When father was 17 years old he enlisted in the Union Army. Grandfather, being of Quaker descent did not want his son to be a soldier and took his name off the roll as he had a right to do at that time. When father was 18 years old he enlisted again and then really became a soldier and remained in the army for three years lacking only eight days.

Near the close of his term of service he was transferred to one of the squads selected to capture Jefferson Davis.

Among mother's immediate ancestors was Nancy Davis whose paternal ancestor was a Davis descended from an uncle of Jefferson Davis.

After the war was over and when mother was seventeen years of age, she and father were married. So the soldier boy who was one of those chosen to capture the President of the Confederacy, came home and married his childhood playmate, a girl distantly related to the man he tried to help capture. Father was not in the squad that finally took the President of the Confederacy.

Some time after mother passed away father went to the Soldiers' Home in Grand Rapids. Each year he would get a leave of absence and visit each of his five children. Finally in 1925 he realized that his end was near and he wrote me that he wanted to come to Decatur and live with Myrtie and me. He said he did not want to die among strangers but wished to be with his own people when the end came. He came in November, 1925, and Dr. W. P. Bope attended him till the end came. He passed away early in July, 1926. In a casket draped in the colors he loved so well he was taken to Freeport, Michigan, where his remains were laid to rest beside those of the near daughter of the Southland whose cradle he had rocked so many years before.

Decatur Doings

From Joanna Abshagen comes this bit of verse:

Why mope, my lad, on a sunny day,
While the rest of the world out side are at play,
And why all the gloom 'cause the world looks blue
When you turn your back to the sunny view.
Just because you failed is never a sign
That you won't be able to make the climb.
So back with the shoulders, and up with the head,
And toss away all the gloom and the dread.
For gloom and dispair are no pathways to fame,
Take courage, my lad, and try it again.

SPRING AGAIN

By Ruth Brigham

A sniff of spring air with the birds singing 'round
And straight comes the longing to get on the ground,
To rush out of doors and into the sun
And view the faint signs of the season begun.
We poke round the yard or gaze up at the trees
While we breathe the spring fragrance borne in on the breeze.
'Tis fun to discover the green peeping through
The dull crust of earth her robe to renew;
And tips of the tulips and hyacinth sweet
With snowdrop and crocus give promise replete.
The fields lie in wait now soggy and dark,
But secret and deep in their breast stirs life's spark,
The germ, the bright hope for which we wait
In human impatience to hurry its fate.
But an all wise Nature withholds her hand
And knowingly smiles o'er all the land.

Turkey Run State Park

By Catherine Howland

(Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howland and daughters, Monica and Catherine, took a vacation trip down into Indiana early in the summer. It was a trip filled with both historical and scenic interest and Miss Catherine has favored the Republican with an interesting sketch of it. When we read her account of the trip we wondered why we had not known more about this interesting place which is less than 200 miles from Decatur. The park could be visited in a day. It is quite likely that this story will send others there for an outing and to learn more about our neighboring state. Shall be glad if, when they go, they will report their trip.

The travel stories published in the Republican are especially valuable in that they help others to become better acquainted with their home country. The stories are always welcome.)

Some wag, with little of inspiration or awe for the sublime majesty of the enchanting limestone rock formations and for the scenic beauty of Turkey Run, has remarked, "No wonder the turkeys ran!" However a few of Indiana's naturalists inspired by the sight of Turkey Run's deep-cut twisting canyons, its acres of virgin timber, and its profusion of bird and plant life iniated a series of nationally known state parks.

The park was originally intended to be a memorial to a century of statehood, but didn't become a state park until 1916 after its sponsors had faced many disappointments and had overcome many handicaps.

It is located on road 47, a short distance off road 41, near the small town of Marshall in Parke county. It has an area of more than thirteen hundred acres and within its boundaries is to be found a variety of plant and animal life.

There is an interesting story connected with the naming of the park. In an early day great flocks of wild turkeys inhabited the region and this area was a favorite rendezvous for Indian tribes who used the dark, cool, canyons as a storage place for meat. Legend has it that the Indians and pioneers killed the turkeys for food but another version of the story is as follows: When the early settlers came in they found the birds to be a positive menace, as the turkeys moved in on their crops like grasshoppers. As a result those pioneer farmers decided to deal with their feathered enemies in their own way. They made the last "round-up" by herding the "turks" into an amphitheater surrounded by steep shelved walls of rock. That particular part of the canyon was called "Turkey Hollow" because it was the favorite roosting place for thousands of turkeys and the projecting rock ledges were ideally suited as perches. After the birds had gathered for the night the farmers started a wholesale slaughter which, in time, practically brought about the extinction of the wild turkey in that locality. Today those rocky projections which made such natural roosting places are covered with rows of delicate beech fern, wild ginger, and over-hanging vines.

In 1821 a goodly share of the land now in the park became the property of Captain Salmon Lusk as a reward for his military services. Sugar Creek, a lovely, wide stream which flows through the acreage, appealed to him as a site for a water-powered gristmill. He was a native of Vermont and the rugged terrain of that locality was ideal for his purposes. It was there, too, that a covered bridge was built and it still stands today.

The Indians had given Sugar Creek the intriguing name "Pungosecone" meaning "stream of sugar trees" because of the number of those trees growing along its banks. This creek is one of the arteries of drainage in Indiana and it is an interesting fact that about eighty-five per cent of the drainage of the state tends toward south-western Indiana instead of to the Mississippi River.

Foundations of the Lusk mill, cut in the solid rock, are visible today although the building itself was carried away in a flood in 1847. The mill race and the carvings in the rock ledges were chiseled by hand one hundred years ago. One of the points of interest for park visitors is the Lusk home. Both Lusk and his son loved the area and credit is due them for preserving the forest, one of the few virgin tracts left in Indiana.

In 1915 after the death of John Lusk, the son, this tract of land was offered for sale. The group of public-spirited people who had tried to establish a state park as a memorial to Indiana's century of statehood succeeded in raising funds by subscription and legislative appropriation to purchase the area. As a result, thousands of visitors from all parts of the United States have had the opportunity to relax here and enjoy the awe-inspiring handiwork of a Master Hand.

There are twenty-eight miles of foot trails in the park and the deep canyons reveal rare secrets for the naturalist. Broad opportunities for the study of birds, trees, plants and geologic formations present themselves.

The history of Turkey Run begins far back in the centuries, before the glacial movements and the coal-forming ages, with the elements carving out the deep gorges through the Mansfield sandstone. Today the student of geology finds the rocky canyons a fertile field for the pursuit of study. Equally valuable and interesting to the botanist are the countless species of plant life which grow in undisturbed abundance throughout the park today.

The lichen-covered rocks with over-hanging plants and vines presents a picture that is entirely pleasing to the eye. In some of the canyons the rocks are covered with masses of liverworts (marchantia) whose delicate umbrella-like reproductive structures form a miniature pattern of artistic perfection.

Other plants of outstanding beauty or interest are the purple and white trilliums, the lovely Virginia bluebell, a species of spiderwort, baneberry (doll's eyes), ground mint, wild ginger, yellow lady's slipper, pineapple plant and various wild grasses including the bristle brush grass.

Another interesting specimen is the cancer root, a primitive, non-green plant which grows in a manner similar to the Indian Pipe. The naturalists who conduct the tours through the area are almost convinced that the plant is a parasite on the red oak as it is nearly always found near the decayed stump of that tree.

Among the members of the fern family are the dainty maidenhair, beech, woodland, rattle-snake, and the common Christmas fern. They present a picture of unexcelled grace perched on a rocky ledge far above the heads of sightseers.

Two of the fungus growths deserve mention because of their beauty. A bracket-fungus with cream-colored upper parts merging into a leathery rust-red on the underside attracted attention and a yellow-cream cup-like fungus (Delicious Lactarius) was an obliging host for a huge slug resting on its surface.

The park is famous for its dozens of flowering dogwoods which dot the wooded ravines and for the lovely red buds (judas trees) whose magenta-colored blossoms form a beautiful contrast with the delicate cream-white of the dogwoods. In the spring the unsurpassed beauty of this rare combination has won recognition from far and near. The fruit or seed pod of the red-bud is the largest of the legume family. Also of widespread fame are the magnificent Indiana sycamores. They are particularly abundant in this virgin tract of forest and many of them are over one hundred years old.

The state tree of Indiana is the tulip or yellow poplar and it is considered to be king of trees at Turkey Run. Because of its tall, stately beauty, its valuable wood, and its tropical-looking blossoms, it is deserving of its widespread fame. One of the unusual trees growing near the lodge at Turkey Run is the evonymus and this park has the distinction of having the largest one in the United States according to an article published in an Indianapolis paper.

Other native trees are the hemlock, cedar, various oaks, leather tree, paw paw, hickory, walnut.

osage-orange, bass wood, beech, American elm, maple, box elder, honey-locust, wild cherry, hack berry, rough-leaved dogwood and the spice bush.

Turkey Run is a natural sanctuary for birds and it is not surprising that more than two-hundred species of birds including the migratory species, have been identified.

Of all the birds that [illegible] this sylvan retreat, the cardinal and the whip-poor-will are [illegible] most prominent. The latter, with his oft-repeated and mysterious call, enchants the stillness of the night and a dozen or more of those nocturnal denizens intensify the listener into spell-bound delight.

A few of the other birds to be seen and heard are the redstart, cerulian and yellow warblers, oven bird, wood thrush, Maryland wren and the indigo bunting.

Man-made points of interest include the suspension bridge over Sugar Creek; also Sunset Point with its unusual view of the western sky at sundown. An interesting building at this site is the old log cabin museum made of hand hewn logs of the tulip tree and built in 1842. It is one of the oldest of its kind in Indiana and its "cat and clay" chimney is a true relic of pioneer days. Off a path leading from the lodge is to be found an old log church built in 1871 and furnished with handmade benches. It is open every Sunday morning for those who wish to worship in the quiet loveliness of the wood.

Accommodations at the park are ample. Turkey Run Inn, long famous for its attractive rooms, appetizing meals and friendly hospitality, is, open throughout the year and is a favorite place in winter as well as in summer, drawing many of its guests from other states.

Nearby Ravinia Acres also offers restful relaxation for overnight or weekly guests in delightful, modern, wildwood cottages.

If you enjoy the great world of natural history include Turkey Run in your itinerary.

DEATH OF MRS. ALICE HILL GORDON

Mrs. Alice Hill Gordon passed away at Winona Lake, Indiana last Friday, July 15. She was the daughter of E. Parker and Harriet Hatch Hill and was born in Decatur, Thanksgiving Day, November 27, 1861. She would have been 94 years old her next birthday.

Mrs. Gordon was one of three children, all natives of Decatur and among its earliest residents. Delos L., the oldest was one of the publishers of the Van Buren County Gazetteer, published in Decatur in 1869. He went South, located in Atlanta, Ga., and died there many years ago. L. Dana Hill was cashier of the First State Bank for many years and is well remembered by older residents. Their father was the first president of the Village of Decatur.

Alice Hill and Rev. James A. Gordon were united in marriage in the early nineties. He came here as pastor of the Presbyterian church and she was the church organist. From here Mr. Gordon was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian church of Van Wert, Ohio, where he remained 22 years. They then went to Winona Lake where he helped to build the Presbyterian church of that city. They built a nice home there, and there spent the remainder of their lives. Misses Therza Hunt and Ethel Ward, cousins of Mrs. Gorden, resided with them in Winona Lake.

Mrs. Gordon graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1879 and was the school's oldest living graduate.

Funeral services were held in Presbyterian church Monday afternoon and burial was beside her husband in the Winona Lake cemetery.

BOOK WANTED

Miss Hathaway's father was Benjamin Hathaway of Volinia township, an unusual man in various ways. George R. Fox, in his factual history of Cass county published in 1941, refers to him as follows:

"Hathaway Plantation. A grove in which the former owner, Benjamin Hathaway, a farmer and Cass county poet, planted in rows every kind of tree found in Michigan. The trees are now mature and of maximum height. Located on northwest side of Bunker lake, 1½ miles north of C-324, five miles west of Marcellus."

Many of these beautiful trees were destroyed by a windstorm which swept through this section since the above was written.

Mr. Hathaway was also known as Michigan's farmer poet and his poems published in several volumes. Miss Hathaway is desirous of obtaining one of them entitled "The Finished Creation" and authorizes the writer to pay one dollar for a copy.

If any reader has a copy to spare and will notify or bring it to me at 108 East St Mary's street I will send it on to her.

ELIJAH P. LOVEJOY

Elijah Parish Lovejoy was born in 1802 at Albion, Maine. Graduated from Waterville college, Maine in 1826. Emigrated to St. Louis, Mo., taught school and in 1828 published the Times which supported Henry Clay for the presidency.

In 1832 he embraced Christianity and entered Princeton Theological Seminary to study for the ministry. Graduated in 1833 with license to preach the Gospel.

In the fall of 1833 he edited the Observer in St. Louis, Mo. St. Louis being the center of a large slave-holding aristocracy, his writings denouncing slavery brought about him malignant and unsparing enemies.

They soon organized a mob who passed resolutions that the discussion of slavery was obnoxious and he must discontinue it. Lovejoy did not heed the warning.

The mob demolished the office of the Observer. He removed across the river to Alton, Illinois. The mob followed and destroyed his press there. A new press was purchased and on September first the Observer came out with a double circulation, and with arguments no less powerful and eloquent against slavery.

On the 21st of August, 1837, a mob from St. Louis, some 20 in number, again utterly destroyed his press and wounded two of his employees.

Another press was obtained and on November 7, 1837, near midnight, while defending his property in the warehouse at Alton, he was shot. A short time before his death, at about 11 o'clock at night, while going to the drug store, a mile from his home, Lovejoy was arrested by a mob of 10 or 12 men, who told him they were going to tar and feather him. With perfect composure and calmness he replied to them: "Gentlemen, I have but a single request to make of you. My wife is dangerously ill, and it is necessary she should have this prescription immediately, and which I was on my way to town to procure. Will one of you take it and see that it is delivered at my house, but without intimating what is about to befall me? I am in the hands of God and am ready to go with you."

For a few moments entire silence reigned. It was broken by a medical man, one of the disguised party, exclaiming: "Boys, I can't lay my hands upon a brave a man as this is," and turning away followed by the rest.

Thus Lovejoy was spared the degradation they were about to impose upon him. A few weeks later, as has been stated, he suffered the death of a martyr in defense of the liberty of the press and of speech. As the historian says, "A nobler and braver man never engaged in reform, or made tongue and pen more effective in the cause of human freedom. Elijah P. Lovejoy was the Arnold of Winkelried, who by his heroic death, made way for universal liberty throughout the land."

THE HAYDONS OF HAMILTON TOWNSHIP

Ione Haydon was born in 1879 and has lived on the Haydon homestead in Hamilton township all of her life. The homestead had been owned by her grandfather, Philotus Haydon, her father Arthur Haydon and herself 112 years. Her grandfather was one of the all time outstanding citizens of Van Buren county. Her father, who is well remembered by our older residents, was also for many years a leading citizen of our county.

No man who ever lived in Van Buren county was more universally honored and esteemed while living, and more sincerely and generally mourned when dead than Philotus Haydon. There are many now in easy circumstances living in this vicinity, where Mr. Haydon lived from the year 1863 to the time of his death who refer with emotion to the timely assistance he rendered members of their family when struggling for existence in the early settlement of the country. He was never known to take advantage of a man's necessities, never taking more than simple interest for loans, and often none at all, on even a note.

No honest man, no matter how poor he might be, was ever turned away empty handed when applying to him for assistance. If by misfortune a neighbor had lost a horse or an ox out of his team, he knew where to go to get it replaced.

Philotus Haydon never professed or talked religion, but would every day do more Chirstianly acts than many who do profess it. He let his works speak for his christianity. In politics he was a Republican, when that party was organized, and an able advocate of the party's principles on the stump. He served in the Michigan state senate from 1844 to 1851, and was elected supervisor of Hamilton township as long as he could be induced to serve.

The following poem was attached to one of the Civil War diaries of his son, Charles Haydon, a rising young lawyer of Kalamazoo, who joined the Union Army in April, 1861, as a private and was mustered out as a Lieutenant Colonel. He died from wounds received while in action, in 1863. Written on the margin of the poem was this notation, now dim and almost illegible:

"While visiting the picket post I found this lying beside the path in a place very similar to the one described. For that reason I put it in my pocket. November 27, 1861."

THE PICKET GUARD

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say, say,
"Except, now and then, a picket
Is shot as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.
" 'Tis nothing, a private or two, now and then,
Will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost, only one of the men
Moaning out, all alone, the death rattle.

All quiet along the Potomac tonight
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;
Their tents, in the rays of the clear autumn moon
Or the light of the watch-fire, are gleaming.
A tremulous sigh of the gentle night-wind
Through the forest leaves softly is creeping,
While the stars up above, with their glittering eyes,
Keep guard, for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,
As he tramps from the rock to the fountain
And thinks of the two in the low trundle-bed
Far away in the cot on the Mountain.
His musket falls slack; his face, dark and grim,
Grows gentle in memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep —
For their mother — May heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then,
That night, when the love yet unspoken
Leaped up to his lips — when low murmured vows
Were pledged to be ever unbroken.
Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes,
He dashes off tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun closer up to its place
As if to keep down the heart swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine tree,
The footstep is lagging and weary;
Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light,
Toward the shade of the forest so dreary.
Hark! was it the night-wind that rustled the leaves?
Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing?
It looked like a rifle— "Ha! Mary, good-by!"
And the life-blood is ebbing and plashing.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
No sound save the rush of the river;
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—
The picket's off duty forever!

The Dunkards Once Thrived in Volinia

The PTA of the Warner district in Volinia are busy people this week. Their home talent play and quilt selling are the cause of it.

They spent a day putting the pews into place for their audience and Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings rehearsed their play, "The Folks Next Door." This Thursday evening they will rest and Friday evening will be the big event.

The Community hall where they play will seat 200 or more and was built by the Dunkards on land given them by the late Mrs. Jane Newton Crego.

The Dunkards were opposed to dancing and when the society had so thinned out through death and removal that it could no longer maintain its organization the property reverted to Mrs. Crego. In later years she gave the Community Club permission to use it but respected the Dunkard faith and would not permit dances.

Since Mrs. Crego's death we understand the Club has become the owner of the hall, but the ban on dancing stays. The club arranges the pews back to back to sit in for playing cards.

The Dunkers or Dunkards are also known as the Church of the Brethren. The movement grew out of the great religious awakening which occurred in Germany in the latter part of the 17th century.

Driven by persecution they rejected all creeds and accepted the gospel of Jesus Christ as their rule of faith and practice.

The church emigrated to America in 1717-29 and organized their first church here in Germantown, Pennsylvania.

They seem to be holding their own and are most numerous in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas and North Dakota. The denomination supports 10 colleges and a large publishing house located in Elgin, Illinois.

In doctrine the Brethren are stictly orthodox. They follow closely the scripture teaching and observe the primitive simplicity of the apostolic church.

They enjoin plainness of dress, settle their difficulties among themselves without going to law, affirm instead of taking oath, refrain from taking prominent part in politics, are opposed to secret societies, advise against the use of tobacco and rule against the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicants.

They baptize by dipping face forward at the mention of each name in the Trinity given in the baptismal formula in Matthew 28:19.

Communion is observed in the evening, after a full meal called the Lord's Supper. Before the supper the ordinance of foot washing is observed, the brethren washing one another's feet, and the sisters performing the same service among themselves. After supper, before the communion is taken, the sexes extend the right hand of fellowship and exchange the kiss of peace.

Sixty years ago the church suffered the loss of about 8,000 communicants by a division in its ranks resulting in the secession of two parties, known as the Old Order and Progressive Brethren.

The former objected most seriously to the advance the church was making in education, missionary and Sunday school work, while the latter insisted that the church was too conservative and that greater liberty should be enjoyed in the matter of dress.

The Old Order Brethren have 4,030 churches and 129,000 members. The Progressive Brethren have 1,027 churches and 143,425 members.

The baptismal formula as given in Matthew 28:19, which the Dunkards follow is, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

Curiosity leads us to follow a line to the end, and we learn that the name Dunker or Dunkard comes from the German tunken, to dip, and that the Brethren are called also Tunkers.

The Passing of Bret H. Cockett

He Was a Well Known Citizen of Michigan, Second Lieutenant in the Spanish-American War and for a Number of Years a Decatur Attorney.

Bret H. Cockett passed away at his home in Keeler early Thursday morning, December 22. He had not been well for a long time but his friends outside his home community did not realize that the end was so near.

He was born in Decatur March 16, 1871, and was 67 years old his last birthday. His parents were Charles and Mollie Smith Cockett, well known residents of this community in the early days.

Bret was an only child. His parents moved to Joliet when he was small. He attended school there and graduated from the law department of the University of Michigan. His father died in Joliet and Bret and his mother came back to re-establish a home in Decatur.

He opened a law office here and continued in the practice until the declaration of war with Spain in 1898. Bret was a natural soldier, a natural officer,—tall and straight, dignified and commanding in appearance he was an officer the men liked to follow. He had a voice so terrible that it could make a culprit shake with fear, and so soft and musical that it could calm a savage beast.

Bret Cockett was one of a dozen Decatur young men to enlist in the Spanish-American war as a private in Company G, Thirty-fifth Michigan Volunteer Infantry. Volunteers have the privilege of choosing their own officers and the men chose Bret for their Second Lieutenant. The late Nathan Simpson of Keeler and Hartford was made Captain. He served through the war, received an honorable discharge and came home with the esteem and respect of his entire Company.

He resumed the practice of law and in time was appointed to a position in the office of the state tax commission. He became an expert in tax adjustments and held his place through several administrations until failing health compelled him to resign.

Lieut. Cockett was united in marriage with Florence Palmeter, while he was in the service. They were parents of four children, Bret, Jr. at home, Burdette of New York, Mrs. Catherine Bellman of Benton Harbor and Miss Barbara of Los Angeles. The latter came to Chicago by plane, arriving at the home in Keeler Tuesday.

Funeral services were conducted by a Christian Science reader at 11 o'clock Saturday morning in the Zuver and Calvin mortuary chapel in Hartford. The body was then removed to the Oakwood crematory in Chicago, and the ashes returned to Keeler for interment.

RECALLING OLD FRIENDS

1528½ Cahuenga Blvd
Hollywood, California,

Dear Arba:

I received your fine letter and was very glad to hear from you. I have thought many times of writing you and then something would come up and I never got started.

You asked me if I remember away back to the summer you worked in the old Republican office. Well, I certainly do remember. Yes we had a Washington hand press; in fact in those days very few, if any, country offices had anything else but the old Washington hand press for newspaper work.

It is rather hard to explain very intelligently to anyone not familiar with the old days just how it worked. In the first place you placed the sheet on a sort of a frame the size of the sheet, a steel frame the size of the sheet, fitted around the margin on the paper; this frame was called a frisket. You let this frisket down on the sheet of paper, then the frame that the sheet was placed on, which, by the way, was on hinges, was brought down on the type form and then with a handle was rolled under the part of the press that took the impression.

The impression was made by pulling a lever that brought the heavy impression plate down on the form and printed the paper. Bill Bass was the roller boy and that was done with a long roller that covered the two pages of the paper. Each time you printed a paper the type form was rolled back in place, the form rolled with the long roller and you were ready to print another paper.

This may not be very plain to you or any one else, but in my mind I can see just how it was done, and believe me, I pulled many of the old Republicans off on that old press. I don't think there are many of the old Washington presses in use now, but you might find one in some of the old newspaper offices, and some engraving and electrotyping plants still use them for taking proofs. I hope you can get enough out of my description to do you some good. If it was a Miller Hi-Speed or a platten I could do a much better job at describing its workings.

You will notice by the change of address on my letter-head that we have recently moved. The plant that we bought in 1933 was located on the second floor. We are now on the ground floor only half a block from where we were before, and it is much nicer and better for us. Business is just fair, as I guess it is with everyone now. In fact we feel that owing to everything being as it is, we are doing well. We are not getting rich by any means but we are making a good living and I guess if anyone is doing that he should be thankful. Hollywood is different from most any other city, and you have to be on your toes all the time.

You asked if I ever see Bruce Bassett. No, I don't. It is hard to get away during the week and I never get to Santa Monica, only on a Sunday and of course his place of business is closed. I intend some time to drive to Santa Monica and see him.

Louis Dwight and wife called on me a few weeks ago and I was more than pleased to see them. I am going to try and take a couple of days off some time in the near future and drive up to see Myron Hinkley. I do want to see him. We had lots of fun in old Decatur before Myron left there with our dance orchestra. I don't know as I can remember all the members of the orchestra now, but Cot Lindsley played violin, Myron clarinet, Ruth Roberts piano, I cornet, I can't remember who it was that played traps, or whether there were any other members or not. That was a long time ago.

I often think of the old town and the old friends that I had there. So many of them have passed on to the other side of Jordan that there are not so many left of the once young bloods of the town. Is Tick Eckenberger still living and is he still in Decatur? Have you any idea where Dolph Miles is? If I remember right he married Edith Collett of Hartford.

Do you know anything about Will Clark? He married and went to Jackson or Battle Creek I think, but which place I have forgotten. And there was Lottie Van Camp. I hear she is living in California some place, but I don't know where it is. Gee, would I like to see her. She took me to a leap year dance in Hartford one winter night and did we have fun. Mind you that was before automobiles and to drive to Hartford with a horse and buggy was quite a feat, or would be considered so now. Do you know where Ida Potts lives? I think she must have her pension from the government now and I wondered if she came back to the states or is making her home in the place where she taught so long.

If you have time some time write to me and tell me all you know about all the dear old friends I have inquired about.

Well, I guess you will be tired of my chatter so I will wind up this attempt at writing an interesting letter to you. Hoping to hear from you some time in the near future.

Your old friend,
W. E. Secord.

DECATUR HIGH SCHOOL HONOR AWARDS

May Kaplan Is Valedictorian For 1940, Helen Knoska Is Salutatorian

Miss May Kaplan, 16, and Miss Helen Knoska, 18, were chosen by virtue of their scholarships, valedictorian and salutatorian, respectively, for the senior class of 1940 of Decatur high school.

Miss Kaplan holds the unique record of having all A grades for her entire school life, a record not held by another graduate of this school.

She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Kaplan and has attended no other school than Decatur. She took a general pre-college high school course and hopes to attend the art institute in Chicago, majoring in commercial art.

Miss Knoska is the daughter of Mrs. Anna Knoska, on M-40 north of Decatur. She was born in Chicago and had the first six grades of school at the Robert Burns Grammar school of that city. The family came to Decatur in 1934 and she entered the seventh grade in the Decatur school.

She, like Miss Kaplan, took a pre-college high school course and plans to attend W. S. T. C., Kalamazoo. Miss Knoska plans to adopt the profession of teaching.

The commencement program will be given on the evening of June 7, with Dr. Preston Bradley, pastor of the Peoples church of Chicago, as speaker.

DOWAGIAC, WAS THE GREAT SEARCHING GROUND

No Indian of the Pottawatomie, Chippewa, or Ottawa Nation recognizes the word Dowagiac, as spelled and pronounced by the Paleface.

The word is supposed to signify "Searching Grounds" or Hunting Ground, and in the same Musical Pottawatomie Tongue it is spelled "Ndo-wa-ga-Week," which does not look good in print, and is not so easily pronounced as "Dowagiac."

The Pottawattomie language has no e in it, and they would not have spelled the word as we do, at best. They have a tradition, regarding the place where the great city stands, that it was a famous fishing ground. They do not know if the name originated with them, or if they fell heir to it when they divided their hunting grounds with the Ottawas, who went to the eastern part of the State, or the Chippewas, who went north.

Of all the tribes of the northwest the Pottawatomie was the most forgiving for the past wrongs, on the part of the Paleface, and was the first to establish friendly relations and become a part of the community.

The Catholic Missionaries had much to do with this, and the country owes much to these self sacrificing and sincere men who might be classed as the advance agents of civilization.

Away back in the 40's, seeing how his band was demoralized by the wiles of the white man, the old Chief, Paul Pokagon, asked that the "Black Gowns" might be sent here to teach them different morals and to lead them from the curse of their Nation — Rum.

In the Pottawatomie Tongue Pokagon means "Rib" and the early settlers here insisted that in their language his name was Crooked Rib. No matter what it was, he was a sincere Christian Man, and up to his death he set a good example morals and religious tendencies, and he died as sincere a Catholic as this community every saw.

"Ndo-wa-ga-week!" How many memories the word brings to us. The Memories of the days of the wigwam and the chase, and of the days from then up to now. The writer has yet to see an Indian who did not wish for those old days, nor one who did not think that they would have been better off, had the reception to Columbus been different. In his trail followed the war of extermination and usurpation which has caused all of the successive changes which have come to them. Today the Instincts of freedom form all laws, save of their own making, have been smothered and lost.

LYLE'S TURKEY FARM

(From Local History Sketches by Pupils of the Decatur High School)

By Mary Lyle

Kenneth Lyle got his start at raising turkeys when, in 1932, the day before Thanksgiving, he won a turkey gobbler. Having their Thanksgiving dinner all planned, the Lyles didn't eat the turkey. They then planned to eat him Christmas Day, but again fate stepped in and saved the turkey. The Lyles had been invited away for Christmas dinner.

Having raised ducks, geese, and rabbits, he decided to try raising turkeys. Upon purchasing two turkey hens, he began a new enterprise, which has grown into a business of almost two thousand turkeys today.

Turkeys are a hard bird to raise. They are apt to suffocate when they are small. They become frightened and pile up, the ones on the bottom suffocating. Turkeys are also susceptible to worms and Blackhead. Blackhead is the worst of the turkey diseases. The turkeys are constantly kept under observation. They have to be kept off wet ground for fear of getting it. They are treated with a medicine called Iodine Vermicide. This is given to them when they are twelve weeks old, and off and on from that time.

The Lyle turkeys eat up to three and one half tons of feed a week. This feed is made up of corn, oats, wheat, and barley. To this is added meat scrap, soy bean meal, alfalfa meal, and several other materials. Oats or cracked corn are fed as supplements.

In late February, Kenneth Lyle starts taking turkey eggs to Holland, Michigan. There the eggs are hatched by Brummer and Frederickson. The young turkeys then are either sold or brought home. These weekly trips continue often into early April.

The young turkeys upon their arrival home are put into battery brooders, which are in the dressing room. When they are ten days to two weeks old, they are moved out to the brooder houses. These houses will hold from three hundred to three hundred and fifty birds. In the early summer, sun porches are attached to the houses, Then the turkeys can get out of doors. When the pasture has grown up, the turkeys are turned loose. Large sun flowers are grown and are fed to the turkeys as an extra treat, which is also good for them.

Turkeys grow very fast. By Thanksgiving, it is possible for them to weigh thirty pounds live, twenty three pounds dressed. Many are sold for Thanksgiving, Christmas, and New Years. The rest are sold to weekly customers.

The turkeys are dressed about four days before Thanksgiving. This process requires about six men. These men are used in the dressing part of the operation, which consists of killing the birds and taking their feathers off. A group of women draw the turkeys.

The building in which this is done is called the dressing room. It contains the scalder, the picker, the water tanks, the eviscerating table, and the freezer. In here also the turkeys are wrapped for freezing and for sale.

For the last four years, Kenneth Lyle and his wife, Dorothy have been going to the Turkey Conventions. They have been to Long Beach, California; St Louis, Missouri; Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and Dallas, Texas. The convention is in the middle of January. These conventions are very interesting and have many things to offer. There are lectures, special trips, and an annual contest to judge the largest turkey from all over the United States. The largest turkey last year weighed forty-two pounds alive, thirty eight pounds dressed.

HISTORY OF THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF DECATUR

Written by John F. Brigham, Clerk of Session, Jan. 22, 1940.

The First Presbyterian Church of Decatur was organized by Rev. Marcus Harrison February 1, 1852, and consisted of the following members: Mrs. Lydia House Harrison, Mrs. Eli Rich and Joseph McClintock. at the same time Joseph McClintock was elected and ordained a ruling elder.

The church represented by J. McClintock was received under care of Kalamazoo Presbytery January 4, 1853.

On the second of January, 1853, Godfrey Gerne united with the church by letter from the Congregational church of Grand Rapids. At the same date Mrs. Polly Ann Leak Gerne was received upon profession of her faith.

Rev. M. Harrison, who under a commission from the A. H. M. Society, (American Home Missionary Society), had maintained regular preaching services at Decatur and Lawrence for nearly three years, was constrained by declining health to resign his commission early in 1855. Previous to this, he had appropriated a village lot and erected a frame for a meeting and school house, which together with some lumber was granted as a donation to the Presbyterian Society.

Rev. Samuel Fleming commenced his labor at this place August 1, 1855, under appointment of the A. H. M. Society. Under his administration and supervision materials were procured and appropriated for completing the church, the first house of worship erected in the village.

The church edifice was dedicated to the worship of God the 18th of September, 1856. Sermon by the Rev. A. C. Tuttle of Paw Paw, Mich.; cost of building about one thousand dollars. Of this amount $350 was borrowed of the Church Erection Fund.

On the occasion of celebrating the Lord's Supper December 15, 1855, Rev. S. Fleming officiating, the following persons were received into fellowship of the church by letter: William E. Trowbridge, Mrs. Catherine L. Hoyt Trowbridge, Mary Trowbridge and Amanda C. Trowbridge from the Presbyterian church of Kalamazoo, also Mrs. Juliet Flemming from the Presbyterian church of Homer.

The following persons were received by letter on the occasion of celebrating the Lord's Supper December 13, 1857: Garrett A. VanSickle and his wife, Mrs. Delia S. Huyck VanSickle, Miss Evelyn Huyck and Mrs. Mary Ann and Ray, the first three from the church of Flint and the last from the church of England.

At a meeting of the church, called for the purpose April 1, 1858, Garrett A. VanSickle was duly elected and ordained as ruling elder.

This first church building was used for services until 1868 when it became necessary to make plans for a larger church at which time the building was sold to Jack Tuttle who moved it over onto St. Mary's street where it was used for a time as a Universalist church and later was sold to the Catholics and used by them as a church for many years.

The second church building was erected by the Presbyterians in 1869 and was dedicated September 1 of that year, at a cost of $7,000. This building was used for services until August, 1917, when it was destroyed by fire.

On April 4, 1858, the following children were baptized: Charles and Edward VanSickle, Fannie and Ida Trowbridge. At this time there were two elders with Rev. Fleming as moderator.

The first collection for the Home Missionary Society was taken Januarw 18, 1863, and amounted to $9.08.

The first annual report to Presbytery was given at Richland on April 15, 1863, as follows: Added by certificate, one; by profession, two; deceased, one; dimissed, four; baptized, one, making the total membership at this time, 28. There was in the communion fund $2.00 and home mission fund, $9.25; Sunday school, $17.00.

At this time many were uniting with the church from Ohio, Vermont, New York and other states as well as many places in Michigan.

The roll of Kalamazoo Presbytery in 1898 included nineteen churches: Allegan, Benton Harbor, Buchanan, Cassopolis, Centerville, Coldwater, Decatur, Edwardsburg, Kalamazoo First, Kalamazoo North, Niles, Paw Paw, Plainwell, Quincy, Richland, Schoolcraft, Sturgis, Three Rivers and White Pigeon and twenty ministers, and is the same at this present time.

Communicants in 1898 were 2,413, and for 1938 were 6,010, which shows a substantial growth.

The following is a list of the officers of the church in the year 1889 as taken from the Gospel Gleaner:

Pastor—Rev. James A. Gordon

Pres. of the Christian Endeavor—Mrs. J. A. Gordon.

The report of the I .dies' Aid Society for the year of 1888 as found in the Gleaner:

The year had its lights and shadows. Encouraged by the success of the Ladies' Bazaar in December, 1887, those who had long desired repairs and redecoration of the church came forward. Over four hundred dollars was obtained by subscription. The audience room was shortened. Rooms with sliding doors added below and above, also a new entrance, vestibule and stair case.

The Ladies' Society decorated the whole interior and covered the entire auditorium with new carpets at a total outlay of over $250.00.

During the two months of repairs, the Disciple church very courteously invited us to worship with them.

The happy transformation was finished only to become the house of mourning. The first service in it was the funeral of one of the elders, William E. Trowbridge, who had ever been its faithful and strong support.

The reopening service was held April 22. The Ladies' Aid Society was still in debt for the papering and carpeting of the sanctuary and early in the fall began work for another bazaar. They made ready at their busy Thursday meetings held at the home of Mrs. Baker. As December 14 and 15 drew near, faster flew the skillful fingers and harder worked the willing hands.

An unlucky fall and sickness laid by several of the leading workers. Saturday, the second day, was wet. But when the clouds had rolled by and the pressure of toil and anxiety was over, it was found that success had again crowned the efforts of these unselfish workers and the debt they had assumed was no more.

Again the church was called to mourn the death of one of its beloved and useful members, at one time its organist, Mrs. Abbie O. Harrison whose funeral at the church was largely attended.

During the year preaching has never been omitted except for one Sabbath in vacation. The sacraments have been observed, contributions to five boards have been made and ten members added to the communion. In addition to these the church has gained the very capable assistance of a former minister and wife, Rev. and Mrs. E. M. Toof. Let us thank God and take courage.

May the priceless mercies of the past awaken our gratitude and love to the giver of all good and lead us to consider how we may better serve Him in the future.

Description of Fire as Found at Republican Office

Following the burning of the second church building in 1917, services were held in the town hall and in what was then known as the Free Methodist church until the present large brick church was built.

The First Presbyterian church became an incorporated body in the summer of 1918 and work began on the present church early in that year.

Rev. Hugh Creswell was pastor when the church was destroyed and remained pastor for a short time after the present church was built. Much credit has been given Rev. Creswell for the splendid $20,000.00 church such as few towns of 1600 population may have.

The dedication services were held on May 4, 1919, sermon delivered by Rev. Geo. L. Robinson, D.D., subject, "The House of God a Gate to Heaven."

A list of the pastors and the time of service follow:

About the year 1903 a new Estey pipe organ was purchased for the church at a cost of approximately eleven hundred dollars installed. Some thought it a waste of money for no one would know how to play it, but we soon found musicians paying for their own lessons as well as car fare to Dowagiac to get their lessons, and the result was the organ was used for both morning and evening services and Bible school as well. The late Mrs. J. E. Maxwell and Miss Mary Foulk were among the dependable organists.

This organ was destroyed by fire at the time the church burned in 1917.

Many of the older members long for another pipe organ or better still a Hammond organ for which we already have a fund of over three hundred dollars. We expect to make an effort some time in the future to secure another instrument to be used in connection with our splendid choirs numbering about 35.

These choirs are under the direction of Mrs. Rolland Haefner with Mrs. Albert Stepnitz at the piano.

Not all parents realize what it means to have the able music directors we now have in our village, and parents will do well to encourage their children in this worth-while vocal training which is a very vital part of any worship service.

Laying Corner Stone of First Presbyterian Church

(From a copy of the Republican of May 27, 1868.)

We will take you back a long way in the life of Decatur. Can you imagine being among the young people here in 1868. The village was just 20 years old then, a young village.

The story of the laying of the corner stone of the First Presbyterian church was printed in that issue, but unfortunately a small part of it is torn away. The paper was directed to Jerome Coleman, but we have forgotten to whom we are indebted for it.

The Coleman family were prominent in Decatur for nearly a half century. Jerome Coleman was a Decatur lawyer in the time when the village was such an enterprising place that it furnished business enough to support five lawyers.

The Coleman home was on West Delaware street, at one time on the lot where the handsome residence of W. C. Snyder now stands, and later where Mr. and Mrs. Lou Graham reside.

Clarence Coleman, the only son, became a pharmacist, was a member of the drug firm of Coleman and Defendorf of Dowagiac, and died at an early age.

Minnie Coleman graduated from the Decatur High school in the class of 1879, taught in the Decatur public schools, married Frank L. Kern and died while yet a young woman. Her three children have given a good account of themselves. Hal is a film editor who stands so high in his calling that he was selected to edit the most costly production of the year, "Gone With the Wind." Don is a state sales manager for Buick automobiles, and Bess, Mrs. Andrews, has won prominence as an accountant in Los Angeles.

When Lawyer Coleman died his law books and office furniture were sold. His desk was purchased by Dr. Rose and can be seen in the office of Dr. Bope. His book case is the massive walnut case in the Republican office.

Perhaps you would be interested in the account of the laying of the corner stone of the Presbyterian church:

Rev. J. R. Berry, pastor of the Methodist church, led in prayer, then a hymn was sung of which we quote the first verse:

"Behold the sure foundation-stone,
Which God, in Zion lays,
To build our heavenly hopes upon,
And His eternal praise."

Rev. J. R. Berry gave a short address, Rev. Pearson, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Kalamazoo, gave the principal address, and Rev. E. H. Toof, pastor of the new church, followed with a very earnest address to his congregation.

(The Toof family is still represented in Decatur through Mrs. S. G. Toof, and the minister's granddaughter, Miss Frances Toof.)

A Bible, history of the church society, two five cent coins, the names of the board of education, copy of the Republican and of the proceedings of the last synod of Michigan were placed in the corner stone, and it was laid by George McCormick.

Prayer followed, and then the hymn,—

"On this stone, now laid with prayer,
Let thy church rise strong and fair;
Ever, Lord, thy name be known
Where we lay this corner stone."

After singing the Doxology the assemblage was dismissed with a benediction.

(We believe it possible that one or more persons now living were present at this important event which took place on the 26th of May, 1868. If so we should very much like them to inform the Republican, and if possible give some account of their remembrance of the service. This church was destroyed by fire about 25 years ago and a few years later the present church edifice was erected on the same site.

History of the Church

(Taken from the Republican of May 27, 1868.)

Since his connection with this society Mr. Toof has labored faithfully and well, and the church has prospered under his ministration; to him we are indebted for the following historical sketch of the First Presbyterian church of Decatur:

This church was organized Feb. 1, 1852, by Rev. Marcus Harrison, and consisted of the following members:

Mrs. Lydia Harrison, Mrs. Eli Rich, Joseph McClintock; at the same time Joseph McClintock was elected and ordained a Ruling Elder. The church represented by J. McClintock, elder, was received under the care of Kalamazoo Presbytery, January 4, 1853, the following are the ministers who have had charge of the church:

Rev. Marcus Harrison, from 1852 to 1855; Rev. Samuel Fleming, 1855 to 1859; Rev. T. C. Hill, May 15, 1859, to October 30, 1859; Rev. S. R. Bissell from November 6, 1859, and continuing three months; Rev. W. T. Bartle, from May 12, to January 29, 1865; Rev. J. J. Ward, from June 28, 1865, to April 7, 1867. Rev. E. M. Toof began his labors with the church and congregation July 1, 1868. The following is a list of the ruling elders since the organization:

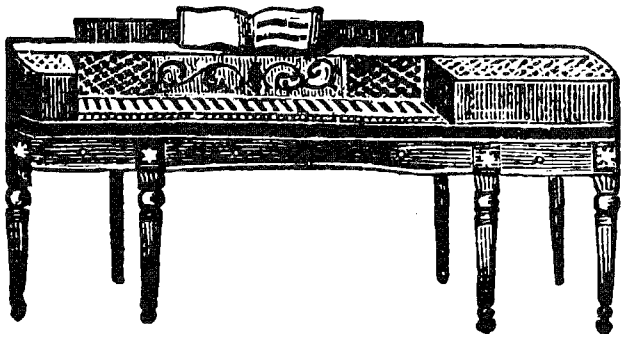
Joseph McClintock, 1852; G. A. Van Sickle, 1859; Samuel White, July 2, 1859; W. E. Trowbridge, January 1, 1862; E. P. Hill, A. H. Williams, Jerome H. Coleman, April 11, 1868.

The first revival in this church is said to have occurred in the winter of 1858. April 12, 1868, twenty-nine persons were received to the communion of the church. Whole number now in communion seventy-nine.

In 1855, previous to Mr. Harrison's retiring from the service of the church, he donated to the society a village lot and a small building designed for a house of worship, and partly finished, which was subsequently completed by the congregation and occupied as a place of worship until April, 1868.

The foundation of the new church edifice was commenced May 5, 1858, by Mr. George McCormick; and the corner-stone laid May 26, 1868.

The organization of the society was perfected October 17, 1856. W. E. Trowbridge, Joseph McClintock and John Tarbell were chosen trustees. The office has been held also by C. N. Poor, E. P. Hill, D. Hodges, C. F. R. Bellows, Carlton Wheeler and Jerome Coleman.



Edgar Bergen

WESTERN UNION

Los Angeles, Cal., 8-8-41.

Dr. and Mrs. Bope,
Decatur, Michigan.

Will Arrive in Kalamazoo August 19th to appear in Decatur on the 20th. Please keep this informal and simple or the spirit of fun will be lost. Rather than take a collection, wouldn't it be better to sell tickets for the best seats and the rest can stand without charges. Because the papers have learned of my appearance in Decatur we must plan to take care of a larger crowd and it will have to be held outside.

EDGAR BERGEN.

Decatur Waiting to Welcome Edgar Bergen and McCarthy

PLANS INCLUDE A SUPPER TUESDAY EVENING, AND THE WEDNESDAY EVENING PROGRAM IN WHICH THE FAMOUS PAIR WILL TAKE PART

TELEGRAM

Arriving on Wolverine ten twenty-three Tesday morning. Will be in Decatur for reception Tuesday night. Edgar Bergen.

This is Decatur's big week. The village has the honor of entertaining its most distinguished former citizen, Edgar Bergen, who will arrive from New York City Tuesday afternoon.

We do not recall that an event of the kind equal to it ever took place in Decatur and every citizen is interested.

He will be the guest of Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Bope and a dinner and reception has been planned for him in the Masonic Temple Tuesday evening.

Wednesday he will visit again the scenes of his youth, travel again the roads he used to travel and meet his boyhood friends.

Wednesday evening he will give a half hour entertainment with the famous partner of his own creation, Charlie McCarthy, and the program will be extended by the assistance of a professional entertainer who will accompany him.

Details are being ironed out which include handling a crowd of 15,000 people. Former residents who know him are coming from long distances.

A report from the National Broadcasting Company's publicity bureau said that Bergen and Charlie, now vacationing from their Sunday night radio program, would fly from New York City to Kalamazoo, arriving there probably on Tuesday.

Visit To Be Informal

While in Decatur he will be guests of Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Bope. An informal time is being arranged for his visit including a trip to the country school which he attended.

The public program Wednesday evening will start at 8 and will be given from the bandstand near the Michigan Central park. Preceding Bergen's part in the program there will be several entertainment numbers including music by the Watervliet Men's chorus, singing by Miss Frances Jessup of Lawton, impersonations by George Swartz of Dowagiac and baton twirling by Miss Peggy Kayes of Cassopolis, state champion.

There will be plenty of parking space in the village. Arrangements have been made for 25 police officers including state police from the Paw Paw post, sheriff's officers and Boy Scouts to handle traffic and direct the parking.

Cars entering the village from the east will be parked on the east side. Likewise those coming from the south, north or west will be parked on the end of town in which they enter.

GREETINGS TO EDGAR BERGEN

By Fred W. Green

August 20th is a proud day for Decatur. It will be a date Decatur should never forget.

On this date one of her boys will return home to greet all the old playmates of his youth, visit many places of interest to him, which perhaps will be assembled and woven into a life story in pictures, in which Decatur will become as famous as this once young boy whom we greet today.

Of course we refer to Edgar Bergen. During the time he lived here he was just one of Decatur's many boys, full of fun and innocent mischief; in fact a precocious real boy in every sense of the word. He was never happy unless he had tools to mess around with. Mess is a good word as that is what he did. He was always on the lookout for something to do to earn a few dollars and was not very particular as to what it was so long as he was doing something constructive and energetic every minute of the day.

However, we lost sight of him thru no fault of his, and the next we heard he was finishing his education, and about to enter Northwestern University. That is where the Eddie Bergen we now know was, so to speak, born. From then on the present generation have been living with Eddie more or less every day.

He teamed up with one Charley McCarthy and they went along very nicely until a few years ago. Then Charley got a little lonesome and picked up two pals, Skinny Dugan and Mortimer Snerd. Into these additions to the family the true Bergen was inoculated. One could never bring out from these dummies what Eddie brings out unless it was original with that boy to whom I referred as a mischief, fun-loving youngster.

To all of us Eddie brings this lesson—persevere, never say die, keep at it and you will win. To our youngsters I say, do not for a minute think Eddie Bergen has not had to fight to climb to the height we now find him. All successful people have to do this,—work, work, work, and then some more work.

Just one more thing about Eddie. Did you note what I said about finishing his education. That showed the master mind he has. He knew there was something missing, and he went out after it. With all his own might and some persuasion from his mother who also saw the spark of genius in her son, he really went to work. By hard work he developed a genius of such magnitude that he has illuminated the whole world by his clever wit, bringing cheer to the down-hearted, amusement to the sober-minded and many happy hours for thousands of shutins.

Is it any wonder Decatur is pleased to claim him as her own son? So welcome Edgar Bergen, and come again as often as you can. Good luck, Charlie, Skinney, and Mortimer. Make Eddie come again and of course you also come. And who can tell, on his next visit you may have a girl friend or sister or something to come with you.

THE FAMOUS VENTRILOQUIST WILL VISIT "OLD HOME TOWN" WHERE HE SPENT 11 YEARS OF HIS BOYHOOD

Decatur is delighted with the opportunity to entertain its most noted former citizen, Edgar Bergen, and to see and hear one of his famous dialogues with his unique creation, "Charley McCarthy."

The news of his coming as contained in the telegram to Dr. and Mrs. Bope spread rapidly over the village and before night it was 'news' throughout the middle west.

Citizens of Decatur have often expressed to Mr. Bergen their desire that he should pay them a visit but in the past his schedules have been so filled that to find the necessary time seemed to be impossible. This year he puts the visit first and his mother will accompany him if she is able to make the trip. In fact he wrote some time ago that it was his mother's desire to return on a visit and that influenced his decision to come.

Decatur citizens are making plans for his reception. They intend to make it the biggest event in the history of the village. Dr. Bope will meet him in Kalamazoo, probably Tuesday, and he will have Wednesday to go over the scenes of his youth and visit with the friends of his Decatur days. Dr. Bope, on behalf of the community, will present him with the 'Keys to the Village.'

The program at which Bergen and Charlie McCarthy will appear is set for 8 o'clock and will be held from the band stand. The Main street pavement from Sherwood to Delaware streets will be kept clear of cars and the space given over to the audience, and thousands of people will be able to clearly see and hear the entertainment.

A nominal charge will be made for seats or a free will offering will be taken and the receipts, at Mr. Bergen's request, will be turned over to the village library.

Chief Woolfe is chairman of the committee on arrangements and will be master of ceremonies. The program of the evening will be opened by the Decatur band.

WHO'S WHO SKETCH

Edgar Bergen was born in Chicago February 16, 1903. While he was a child, Mr. and Mrs. John Bergen, his parents, moved to Decatur. He was a resident of the community 11 years. The family resided in several places in the Decatur area. One of the homes was three miles south of town, at which time Bergen attended the Shaw district school. After his father died in Decatur, Mrs. Bergen took her children back to Chicago to reside.

Bergen was educated in Lane Technical and Lakeview high schools, Chicago, and also studied in Northwestern University. As ventriloquist and magician, he appeared on Chautauqua circuits in summers 1922-25. He next appeared in vaudeville in American and European circuits before supper clubs.

On December 17, 1936, he made his first radio appearance. Next, he created the radio feature, "Charles McCarthy." He is a member of the Society of Cinematographers, the Screen Actors Guild, the Actors Equity, and of Delta Upsilon club. He belongs to the Lambs club, New York. Bergen is not married.

The above telegram came to Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Bope at 11 o'clock Thursday night, August 7. It was taken off the wire by the telegrapher at Dowagiac who kindly telephoned it at once to Dr. and Mrs. Bope.

That was the first official news received in Decatur, but others reported that they had seen notices of his coming in both Detroit and Chicago evening papers.

Friday morning Chas. Danner of the Republican office received a letter from his sister-in-law, Mrs. Jas. C. Nielsen of Chicago, containing a notice from the Chicago Times on which she wrote, "I didn't see this in the Decatur paper."

Alas, the Decatur paper has been terribly scooped on this big story. We shall try to get on the good side of Charlie McCarthy when he visits Decatur and have him put a flea in Edgar's ear to give the old home town paper a better break the next time. If we could only see the girl Charlie is now going with we could cinch the scoops of the big news sure.

We hope Charlie does not get caught in the draft, at least not until after the 20th. of August. He must be over 21 and no examining physician would find a flaw in his make-up. Charlie will surely have to go to war if he ever is called under the dratt.

This is the item in the Chicago Times under, "Listening In With Don Foster:"

"Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy interrupt their vacation for a trip to Bergen's home town of Decatur, Mich., on August 20. They will appear at a band concert to raise money for a town library."

When Edgar Bergen returns to Decatur on Friday, the homecoming will be in fulfilment of the personal invitation made early in the year, asking him to participate in the Centennial activities that have their commencement today.

Edgar's spot in the entertainment world is tops and the fame of Charlie McCarthy has no bounds. And so Decatur holds, with justifiable pride, the role of Bergen's home town. His willingness to make this special journey, from his home in Hollywood, indicates the pleasant memories he holds for his old friends of Decatur, and the success he has earned has never lessened that "home town" affection.

In turn it is a special thrill to a community to watch, from the sidelines, the climb to success that is achieved by someone we have known "from across the street." Nothing is more glamorous than the fame of a radio and movie star and when the privilege comes to the old home town to be the host of its favorite son, it becomes an outstanding event for the village and the Centennial celebration.

So Friday has rightly been designated as Bergen Day and will provide the opportunity for Edgar to receive the warm felicitations of his host of oldtime friends, who will be eager to echo the thought that is community-wide . . . "welcome back to Decatur."

Every effort is going into the plans for the big Bergen Show to be presented at the Athletic Field Friday evening, to provide an entertainment unequalled in the first hundred years of Decatur's existence. As Edgar has indicated his goodwill to this town, it is the sincere wish that it will be a veritable sea of Charlie McCarthy fans that will meet his eyes as he appears on the stage of this great Bergen Show on the evening of the 10th.

WEDNESDAY, THE BIG BERGEN DAY IN DECATUR

Wednesday the village was moving fast, the seats were placed, fences and public address system installed. All the detail was completed by 5 o'clock, and the crowd had started to go to the show. Chief Woolfe had checked up and everything was ready for the party. Miss Mary Hanrahan, Mr. Bergen's manager, helped arrange the program by telephone at about 6:30. It was to be on schedule time so that Mr. Bergen could leave at once for Chicago.

At 7 o'clock the High School Band, all in uniforms, came marching down from the village, took their places in front of the big platform and gave an hour's concert. The baton twirlers were placed on the stage as requested earlier in the day by Bergen, and the band played while the members displayed the batons very nicely. Flags were placed on the platform while the band played the National Anthem.

By this time thousands of people had arrived and the back field was full of cars and people. At 8 p.m. the program started.

At 9 p. m. the siren was heard, the stage was cleared and the crowd was asked, "Who do you want to see?" and thousands of voices began to sing, "We want Bergen, we want Bergen." Bergen was on his way to the stage and the multitude cheered as he appeared.

He walked right to the "mike" and said, "My friends, if I am elected to the third term I don't know what I will do," and the big show was on.

As the Chief was trying to move the piano around Bergen was making a lot of motions as if to help, and each waiting for the other to do the work. They finally decided to let it alone.

The Crowd of 25,000 People

The crowd of 25,000 people came from various states to Decatur and filled the parking lots and streets for blocks and every driveway was taken, some cars parked outside the village limits and the occupants walked in and cars were still coming in when the show was nearly over. The spectators were very quiet and orderly, for there was plenty of room and it was not necessary for people to be crowded and many stayed with their cars.

The Traffic

State police started coming at about 10:30 a. m. and as more help was needed it was sent for. At 5 p.m. the boys of the fire department reported for action and traffic was moving fast. At 6 p. m. Chas. Koons and the sheriff department reported for action. Officers from Mt. Clemens and Elkhart took a part and with this we had about 50 efficient men taking care of the situation. Chief Woolfe was informed that each committee was well instructed Wednesday. Eight members from the state post of Paw Paw and Niles worked with the members of the fire department on traffic and parking. The sheriff's department took charge of the crowd at the field, having men stationed around through the crowd to take care of any disorder that might arrive and to keep the people from making unnecessary noises.

The Ralston Battery shop sent Mr. Less Hammond down and loud speakers were installed over the stage and on posts set in the field and every one could hear and many compliments were given in behalf of this good work. Thanks to M. E. Leighton for assisting in the work.

Ted Merrill was visiting at the home of H. H. Creagan and saw that traffic was congested at that four corners. He took a cane and a fireman's badge that Herb. gave him and in a few minutes everything was going smoothly. Mr. Merrill worked with the boys the rest of the evening and many thanks to him for his services.

Two officers, here from Elkhart, offered their services and Chief Woolfe said if at any time they could see anything to do it would be appreciated. They surely were kept busy. Officers and members of the fire department from other towns called the Chief and offered their services, and if needed they would have been called.

Fred McWilliams had charge of the seat arrangements, and with the help of our town marshal, Lou Taylor, and assistant, Jess Kelsey, they were busy every minute. The Becker Company big truck was sent to Kalamazoo for seats.

Traffic was a big problem and Therald Oatman, chairman of this committee, did an outstanding job, and the boys were highly complimented for the way the traffic was handled. There was not a single accident or a complaint of any kind. Congratulations from many of the surrounding cities and villages have been received by the Chief for the home coming of Bergen.

THE BATH IN THE WELL

This is the story as Edgar Bergen remembered it and told it at the dinner given in his honor in the Masonic lodge room Tuesday evening:

Before he told it Edgar inquired if the Southworth boys were present, but they were not there to join in the laugh.

The incident took place when Edgar was seven or eight years old. The family lived on the Valley road on the farm the father had bought of Reuben Calbetzor. Just east of the Bergren farm was the Dewey farm, later known as the Latham farm.

Springs of clear cold water come to the surface on that farm. One of them made a pool several feet in diameter and a well house had been built over it. No one was living in the house at the time.

One warm summer day Edgar and three other boys, we think two of them were Harold and John Sherburn, stripped and went into the pool. They were having a great time when the other boys began to sense danger and one by one gathered up their clothes and got away.

Edgar proceeded to enjoy himself alone, until finally he looked out and there were Mr. and Mrs. Leo Southworth, then bride and groom, taking in the situation. They were coming there to make their home.

Edgar skinned out of the pool and into the nearby corn field in a hurry, not taking time to get his clothes. He found the other boys and tried to get them to go for his clothes, but they refused.

Leo called to him, and told him if he wanted his clothes he would have to come and get them, and he was compelled to do it.

The next day John Bergren sent his son over to apologize to Mr. and Mrs. Southworth for going in swimming in their drinking water. Edgar said he never would forget that day.

Mrs. Leo Southworth said later that she was not present. It was Leo and Maynard Southworth who caught the boys in the pool. They were working the farm together. But the story as remembered was very near correct.

Charlie McCarthy To Be Courtmartialed

Riverside, Calif.—The U. S. Army Air Corps will courtmartial its most prominent wooden soldier, Master Sergeant Charlie McCarthy, for two-faced conduct in accepting a sergeant-major's warrant from the U. S. Marines.

An order has been issued by Colonel Benjamin G. Weir, March Field commandant, instructing the saucy NBC dummy to put his affairs in order and report to the Riverside air base within 30 days for disciplinary action.

Col. Weir indicated that Sergt. McCarthy will be suspended from his rank and possibly placed in the March Field guardhouse until an air corps courtmartial determines his motives in joining another branch of the service.

"We have every reason to suspect Sergt. McCarthy of double-dealing and horse-trading in accepting a marine uniform and rank from Maj. Gen. William P. Upshur at the San Diego marine base on June 29," said Colonel Weir.

"We need key officers like McCarthy badly for the training of our recruit personnel here at March Field, but I'm afraid we'll have to sacrifice expediency for principle and order him to stand trial by courtmartial.

"We cannot tolerate air corps officers who place self interest above the interest of the air service, as Sergt. McCarthy obviously did. A soldier cannot salute two generals nor talk a fight on two fronts, even if he has a mouthpiece like Edgar Bergen to help him."

McCarthy received his master sergeant's warrant from Col. Weir at March Field last October after flying there from Hollywood with Edgar Bergen.

"I'm innocent, so help me marines, I'm innocent," was Charlie McCarthy's answer to air corps charges of two-faced conduct, made by Col. Benjamin G. Weir, Air Base Commander at March Field.

"I've had to beat bum raps before," said Charlie. "I'll beat this one too, single-handed, even if I have to get the whole marine corps to help me.

"Didn't anybody ever tell Colonel Weir that we marines ain't never lost a fight?"

"We'll declare war against the air corps, that's what we'll do."

Major Gen. William P. Upshur, commanding general of the U. S. Marine Corps Base in San Diego, Calif., said today that if Sergt. Maj. Charles McCarthy wants to fight the army air corps over charge of duplicity, he'll have to do it without the marines.

"We're too busy training for national defense," said General Upshur.

The general added, however, that he is launching an immediate investigation of McCarthy's motives in accepting a marine warrant, and if the facts warrant such action a marine officer will be appointed as counsel to defend Charlie at the air corps courtmartial.

FOURTEEN—BUT A PRECOCIOUS FOURTEEN —THAT'S CHARLIE

Charlie McCarthy will insist that he is the star of the NBC Chase & Sanborn program, and millions of Americans will agree with him. The most popular "boy" in America, Edgar Bergen's redwood protege, is Hollywood's "greatest lover" and one of radio's finest wits—but men behind the scenes, in spite of their fondness for the precocious Irish red-head, give the bows to Edgar Bergen for the creation of the comedy team.

Edgar Bergen's uncanny aptitude for ventriloquism dates back to his childhood in Chicago, where he was born on February 16, 1903, of Swedish parents. He first learned to mimic people, and then one day startled himself as well as his mother by "throwing" his voice into the oven in which his mother was baking an apple pie.

By the time Bergen entered Northwestern University at Evanston, Ill., he had developed his ventriloquism to such a degree that he was able to earn his way through school by working in chautauquas and in vaudeville, aided and abetted always by his constant companion, Charlie McCarthy, whom he had fashioned after a tough little Irish newsboy.

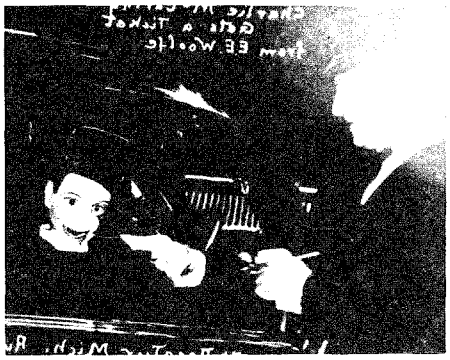
It was Rudy Vallee who introduced Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy to the air audience on December 16, 1936, and started them on the road to the fame they enjoy today. Bergen and his alter ego had given command performances before European royalty and toured the world in vaudeville before this, but following a second appearance on the Vallee show, the two were signed for the Chase & Sanborn program and almost overnight became international figures.

Once in Hollywood, film companies crowded in on Bergen and the impish McCarthy, and they were in demand left and right for feature parts in major productions.

Bergen keeps Charlie's mental age at 14, but it's a precocious 14 and a worthy match for any wit on the popular NBC variety show. Unlike most others of his genre, Charlie does not sit on his master's knee, but on a high, four-legged stool, so that his head is on a level with Bergen's. All of the dialogue between Bergen, McCarthy, Snerd and those with whom they exchange banter is written by Bergen.

A bachelor, Edgar Bergen (born Bergren) is 5 feet, 10 inches tall, weighs 140 pounds and has fair coloring of his Swedish forebears. His favorite sports are tennis and riding, and his hobbies are motion picture photography, carving and inventing useful gadgets.

Bergen Entertainment To Be Held on New Decatur Athletic Field



Late Monday evening the committee on arrangements drove to the Decatur Athletic Field on North Phelps and Cedar streets, went over the field and decided to change the location of the Bergen-McCarthy program to that place.

There is ample space there for the great crowd that is expected, and also parking space for a thousand or more cars.

A platform is in course of erection. The reserved seats will be placed on the diamond and ample lighting will be provided.

Considerable objection had developed to the putting on the program from the band stand because of the lack of room for the audience on Main street. On the Athletic Field there will be plenty of space for all who come.

The Incredible Stooge

EDGAR BERGEN HAS GIVEN AMERICANS A DUMMY FOR A NATIONAL IDOL AND MADE THEM LIKE IT—TREMENDOUSLY.

(Taken from a story by James Street in the Radio Guide of February 18, 1939. Loaned the Republican by Mrs. W. P. Bope.)

Mrs. Nellie Bergren, the farmer's wife, needed strawberries for the shortcake she was making to please her big Viking husband and their two sons, Clarence and Eddie. The farmer was busy in the cattle-barn, stripping his cows, for milk must be delivered, come sundown, to his customers, the staid, solid folk of Decatur, Mich.

He couldn't gather the berries from the little patch near the stable. He had more important things to do and, too, stooping for berries was beneath his Swedish dignity when he had two boys to do the task.

Clarence was splitting wood. He was nine then, back in those dear, dead days of 1910. Clarence was a good boy. Steady. But he couldn't pick berries for Mother Bergren, because when he finished his wood he must help his father in the barn.

So there was none left for the chore but Eddie, who was seven and a master architect, mason and glazier for castles in Spain, palaces built on daydreams with spires in the clouds. Eddie liked many things muchly, and many things not at all, and the foremost of his dislikes was work.

Mrs. Bergren sighed, as all mothers sigh, and decided it would be better to pick berries herself than to try to get Eddie to put in a few licks of labor. But being a resolute woman, also Swedish, she changed her mind and called Eddie. After all, why shouldn't the boy do a little work? Work was good for a boy. If a boy didn't work, he'd probably grow up to be a loafer and wind up on the poor-farm. The world didn't owe anybody a living. It was writ that a man must live by the sweat of his brow. Remember, that was 1910! Mrs. Bergren thought it out and called Eddie —"You, Eddie!"—like that.

She handed him a little wooden basket and told him to make tracks to that berry-patch and hurry back before her sponge-cake burned. Eddie lit out. He knew his mother meant business. But the cake burned and the supper beans got wrinkled and soggy. There were no berries for the cake, for there was no Eddie.

Mother Bergren snatched off her apron, jammed on her bonnet and swished out to the berry-patch. Her son was just sitting there, staring at the sky.

"What are you doing now?" demanded the mother.

"Nothing. Just sitting here thinking."

"Thinking?"

"Yes'm," the boy said. "Thinking about inventing a machine that will pick strawberries."

Mrs. Bergren restrained herself. "Great land of Goshen, Eddie! You are lazy. Some day you will try to invent a machine to do your thinking and talking."

Last year Eddie Bergen earned about $400,000 on a machine that does his talking — suave, conceited Charlie McCarthy, the great of radio, an American phenomenon whose hands are the hands of McCarthy but whose voice is the voice of his master and stooge: For McCarthy's animation is in Bergen's fingers and his life is in his stooge's stomach.

Edgar Bergen was born Bergren in Chicago on February 16, 1903. Somewhere along the trail he has followed, talking to himself, he lost one r in his name. His parents were Swedish and taught him the mother tongue. His father was a dairy farmer in Chicago and perhaps milked some of the descendants of Mrs. O'Leary's.

His folks and his friends called the slight, serious boy Eddie, and when he was five his father put mother Nellie, brother Clarence and little Eddie and all the family's possessions on a train and moved to Decatur, Mich., where they settled on a dairy farm.

He was a mimic even at five, and a practical joker. The first inkling that he could do strange things with his voice came when he was eight. He was sitting one afternoon at the kitchen table, watching his mother bake pies and prattling about a pie-making machine he wanted to invent.

Then, just because he was a hellion, he murmured "Hello, hello, in there," and knocked on the bottom of his chair, and stared at the kitchen door. He had muffled his words and they seemed to come from no particular place. His mother did the obvious thing: she went to the door.

" I was sure I heard somebody," she muttered.

"So did I," said Eddie, and when his mother returned to the stove he said, "Hello, hello," and looked at the oven. Mrs. Bergren snatched open the oven door.

He laughed at her confusion and confessed. " I did it, Mother, I played a joke on you."

"You'll be the death of me, Eddie," moaned Mrs. Bergren. "You'll drive me mad." (She lives with him now.)

He didn't know what had caused his voice to go haywire and he still doesn't. But he knew he had some strange gift. He never had heard of ventriloquism and couldn't have pronounced or spelled the word if he had. He reasoned, however, that he could have a lot of fun with his gift and practiced it in his spare time, of which he had plenty, for Master Bergren would plot for an hour on how to get out of ten minutes' manual work.

He wearied of the effort of practicing and turned his attention to inventions. He tried to invent a lot of gadgets, but he wouldn't stick to them. One day, however, he actually worked three hours without stopping and made a waterproof shoe-polish. He put a little bit of almost everything he could find in it, blackened his shoes and ruined his mother's rug.

His father was a just man and didn't punish him. "That boy will come around," he told his wife.

Eddie persuaded his father to buy him a camera in 1917, and the boy took pictures of soldiers leaving Decatur for camps and France. Then he sold the pictures to the soldiers' loved ones. It wasn't hard work and Eddie loved it. He bought better equipment and saved his earnings. It was the first money Eddie had ever made of his own.

His father died when he was fourteen and Mrs. Bergren took Clarence and Eddie back to Chicago.

EDGAR SHOWED IN MARCELLUS

Edgar Bergen turned naturally toward the LaPearl theatre, now the Cozy. Mrs. Gertrude Metzger was the original proprietor, owner and manager of the movie house in those days, and she named it the LaPearl, after her sister Pearl who died.

Edgar worked about the theatre, swept it out and did odd jobs assisting Mrs. Metzger. The latter recognized the undeveloped genius in the boy and encouraged and helped him as she could.

He put on some entertainments here and on at least one occasion she put on a show in another town with Edgar as the chief entertainer.

Postmaster Herbert Creagan recalls that one night she put on a show in Marcellus. That was back in about the year 1914. He played the snare drum in those days and was engaged to play with the orchestra. Mrs. Metzger took Edgar and Herbert over in her tin Lizzie and they put on a great show.

Sorry we are unable to contact Mrs. Metzger for a story of her recollections of our visitor.

BERGEN OWNS AIRPORT

Edgar Bergen, amateur flier also known as an NBC comedian and partner of Charlie McCarthy, has just made his debut in the new role of airport owner. Bergen has purchased the field, located at Montebello, Cal., to establish an instrument flying school for worthy young pilots who lack the funds to finance their own training. Many such pilots trained by the Bergen Aviation Foundation are already flying for the commercial air lines and in military service.

Tells Story of Visit to Bergen's Palatial Home

While in Los Angeles last March the Copleys and Rudzinskis decided to visit the movie colony. Earl procured the map and acted as guide while Rud steered the party up the very steep mountain where we encountered landslides.

When we reached a very pretentious home to the right we decided we were uncertain as to directions, so drew over to the side to relax and view the beautiful valley and suburbs far below us. Lucille decided to travel the flagstone drive-way and learn our whereabouts. After much persuasion to come back to the car she approached the back door and rang the bell. Not receiving any answer, she proceeded thru the patio to the front door where a sweet voice from above asked who's down there?

Lucille answered a party from Michigan trying to locate Edgar Bergen's home in the mountains. Upon that admission Jack Whitney's secretary appeared on the scene and invited the party in.

This was John Gilbert's old home but after his death, Miriam Hopkins purchased it and changed the interior to suit her tastes. After relaxing around the swimming pool we decided to climb the remainder of the mountain. After passing John Barrymore's home we observed a very attractive home, typical California style, and as it was the highest point we drew up to the gate, telephoned in and the maid ushered us into the living room.

Soon after we were seated Edgar arrived and graciously welcomed us. He showed us through his home which was exquisitely furnished and in excellent taste for a batch, and around the perfectly landscaped grounds overlooking Hollywood and vicinity.

Then we made the acquaintance of Charley and Mortimer and saw charley's elaborate wardrobe and the complete studio where private performances are given.

Mrs. Bergren had just returned from the hospital and the nurse informed us that she was ready to see us so we had a nice visit with her. She remembered Earl best because he settled Mr. Bergren's estate and sold them their first Ford which Edgar insisted on watching the first night napping on the couch.

Then Edgar who is a renouned photographer from early childhood, invited us to have our pictures taken with him in the patio. He kindly mailed us the prints after we returned home, and they were splendid and greatly appreciated.

While at his home he invited us to attend his performance with Charley, Mortimer and Ophelia at San Diego the following Saturday evening. We were delighted as San Diego was the high spot of our trip. Edgar played to a packed house, perhaps 5000 people at the Russ Auditorium and by the hearty applause, you could readily realise that he is a favorite there as well as over the entire U. S. and his home town.

EDGAR BERGEN HAS BUSY DAYS IN DECATUR

When Edgar Bergen finished his work on the stage Wednesday night and before the great crowd began to move he went over to Dr. Bope who was with him on the platform and said, "Well, doctor, good bye, I'm leaving now."

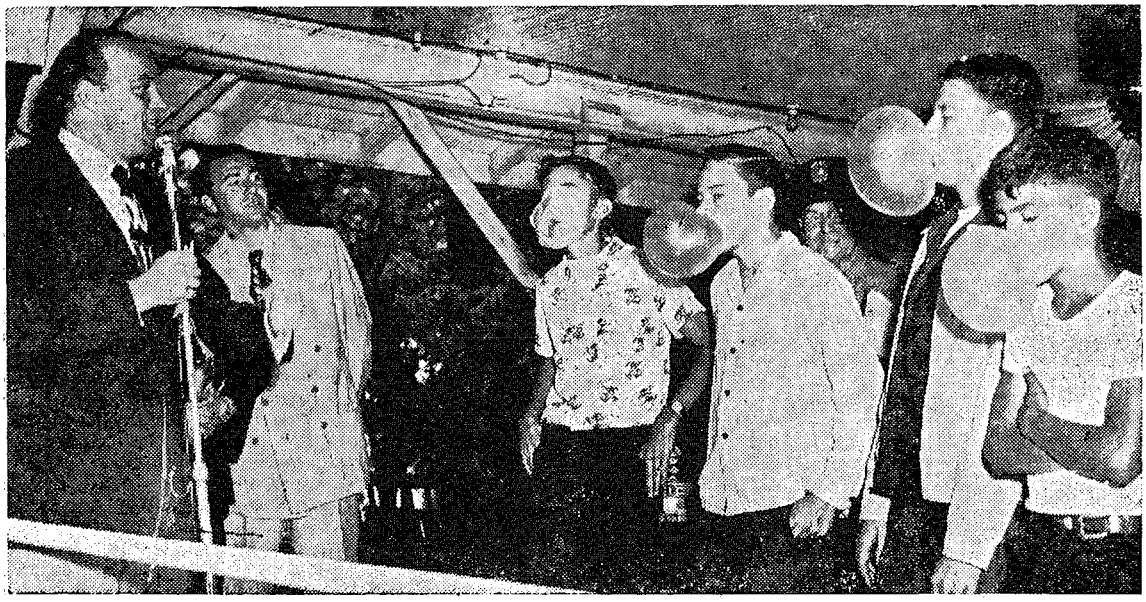
The family had a night luncheon prepared for him and his party but he said he could not wait. He had to be in Chicago the next morning and by going at once he would get ahead of the traffic.

They drove to South Bend, the old home city of his press agent, Joe Alvin where they caught a night train for Chicago.

At the close of his part of the program Mr. Bergen introduced Mr. Blackstone, whom he said is considered the greatest magician of the United States and perhaps the world. While Mr. Blackstone was doing some wonderful tricks with the playing cards the Bergen party left. The crowd is still wondering what became of those 13 cards that were in the handkerchief

Edgar Bergen's Arrival

Edgar Bergen, noted radio and screen star, was greeted by Dr. W. P. Bope, an old acquaintance, as he alighted from the New York Central "Wolverine" at the Kalamazoo station. W. B. Cudlip, Detroit, the doctor's son-in-law, motored from Kalamazoo to Decatur, behind a state police escort. —Kalamazoo Gazette photo.



Four rapt kids do their darndest in the bubble gum contest sponsored by Edgar Bergen at 11 o'clock Saturday morning. Winners for the boys and girls contests were Keith Kammeraad and Harriet Sandburg, each of whom received from Bergen a year's supply of bubble gum. held by Dr. Bope.

Bergen arrived in Kalamazoo on the Wolverine at 10:23 Tuesday morning, August 19, and was met at the train by Dr. Bope and family. Kalamazoo Gazette photographers were on hand and took pictures of the meeting with his host, and from then on it was one grand event for everyone.

At ten forty-five the Republican received a telephone message that the party had arrived in Paw Paw where a short stop was made, and by a few minutes after eleven Mr. Bergen and party arrived in Decatur.

The Decatur band and many citizens came out to welcome him and a crowd awaited him at the Bope residence on west St. Mary's street. There were many children in the crowd and Edgar entertained them by giving a chat with his latest invention, Ophelia.

It was a great day for the kids. When Edgar came down town in the afternoon they followed him around and wherever he stopped they stopped. In front of the printing office he was surrounded and spent 10 or 15 minutes writing his name for them.

As he was leaving the office Lena Van Meter got a nice picture of him.

On his return to the residence of Dr. Bope he tried to get some rest but was constantly interrupted. While an amateur photographer was taking his picture he was notified of a telephone call from Portland, Oregon. He let the photographer finish the job before answering the call. Mr. Bergen went from here to Minneapolis where he puts on his show at the Minnesota State Fair, and we understand that from there he will go to Portland.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND OF OLD PEWTER

By Bessie Fuhrman

Although there have been many real Alices in the wonderland of old pewter, judging from the many collectors of it represented in museums, any one can become a "just pretend Alice" and share the joy of discovering fine pieces of the now rare reminders of an antique art and craftmanship. And here's how, you too, can chase the white hare of your curiosity and have a real treat of the imagination in a real world of old pewter.

The first thing you do, if you're going to be another "Alice in Wonderland" is to ask questions, for you know that was how the other Alice got her start. Then some friendly librarian may bring you a big book on "The History of Pewter Making" as well as several other books concerning the collecting of old pewter. As you leaf through the maze of interesting pictures and unusual facts about the once world-extent industry, you will feel as bewildered and entertained as ever Alice did when she began her wonderful adventures in the realm of childhood.

In the first place, you, now Alice, will suddenly appear in the Orient—back 2000 or more years ago for no one knows exactly when pewter making began, and no one is sure just who discovered the idea of combining tin with certain alloys to produce pewter—but China is credited with the honor since the Chinese are known to have originated so many other useful as well as ornamental products such as paper, silk, gunpowder and porcelain or chinaware.

Having recalled these facts, Alice was interested to know if the Chinese added any further discoveries to that of pewter-making and then she found that they had, indeed, experimented further—one instance was that of adding copper and brass in different patterns to their pewter vessels.

Then, having made this brief introduction to the mysteries of the earliest making of pewter and its adaptation to various uses, Alice opened a little door into Old Japan and there she found that the Japanese, not having learned the Chinese' secret of pewter composition, had devised a combination of their own, that they called pewter. It was so very strange in its appearance that Alice could hardly believe that it was pewter. It had a delicate green bloom or rust over it in two tints—a lighter ground with a darker shade in irregular spots and patches which Alice thought was pretty for ornamental vases, but she'd hardly care to have her dishes that she ate from look so queer. But for all the secrecy that had once prevailed about the formulas for pewter making Alice now, could find out whatever she cared to know about how this very useful metal was made. She asked why the Japanese old pewter was so different from the Chinese old pewter, and she learned that the people of Japan made it with more lead in one case, and therefore it was more workable than that made in China. In the second case (for they had discovered two ways of making pewter) they put in antimony. That made it hard and adaptable for castings or stamping when intricate and fine lines were desired. Besides these two experiments in pewter making that were successful, Alice saw that the Japanese had tried to plate their pewter by adding a coating of some other metal, but had failed in the attempt, as the coat flaked off in many cases. Then, as Alice left Japan and visited other countries, she found that pewter varied in its composition in the different nations and also according to the purposes for which they were to use the metal. The best quality of plate pewter, Alice discovered, had no lead at all, but 100 parts tin, 8 of antimony and 4 of copper. Common pewter from which "trifles" such as salt cellars, were made, was composed of 82% tin and 18% of antimony. "Better" pewter was 56 parts tin, 8 of lead and 6 of copper. Pipe metal was 60 parts tin and 40 of lead, while metal for dishes was 96 parts tin and 24 of lead. Ley metal, the poorest of all was four-fifths tin and one-fifth lead.

When Alice had noted these differences in the compositions of pewter—once secrets that had been treasures many generations ago, Alice began to comprehend the fact that pewter had been the means of awakening the scientific spirit of investigation to a very great extent. And then she wondered just how great a debt does the world owe China and an unknown Chinese for his discovery of pewter making in just the part it has played in scientific experimentation, not to say anything about the benefits it had bestowed on civilization by raising the standard of living conditions from wooden dishes and cooking utensils to a better and more artistic table and kitchen ware.

And speaking of the other nations that benefitted from the discovery and later began making pewter of their own, Alice found herself rambling around in England. There she learned that the Cornish tin mines being conveniently near lead mines, that England had become famous as the "classic land of tin and lead."

Then Alice started right off on a wild goose chase to find out how people connected the idea of the English tin and lead mines with the making of pewter, and she learned that the Romans had used pewter seals of office and as Phoenicians had heard of the English mines, they set out for Britain and after that the Romans went there, too, to find the materials for pewter. Old Roman office seals were found sometime ago in large quantities in England. And as they made good solder, they were used for that purpose. So the Roman office seals of Westmoreland Co., England that were left there by the Roman legions hundreds of years ago, were at least one chapter in the history of England's old pewter, said Alice, as she rambled on.

Cornwall, England she soon learned, became the source of pewter materials for the Romans at home and tin was carried from there to Italy by ship and across country. Ingots were made of the ore and then later mixed with the different alloys as they made the different grades of pewter.

France and Holland also manufactured pewter and French women had fine pewter in their homes before England began to manufacture pewterware. Thus Alice concluded that France set the style for pewter dishes for England and other countries. And then Alice wanted to know who really set the pace for artistic pewter table ware in Europe, and she learned that Francois Briot was the earliest and most celebrated craftsman in pewter. He had originally been a worker in metals, having made dies and moulds. That man, having seen the possibilities of making pictures in relief on the soft metal, produced many specimens of great beauty as indicated by the numerous collections of his pewter in European museums. His most noted production was a flagon and salver depicting Temperance.

Briot's successor was a French sculptor named Jules Brateau. His best known piece in this country now in the Chicago museum is an ewer and salver depicting Fame as a winged globe. About the boss Cupids are seen holding a ribbon carrying the name of celebrated artists in music, painting, sculptor and architecture. Other decorations are also seen, representing the tools of the various arts and crafts. Thus, thought Alice, Brateau portrayed the idea that pewter art and craftsmanship belong with the other fine arts, although he was not the originator of the idea.

Then Alice wondered where the idea of pewter toys originated and soon she was in Germany. There she found that Nuremberg was the first city in history to start a real toy industry and away back in the 16th century.

Why, that was since Columbus discovered America, thought Alice. "I wonder if Columbus had any toys when he was a little fellow, and then she recided that of course he hadn't had very many since the first real toy factory did not begin its work until he was long past the time for playthings.

Alice learned that Frederick the Great had provided his soldiers with attractive uniforms and the idea of making toy soldiers in such uniforms was thought of, for it provided the suggestion for turning out many toys of pewter at once. Thus, the subconscious suggestion for warfare was planted in the minds of babies through out the world, and now we are seeing the outcome of that influence of instilling the admiration for soldiers and warfare into children's minds. So, that's one thing I don't like about old pewter making, sighed Alice, for who knows just how large a part pewter has played in modern warfare through its pewter toy soldiers making the initial step toward war-mindedness?

Then Alice learned that the foremost of the many Nuremberg artists in pewter was A. C. Enderlein. That made her wonder if he were the real Kriss Kringle. If so, thought Alice, the world has much to be grateful for to that old German city and that old German artist for providing toys and the foundation for further developments in manufacturing the means for childhood happiness.

Then Alice thought she would like to know a little more about the extent of old pewter manufacturing. So she turned to "The History of Old Pewter Making," and found that there had been many corporations or guilds in different countries. One map that Alice saw was about covered with the pictures of the pewter ware made in the various places. In England and France the different guilds had marks which distinguished one manufacturer's wares from another and also indicated if he were honest in his business. Every so often, they had to re-establish their marks and the letter "f" was sometimes placed on a mark if the owner had been dishonest in his dealings. Turning over the pages of the great book, Alice found hundreds of pictures of those marks reminding her of postage stamps. And, then she realized that the making of old pewter had had an enormous industrial importance for centuries throughout the world, but that it passed away when superseded by better products, such as porcelain, stone ware, aluminum and plated wares.

When Alice had finished her reading she decided to set out to look up some of the splendid specimens of old pewter right at home—in the Art museum of Kalamazoo. And there she found some 600 pieces of old pewter, a part of a very large collection made by Mr. and Mrs. Stark of Kalamazoo. She learned that while Mr. Stark, who owned the pottery shop of Kalamazoo started the hobby, Mrs. Susan Stebbins Stark followed it up and spent eight years in Europe making her collection that she gave later to several cities—among which is Kalamazoo. So Alice went to the museum and after looking over the entire assortment she went back another day and concentrated her attention on several of the most outstanding specimens. Some of these were flagons, chalices, loving cups, beakers, various shaped spoons, measuring cups of many sizes, hot water bottles, bed warmers, platters, urns, and coffee and tea pots. In the farthest room she found the very lovely engraved Chinese serving dish made with four compartments and lid for keeping food hot until served. In the Holland case was another such dish but smaller and more simple in its lines and with no attempt at being artistic.

The French pewter in the showcase in the hall was lovelier than some of those specimens in the American collection and may have been of a better grade of pewter. However, Alice found a rich source of materials for comparison and study of an old time means of livelihood for many people for many generations, and as such, Alice realized that she had seen far into the history of the world's past through these ancient remainders of a civilization that his passed away.

Alice in Wonderland of Old Luster Ware.

Then Alice went to the other Art Museum of Kalamazoo that stands between the city library and the one that houses the Old Pewter and found a perfect fairyland of beautiful Old Luster ware. One case of silver luster ware attracted her attention for quite a while. Then she turned to another case where a turquoise and silver goblet stood with pink and gold luster ware and a few white ones with silver and with gold adornments.

In another room were seen old gold luster jugs or pitchers and old copper specimens also. Some lilac and old gold pieces were lovely although the lilac is not as highly prized as the pink or rose or ruby luster ware. Blue and old gold pieces were among the very handsomest specimens in the collections.

Some of the various groups of old luster ware were marked 'resist luster' and this Alice learned was named so because of the method used in producing a white or colored pattern on a silver or copper ground. If a white pattern is desired, a white surface is laid on the clay body of the sugar bowl or whatever the dish is, and the outline is painted or stenciled on with some substance such as glycerine or some other preparation that does not resist water. Then the whole pattern is "lustered" over with the luster ware solution and allowed to stand until partly dry. Then the glycerine covering the outline of the pattern is washed off. The metallic solution used to luster over the pattern "resists" the water and the ware is fired to complete the work. Thus Alice learned how old resist luster ware gets its name and its distinctive stencil-like patterns.

Then as Alice stood and gazed upon the beautiful old pieces of gold and blue luster ware she saw that this entire collection was also the gift of Mrs. Susan Stebbins Stark to the Kalamazoo Art Museum. Desiring to learn more and more about this, also an antique reminder of past artists and craftsmen, Alice went to the library and found a very instructive little book entitled "Collecting Old Luster Ware" by W. Basanko. In the editors preface, the editor of this little volume says that he believes it to be the first book on old English luster ware ever published.

Thus Alice combined her acquaintance of old luster ware as seen in the museum with the information contained in the guide mentioned above and found a very lovely and instructive hobby could be built upon the acquisition of vases and dishes of this as yet not too rare luster ware.

Alice in the Wonderland of Old Bottles

Well, Alice kept rambling on and on and finally she came to a little room with two large windows filled with little bottles and big bottles of various sizes, shapes and colors so arranged as to provide beautiful color contrasts of brown and white, blue and white, green and white, and in this little room were two show cases also filled with glass bottles and even a pink striped glass rolling pin. Some old ruby glass was seen and a pair of German tankards silver mounted on rich blue, were outstanding in every respect—shape, color and decoration. And here again Alice saw how the collector must have thrilled on finding so many unusual shaped bottles as well as so many different uses for bottles that she had hardly thought of.

Then as Alice turned away from the wonderland of old bottles and the thought of the times when those relics were devised and manufactured, she knew that with an enquiring mind a number of good specimens and a few books, that anyone can have a wonderful time just pretending you are living in the long ago of a people that have made their contribution to the ladder of civilization, just as you and many others are trying to do in your ways, today.

And just then Alice thought about the wonderland of 600 years of famous paintings that have been on exhibit at the Kalamazoo Art Museum and wondered if one ever could cease to be an Alice in Wonderland after one really becomes one.

WALTER BROWN SEZ-

Why didn't you put it in the paper that you like good music too? (That is what we intended to do but overlooked it. Like Walter we love good music. "Music hath charm to soothe the savage beast," and it hath charm to soothe us. Turning on the radio recently we heard a lady from the Grand Opera Company sing most charmingly one of those beautiful classic songs with an unpronounceable name. It was well worth listening to. Then some funny man followed it with small talk and spoiled the effect of the song.)

There was a girl last week who sung over the radio, "God Bless America," and it seemed just as though I was floating up to the sky. There is nothing on earth equal to good singing and I guess it is the happy road to heaven.

Speaking about that Indian fight down by Lake of the Woods. That was interesting. I guess it is true, too, for there were lots of evidences of Indians being around here. You could pick up arrow heads by the bushel, almost, when this country was new. I have picked up arrow heads on the old Higgins place where I used to take the cow to pasture. The Higgins farm is better known now as the Vowell farm. I heard that at one time a Chicago man gave $15,000 for that farm, but it twant worth it.

When we first went onto the Lee place where we lived so many years there were water holes on it that stayed there the year around and they say that Lake of the Woods extended clear over to the railroad. Draining the lake has made a vast difference with the country here. Maybe it was for the best but I have my doubts about it. I think they have overdone this draining business.

Say, if you want to see a fine building, just jump into your car and go and see the barn that Chicago lawyer is putting up. (Allen Hoben.) My, but it's a fine building. It's 36x50 feet on the ground and I don't know how high it is. It's the biggest barn in this town, it sure is. I never see one here any bigger. You ought to go and look at it. Decatur is a good town. I tell you it certainly is. It has improved wonderfully during the last few years. One thing that makes the town look nice is the well kept streets.

Martz is manager for Allen Hoben, that's his name. Martz is milking five cows for him. He says it takes him about an hour. Martz is right there on the job all the time. I haven't seen him in the market for quite a while,—not since they have been building that barn.

I tell you that attorney is spending a lot of money here. He is a good man for this town. We haint got none better. He bought the old Mark Thomas farm just out of town. The Reverend Robert Queel lived there too in an early day.

Did you ever see how huckleberries have come up in price since we were boys. My sakes, fifty years ago they wan't worth nothing. Father and I once picked a bushel basket full along the swamp down near Will Congdon's.

The old brick yard was right west of where the Congdon house stands. I wouldn't wonder if the old clay holes are there yet, but I haven't been by there for years. It was all swamp in there when I first knew the place. You've no idea what a change has been made there. Why, years ago you could no more have built a house in there than you could on Lake of the Woods.

Old man O'Rourke lived in that Congdon house when I came here back in 1870. He and George Bennett made the brick. Old man O'Rourke put up a sign for huckleberry pickers to stay out, but nobody paid any attention to it. Lord, if everybody in town had gone out there to pick they couldn't have picked them all. I guess they couldn't. But look at huckleberries now, they're away out of sight in price. My wife priced them last week but didn't buy, they were too high. (The price was 30 cents per quart.)

Well, I don't know as you ought to print this, but my father at one time was a great Spiritualist. He was one of the kind that was always investigating. He said he believed in thinking as he was a mind to and of letting other folks do the same. It was none of his business what they believed in. Father was a Baptist first. The whole family went to the Baptist church back in Chagrin Falls, Ohio.

Dr. Kinney and his wife were great Spiritualists too, They lived on the corner of Delaware and George streets where Charlie Brigham lives now. My, but they had great seances there.

One time father came home and said there was going to be a seance at Dr. Kinney's and he wanted me to go to it and play the organ, just run over the keys while the seance was going on.

I never had been to a seance and wasn't very sure that I wanted to go but decided that I had better do what father wanted me to.

When we got there we found a lot of people. The room was full and they sat right in front of a sort of improvised platform with a curtain in front of it, near as I can describe it. I don't remember who all was there but I know particularly that your father and Thede Trowbridge were there.

The medium sat over in a corner of the room, not near anybody. He kept his head bowed down and his hands in his lap. He never said a word and acted as if he was in a stupor.

I went to playing chords on the organ and while I was playing somebody called my name. I didn't know anymore than you do who it was and I didn't make a move.

I looked at the strange person who called me and I could see him just as plain as I can see you. He looked like a real man, was dressed like one, too. But he didn't look at me, he looked straight ahead. You wait too long and they disappear. I waited too long and this one disappeared, just seemed to sink right down through the floor right at my feet and disappear out of sight.

Dr. Kinney called me the second time and when I looked around the apparition, or whatever you're a mind to call it, was there again. This time I got my wits about me and I got up and asked him, "Is this my grandfather Dimoc?" The man was short and had sandy whiskers, just like my Grandfather Dimoc. Now I had never seen my grandfather Dimoc, but had heard mother tell about him and how he looked. It just popped into my head that if it was any of my folks it was him. But the spirit said in a whisper, "No."

I went back and took my seat and don't remember anything more that happened there that night.

I have since come to find out that there are more people who are mediumistic than you have any idea. I could tell you several instances that have come under my observation but won't take the time to do it now.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE SEEN

Neither David Deuel of Glenwood nor his wife are followers of Spiritualism, but they have had some queer experiences. A day or two after John Tompkins of Decatur was buried some 20 years ago, there were 8 or 10 relatives sitting around in the parlor and everyone of them heard John's voice. They did not understand what he said but they recognized his voice.

I went once to a seance at Frank Chamberlin's over by Gravel Lake. Fred Forbes, Del McKee and Ira Langdon were with us that night. People were brought back from their graves, but I didn't see anybody I knew.

My wife's mother told her that "If it is at all possible to come back to you I'm coming back." Mrs. Deuel said she afterward saw in a shadow the form of her mother just as plain as could be. Their daughter saw it too and said, "Why, that's grandma."

Thelma Rice, 18, was sick of a lingering sickness. One day she told her parents, "I am going to die at 4 o'clock tomorrow." She died at the striking of the clock as she said. That was in Hillsdale about ten years ago. She was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dana Rice, once residents of Volinia. —From a visit with David Deuel last week.

I didn't find but one mistake in what you put in about the Hopkins and Ackley mills last week. The doctor they sent for when Wilson got caught in the belt was Dr. Ross and not Dr. Rose. Dr. Rose had not located in Decatur yet.

Dr. Ross was the most active doctor in town. He was a busy man. You bet he was, but he would take too much liquor at times. The way they drove over the rough roads night and day it wasn't much wonder that he took a little too much stimulant to keep himself going.

One time I heard tell he was called out to East Valley to see one of Frank Andrus' three daughters. She was in great pain and doc knew he must give her some powerful medicine and be particular about it.

When he got out there he said he would have to lay down and sleep an hour before he would give her a particle of medicine. He did it while the little girl suffered, and then he gave her the dose and she came out all right.

The Decatur directory of 1869 gives Ross and McKelvy as partners in the doctoring business here, but I don't remember anything about McKelvy.

Doc. Ross moved away from here, as near as I can remember about the time Dillon came, in the early seventies.

Dillon and Rose came here about the same time and were partners at first, and then they fell out and separated.

Keables and Baker were also doctors here in the early days. Remember them, I guess I do. I could tell you some great stories about things that went on then but I guess I won't.

There was another startling incident in connection with the Hopkins and Ackley feed and saw mill south of town. You remember last week I told you how Sam Wilson got wound around a belt and killed.

Well, a little while after that, I can't say as to just how long it was, but it was after Sam was killed, four women were at Josiar Hopkins' house visiting. Josiar lived right there on the 4 corners across the road from where the South Side store is now. The women went down to the mill to look around and see things as women will, and going back up into the front of the mill they had to step over a line shaft that was boxed in.

It was a step of about a foot and a half from the floor to step over it, and it was the same line shaft that Wilson got caught on.

The first three women stepped over it all right, despite the fact that their dresses were considerably longer than the women wear in this day and age.

When the last woman stepped over her dress caught on that line shaft. She gave a yell and Lute Hopkins, Josiar's boy, grabbed her quicker than lightning. He saved the woman's life but the line shaft stripped the clothes off her.

She wasn't hurt but was awfully shocked. The other women crowded around her and they got her home some way. I was right there, but I didn't see the accident and didn't pay any attention to how she got out of the predicament.

In the fall of 1875 I took a vacation from the work in the mill and went to Fenton to see my folks, and while I was gone both the feed mill and the saw mill burned up.

I want to tell you a story of what happened one day when I was working at the saw mill. They took in an awful pile of logs from all around the country.

One time Pat Kelly from over north of town came there with a load of logs just as I was going to dinner.

Pat had a good farm team, a black matched team, and they were chuck full of life. He had unloaded his logs and was getting ready to come back to town when the mill whistle blew for noon, and that scared the team. They headed down the road on a dead run with the big sleighs slipping over the ice without making any resistance at all.

Ida Rawson was going home from school and they were coming right at her. She ran to the fence like a house afire and jumped it just as fast, and then got back onto the walk when the team passed her.

I guess I'm getting old. I was coming down town and the sidewalk was covered with snow and I was floundering around like I could hardly stand up, and Garsh, one of the nicest high school girls I about ever see came up to me and asked if she could help me.

You bet your life that was a nice thing for her to do. I wish I knew her name. She told me what it was but I couldn't remember it till I got to the post office.

I see you got some reader who remembers the old Decatur Silver Cornet Band. Remember it? Well I guess I do. I played in it, played a silver cornet right next to Sela.

We had good uniforms, you bet we did. They were made in Cincinatti and I don't remember what they cost apiece. It was all of $20.

It was back in the nineties when I played with them. We had some great times.. I should say we did. Yes, sir. We went to Paw Paw to play. We played in Sister Lakes one Fourth and we played around on the streets here. We would get up in front of a store and play and the store keeper would come out and set up the cigars. That's the way we got the smokes. I never smoked, so I gave my cigars to my father-in-law, Frank Mott. Nobody ever thought of smoking cigarets then.

One time we had a Fourth of July celebration and we played all day. Willard Van Antwerp can tell you all about it. He was a mighty fine bass drummer, Willard was. Yes, sir, he was.

You want to know what became of that old melodian we used to have in our house. I don't know what did become of it. Think I gave it away to somebody when we broke up and went to Kalamazoo. I didn't want it any more, wouldn't have taken it to Kalamazoo for it.

I got a second hand piano of Charlie Grinnel. It was a good one, too, you bet your life it was. It was made in New York City by a German firm and cost $600 when it was new. I used to like to play it. My fingers got so stiff I could not play any more and I sold it before we came back here.

Speaking about Charlie Rawson being 83 December 13, and Friday at that, I'll be 81 the 22nd of January. That's old enough.

I was in the electric shop the other day and we got to talking about how this town was lit up fifty years ago. There ain't much difference in the way the men get lit up, but there's a great improvement in how the village does it.

Decatur, I tell you, is a pretty good town. I never see the street look any beautifuller than it does today.

After the Civil War there were thousands of Civil War muskets stored all over the North. They were sold in Decatur for a dollar and a half apiece. I bought one. It was a muzzle loader and had a bore as big as a penny,—about as big—it might have been a little smaller. I always used number 8 shot. Got pigeons with it. Ran across Charlie Pritchard one day. He was hunting same as I was and he got 'em too.

The pigeons were thick then. My Lord, you have no idea how thick they were. Thousands of them, millions. Sometimes they would fly over the country and there would be so many of them they would shut off the sun and make it dark.

The stave factory boys used to bring their shot guns to work with them and stand on the railroad crossing and shoot down a mess when they flew over.

Now the wild pigeons are all gone. Nobody knows where they are anymore. It's too bad they were allowed to be exterminated.

You can't remember when the pigeons were in their prime. It was back in the early seventies and you were too small a boy.

When I was a boy I worked several seasons for Lyman Hinckley on the south side of Eagle lake. He had an eighty there, and I guess he had more than that later on. Yes, I think he did.

It was a great country around Eagle lake in those days back in the seventies. That country was practically all timber to start with and there was plenty of it then.

I remember their telling about an extra big tree on the north side of the lake where an eagle built its nest, and that is what gave the lake its name.

John Lyle had a lot of land on the north side of Eagle lake. He cleared some of it and built his house there and it is still standing. His grandson, Jay Lyle, owns the farm now and I guess the old house is his tenant house.

John Lyle and his brother William were great cattle men. They spent a good deal of their time driving about the country buying up calves. They took the calves to their farms and raised them into big fat cattle and sold them on the market. They made it pay, I guess they did.

I've seen them go by my home at the bend in the road here in the village many times every spring driving a bunch of cattle to the Decatur stock yard to ship them on to Chicago or Buffalo. They didn't bring them into town in trucks like they do now. I guess they didn't. Things wasn't so easy in those days.

As I remmber it old John Lyle drove along in his horse and buggy behind the herd, and besides he had a man on horseback to keep them from straying off the road.

The road was sandy and when the weather was dry they kicked up some dust, I'm telling you. Cattle have a way of dragging their feet after they have gone a ways, and that's about the best way there is to kick up a dust. I don't suppose people could endure so much dust now. It was so thick you could cut it with a knife, as they used to say. But folks didn't seem to mind it so much then. They didn't expect anything else. It was something that couldn't be cured and had to be endured, and was taken as a matter of course. It was said when I was a boy that everybody had to eat a peck of dirt before he died, and I guess some folks ate a good deal more than that.

Dan Cordner used to work for John Lyle back in the time I was working for Hinckley. He was a good worker, Dan Cordner was. There wasn't any better man in these parts with a team. John knew how to pick good men, and he got the work out of them because he was a worker himself. A hired man will do a lot better for a man who will work well of himself, instead of just standing around and bossing.

The men liked Mrs. Lyle, too, and that counts a whole lot. She was a big hearted, generous woman and looked out for the men's welfare. Dan told me one time that when he would go to the house to get a drink of water Mrs. Lyle would come out and ask him if he was hungry and would like something to eat. Things like that please the men. Mrs. Lyle was a good old soul and the help would do anything for her.

So much for old John Lyle and his wife. They certainly was a good couple.

Talk about the gay nineties, I can tell you something that actually happened in Lawton during those years. In the summer of '95 they had a great Fourth of July celebration there and the Decatur band went over there and played.

It was a hot day—the days last week weren't any hotter—and us band boys had new suits. The boys had just got them in Cincinnati. They were dark blue or black, I don't know which, one or the other. Willard Van Antwerp can tell you all about it, he played the bass drum and Sela and I played the cornet, lead.

Those suits we wore were nice ones. The coats were heavy woolen and I tell you they were hot. We marched around all day in the sun with those heavy coats on, and gosh-a-mighty how we roasted. We unbuttoned the coats after we got through marching, but we didn't take 'em off, no sir, that wouldn't have done.

They had a big time at the celebration, near as I can remember. All I can sure remember is the way we marched around in the hot sun wearing those heavy suits.

I can't remember all the players in that band but some of them were Dan Carney, he played solo alto and played it well, yes he did. That is a good part to play. I would pick that part out to play if I was going to play in the band again.

Roe and Paul Warner both played in that band, but I couldn't tell you what they played, some of the different horns. Roe Warner was a pretty good player. He had a good lip.

Nick Huff and Will Clark also played. They were both good players too. They had the lung power and they took right hold of it. I tell you that counts a good deal. I can't remember what Nick played, but he was a good player. Will Clark played baritone. That's a good solo horn and he played some nice ones on it.

Billie Sutton I think played the snare drum, and he was a good one too. I don't know what ever became of that fellow. I don't know whether he is still on earth or not.

Ed. Carney played the tuba and the two were pretty well matched, one was as big as the tother. Ed. played it all right.

There were others in that band, of course there were, but I can't remember who they were.

We played over to Sister Lakes once, but I don't remember much about it. That was a long time ago.

We played on the street here in Decatur too. We would huddle up in front of a store and play, and after we got through the store keeper would bring out a box of cigars. I didn't smoke but I took one just the same. Took 'em home and father-in-law Frank Mott would come down and I'd let him have them.

I've been reading the war talk in the Republican this week and it reminded me of an old book that has been in our library ever since I can remember. It was handed down to me by father and I don't know where he got it.

It is a collection of "Letters from Ireland," by Charlotte Elizabeth, printed in 1856, the year I was born.

Here are two verses copied out of the book that struck my eye as being pretty good:

The power that nerved the stalwart arms of Gideon's chosen few,
The power that led great William, Boyne's red'ning torrent through,
In his protecting aid confide and every foe defy,
Then put your trust in God, my boys, and keep your powder dry.

Already see the star of hope emit its orient blaze,
The cheering beacon of relief, it glimmers through the haze;
It tells of better days to come, it tells of succor high,
Then put your trust in God, my boys, and keep your powder dry.

A TRIBUTE TO MONTY JACK

Kalamazoo, Mich.
December 8, 1940.

To the Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Michigan.
Gentlemen:

Having read Monty Jack's letter to the Republican before, as well as the one of November 26, I had intended to show my appreciation of them and at last I have started to do so. I do not know that Monty Jack will know who I am as he was only four or five years old when I saw him last. However, that doesn't matter as my aim is to tell the Republican readers who may not know Monty Jack, just who he is.

He is John Ball, the son of Ace Ball and the daughter of Mrs. Grimes. That is to say he is a Ball, a descendent of the same Balls from whom the Father of His Country descended. If that isn't something to boast about along with being an American! Besides, he is the grandson of Mrs. Grimes, an incarnation of the widow who gave all that she had, for she was not only a widow who had to work in her old age to support herself, but she helped to support others.

She lost her daughter and her son just when she seemed to need them most, and then she took her infant grandson to raise, and her aged brother who had had a stroke had no home but her's. And besides her work of taking care of those two dependents on her, and her garden work and washings, she took the teacher of the district to room and board.

This was the woman who brought up John Ball, a woman so kind, honest, hardworking and brave that to be her descendent is an honor deserving to be placed alongside that of being a distant relative of George Washington.

When John's sweet young mother died, he was too young to understand his great loss. He could not know that when he cried "Mama, mama," that his mama lay in her casket and could never again answer her baby's cries nor see her precious little boy grow up to manhood.

John was only three or four years old when I boarded with Mrs. Grimes in the Bond district and afterward when she moved to the West Valley district where I taught the following year, so I remember John (Monty Jack) as the little boy whom I used to cuddle on my lap years ago.

Knowing now of his lonely life as a single man trying to "prove up" on a claim in a cold, bleak country, a modern pioneer but without the companionship as had the old time pioneers who usually had parents, friends or families, I am pleased to send him greetings and praise for his courage and manliness in taking his part in the world's work of pioneering alone, far from home and friends, out where the coyotes bark and where the weather is far too cold for comfort for a long time each year.

As to his old friends and relatives still here or not too far away to see him when he returns, there are Basil Ewald, Johns cousin Pansy and her mother, his aunt; his aunt Lyde and uncle Jack Goble; his cousin Freida Bowers and her family; his cousin Ethel Goble Brown and her family; his Aunt Deal and her daughters; his cousin Robert Ball, his aunt Susie and cousin Lytle Watson and others.

His kind hearted uncle Clem and Aunt Lucy, as he knows, will not be there to welcome him on his return to his old home town, but he knows "what fer hospitable folks them thar Balls, aire." So I'm sure he'll have a most happy time in old Decatur next year.

And just to have him know that I wish him a merry Christmas, one that will be warm and glad with happy memories, in spite of the cold outside, I for one, am sending him a little package and I feel sure that his relatives and friends, "while on the Red Cross they are smiling" will not pass him by, for John Ball whom I still remember as little John Ball, is an American pioneer, a Christian, a good citizen and a Decatur boy of whom his friends and relatives are proud, I know.

Sincerely,
Bessie Fuhrman.

Days of Long Ago

Remembrances of Ed. Plopper.

Christmas has gone. The New Year of 1941 is here. Now looking backward.

Who can remember the winter of 1884? I was talking with Tom Bass. He says he can. It was his first winter in Michigan. He says there was more snow than he had ever seen up until that time. Well it was a long cold winter. They said there was 100 days of sleighing. I built fires all winter at the school house for $1.00.

One day in March Bert Lyle, Almond Hope, Horace Loveland, Castal Roberts and myself went over to George Greenman's sugar bush, where they were boiling sap. He filled our little pails with syrup for 25 cents each.

I think Charley Bellus can remember it, for he was working for Mr. Greenman at that time.

We could of had some of that snow six years later, in 1890. That was the winter I got out a barn frame, it snowed about 6 inches on Thanksgiving day. The next day the sun came out bright and I took the sleighs and went back in the lot to get a load of stones, for the barn wall. The sleigh cut through and I got stuck and had to unload them. I afterwards hauled them on a wagon. Hauled the timbers home on a sliding boat, the ground froze, but no snow until the first of April which was Wednesday. Then it snowed again, went off in a day or so. We used to like snow, to haul logs. Most every farmer would cut and haul logs most all winter. Carl Willison bought a piece of timber in our neighborhood that winter and Emory Place, a teamster in Decatur, hauled the timber the next summer on a wagon. It took him all summer.

And now as I first remember the village of Decatur. Some of the business men were Lyman Rawson and Newton Chamberlin bought wheat; S. N. Thomas and W. D. Scott, hardware; Joe Cohn, clothing store; Schuster, Chadwick, Arnold, dry goods; Jim Potts, Roberts and Stewart, Nebitt & Bagley, groceries and meat; T. Browning & Son, drugs; John Shaad, Sam Ellis,, boots and shoes; Keables, Dillon and Baker, doctors; Jim, Aldri h, Thead Harlan, Walter Russell, Neal and Mort Rasmusson, wagon shop and blacksmith; A. L. Moulton, Bill Tucker, lawyers; Charley Tase, hotel and livery; "The Old Duncombe Hotel that burned"; Carl Willison, saw mill; Hinkley stave mill; George McOmber, watches and clocks, in the old post office, which was where the town hall now stands.

In speaking of the old musket that Walter Brown spoke of, yes, I had one of them,—bought it of S. M. Thomas. I hunted squirrels and rabbits with it. The guns were mostly muzzle loaders. Powder, 40c a lb.; shot, 3 lbs. for 25c; caps, 10c a hundred. It was 1 cent a shot and then you could hunt the year around; no law against it. That was in 1883. Will say to my friends in Decatur and vicinity there are no trespass signs on my farm. Hunt all you please, and if you get hungry and there are any apples, help yourself to some. E. W. Plopper.

The War Department has issued an order to beware of wearing a uniform of the United States Army without specific authorization. It is contrary to law and will bring trouble to the wearer.

JONT SAYS - -

If His Friends Could Hear Him Now They Know He Would Say, "All Is Well With Me."

The death of Jonathan E. Goble brought to the service held for him last week Thursday the oldest living settlers of Volinia and Decatur. They assembled at the Newell funeral home to listen to the helpful message of the Methodist pastor, Rev. O. W. Carr, and followed the body to the burial place under the trees in beautiful Lakeside cemetery.

It was a perfect afternoon, the warm October sun blending delightfully with the wealth of flowers brought by relatives, neighbors and friends. The minister read the lines from Tennyson, Crossing the Bar,—

"Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

For tho' from out our bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar."

When the minister closed his service the people seemed loath to leave, it was such a peaceful, restful place to stay. Jont's friends, some of them going back to close onto eighty years, talked over the old times and admitted that for some of them the time on earth is short. There was no fear of the future among them, but a willingness to answer the final summons when it comes.

Jont was born on a farm south of Decatur 80 years ago last December. His father was Isaac Goble and his mother was the oldest sister of our townsman, Andrew J. (Jack) Goble. Jack was a year and one half older than his nephew.

Jont's father died when he was two years old and his mother later married Henry High. He was married first to Gladys Zimmerman who lived but a few months, and on February 7, 1907, he was married to Ellen Shockley Hathaway, who, with her daughter, Irel Hathaway Heap, survives.

Jont's grandfather was Elijah Goble who was born near Cincinnati in 1805 and located on the northwest corner of Little Prairie Ronde in Cass county in 1829. He was married to Eliza Tittle in 1834.

Elijah Goble kept hotel at Charleston for over 20 years, ten years of which it was a stage station.

Now all there is to Charleston is the cemetery and the name. In the years before the Civil War it was an enterprising hamlet with promise of becoming an important city.

Before the village of Decatur had been thought of there were plans to build the Michigan Central through Charleston, but when the railroad officials decided to go north of the big swamp all future prospects of the ambitious little village vanished.

Now and then Jont Goble would write reminiscences for the Republican and they would be published under the heading, "Jont Says—." The old timers looked for those quaint comments and when they came less frequently, his friends sought to know the reason. But Jont's hand trembled so that he could no longer write. If word could come from him now it would be, Jont Says—that all is well with him.

WORKED ON THE REPUBLICAN IN '68

Fred D. Rosenquest, "devil" in the office of the Decatur Republican under Blackman in 1868, died in Terra Bella, California June 27, at the age of 85.

This is interesting news to the Republican of the present day. Had it been known here that one connected with the office so many years ago was still in the land of the living and pursuing the world's best trade, there surely would have been letters passing between us and Republican readers would have been reading them.

Earl R. Clemens is editor and publisher of the Terra Bella News on which the aged printer had been employed the past ten years. Earl Clemens began his newspaper career in Lawton or Marcellus and finally went west as so many good editors do. He is a brother-in-law of Congressman

Hoffman and rather likes the excuse to come back here election years to do a little "campaigning for Clare." Incidentally it is a source of much pleasure to his old time newspaper friends when he drops in for a chat.

But to go back to Fred Rosenquest, we would like to know if any reader of the Republican of the present time remembers him. The first issue of this paper was printed June 5, 1867, 74 years ago, and the first editors were Prof. Bellows, superintendent of the Decatur school, and A. E. Blackman. The office was on the second floor of the 3 story building last occupied by W. T. Beek.

Rosenquest was born in Brooklyn in 1855. His father was a Pennsylvania Dutchman and his mother an English-Irishman. Such a combination could not last for long and when the boy was 12 both parents had passed away. He was placed in an orphanage which bound him out to a farmer near Niles, Michigan, in 1867.

The farmer refused to send him to school and the boy ran away. He walked to Dowagiac where he met a printer who brought him to Decatur. Here he put in an apprenticeship of 3 years, receiving only his board and clothes.

The paper then was called the Van Buren County Republican. It was a 4 page paper of which two pages were printed at home on a Washington hand press.

When the 3 years were up Rosenquest took his first pay job on the Paw Paw Courier, now the Courier-Northerner. So adept had the young man become as a printer that the Paw Paw editor offered to wager big money that he could beat any boy of his age in Michigan at the case.

After two years with the Courier the young printer got a job in Lansing and from there began the career of a roving printer which finally brought him up in Editor Clemens' office in Terra Bella, California.

We thank Mr. Clemens for the interesting sketch of the Republican's first apprentice, which he printed in the News.

30 Years In East Decatur School

Mable Schuneman opened the East Decatur school for the thirtieth year last Tuesday. During all this time she has not only been an educational factor in East Decatur but she has taken a keen interest in the spiritual, social and moral welfare of the community.

We haven't the correct figures at hand, but applying an average we find that during the past 30 years some 150 children have passed the 8th grade, and the greater part of them have gone on to high school.

Miss Schuneman seldom has had to resort to force to maintain order and shall we say discipline? No, because the scholars are actuated to obedience through love and respect for their teacher.

Mable taught school in the Lyle East Valley and White Oak schools before coming to East Decatur. She does not drive a car, but owns part interest in one and prefers to ride at a safe rate of speed. If all the miles that she has traveled going to and from school were placed end to end they would reach more than one-third around the earth.

Miss Schuneman is an expert pianist and during vacations sometimes teaches music on the piano. She never boasts of her accomplishments and is an inspiration for good to all who come in contact with her.

NATIVE SON OF DECATUR RECEIVES SIGNAL HONOR

Norman E. Webster Elected Member of Governing Body of American Institute of Accountants.

(Special) Memphis, Tenn., Oct 18. —Norman E. Webster, native son of Decatur and now chairman of the New York State Board of Certified Public Accountant Examiners, was elected this morning a member of the council or governing body of the American Institute of Accountants at the closing general session of its fifty-third annual meeting here. He will serve a term of three years.

The high honor paid to Mr. Webster honors his many years of service to the profession of accountancy, not only as a practitioner but as a pioneer in the development of educational standards for the profession. In his position as chairman of the New York State Board, he is at the head of the state agency which examines hundreds of candidates yearly for the certificate of certified public accountant.

The American Institute of Accountants is the national professional society of certified public accountants and has a membership of close to 5500 in all of the states and in Canada, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Alaska, the Argentine, Australia, England, Cuba, China, France, Mexico, Scotland and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Webster was born in Decatur in 1869, the son of Norman E. and Jennie L. Chavileer Webster. He attended the Decatur graded schools and later graduated at Union College in Schenectady, N. Y. That institution of learning has conferred upon him the degree of master of arts and the National Law School, of which he is also an alumnus, has given him the degrees of bachelor and master of laws.

Mr. Webster, who is a partner in the New York accounting firm of Webster, Horne and Blanchard, has been a member of the American Institute of Accountants since 1906. In that year he became a certified public accountant in his native state of Michigan and in that same year was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. He became a certified public accountant of New York State in 1910 and of Connecticut in 1929.

The Livery Business Forty Years Ago

(This story from the Lawton Leader will interest the 'old folks' and maybe some of the young ones. It is the story of a once flourishing business now extinct. The Robinson livery was noted throughout this section of the state, but not more noted than were the liveries of Bert Hinckley and Henry Creagan of Decatur and Henry Hinckley of Paw Paw. Sometime we will write a story of the Decatur liveries.)

In an interview with Miss Jennie Robinson, one time owner of the Robinson livery stables of Lawton, a number of interesting things were revealed about horse and buggy days.

The Robinson Livery was started in 1865 by Miss Robinson's father, "Eck" Robinson and a brother-in-law, Lew Morgan. In 1866, Morgan sold out to Robinson, who continued to run the business until his death in 1896. From then on his son, Frank, and daughter, Jennie, operated it until after the advent of the automobile.

Besides the Robinson livery, Lawton had two others, one owned by a Mr. Hessel and one by the Gidings hotel. Miss Robinson estimates that about 40 horses were used in the combined stables.

All incoming trains were met, which included eight on the "Yellow Streak" and ten to twelve on the Michigan Central and at times rivalry was keen among the drivers to see who could get their customer first.

Miss Robinson said she has driven as much as 90 miles a day and often made the trip to Paw Paw and back six times. Decatur, Marcellus, Nicholsville and Schoolcraft were other places included in their drives. Salesmen with lots of luggage would hire a livery rig to make the rounds of the towns rather than to take the train.

Good roads were unknown in those days. Sand in summer, snow in winter and mud in spring. Miss Robinson recalled taking Lynn Free of Paw Paw to Marcellus one winter when they had to drive out in the fields 14 times. She said the winter of 1918 was the worst.

Four drivers were used in the Robinson livery, during the 90's. Mr. Robinson, Sr., Frank Jennie and a hired man. After the death of the father, Frank and Jennie continued until Frank passed away and then Jennie continued alone with the assistance of Earl Huston, who came in 1912 and has since made his home with the Robinsons. This was no easy undertaking for one of the "weaker sex," but Miss Robinson remarked that when so many told her she couldn't ever make a go of it alone, she was determined to do it just to show them she could. After the horse and buggy were passe' Miss Robinson drove a model 'T' and met the trains as usual until she retired a few years ago.

EARLY VAN BUREN COUNTY DAYS

By Nellie Truesdell
916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Nov. 8, 1941.

Dear Editor,—

In Van Buren county about the year 1893 there lived a little boy named Sidney (or "Siddie" to his adoring big brothers and sisters), and to them Siddie could do no wrong.

One day his mother had churned, and left the buttermilk in the churn. She was busy sewing and Siddie seemed to be having a good time in the kitchen, judging from the fact that she heard him laughing. When she finally went out she found he had been dunking the kitten in the buttermilk and then letting it walk away, making a trail of buttermilk every way from the churn. In those days buttermilk had butter in it, so of course it was a greasy little kitten, and had not improved the kitchen floor. Those days we had not even heard of linoleum. Well, that little boy was my brother, and he only staid with us for 35 years, but he left a couple of nice boys, and one of his boys is now in the service of Uncle Sam.

My brother Sidney composed a poem about his boys when they were young and he once told me it was his favorite of all he ever composed. I am enclosing a copy of it.

I notice there is a Decatur boy the same place my nephew is, and that his grandmother has had the Decatur Republican sent to him. Mrs. Cotton is the grandmother and her grandson's name is Pvt. Elbert E. Sweat. My nephew's name is Pvt. Richard B. Johnson. Co. I, 2nd Reg., I.M.R.C., Bldg. 351, Ft. Warren, Wyoming.

I hope the boys will meet. It would please Aunt Nellie, and Grandma Cotton too, I feel sure. Our soldier "Dick's" birthday is November 15.

(Birthday congratulations, Dick, and hope you receive this paper.)

LITTLE DROWSY HEADS

In the twilight, before the lamp-light,
after the day has sped;
By the half light, of the fire light,
comes to me a drowsy head.
Little feet that have grown weary through the long, long hours of day;—
Little face that morn found merry, now has a look far away.

So full of play, the live-long day, tireless, flying feet—
Forgetfully stomping, after romping, in yard and street.
Football "plumping," small heart thumping boyish shouts of joy:—
Comes to meet me—scare and greet me;—rough and tumble boy!

Comes the day-break, He's the first awake, like the robin bird;
Lazy yawning—after dawning, he holds absurd.
He's a the sunshine—at the one time,
sunshine's not preferred—
Little outlaw, worst we ever saw—got to be seen and heard!

Up and prancing, impishly dancing—
into mysterious clothes;
Sink or swim and a job for him, for ma and the Lord only knows.
Got a shoe on the wrong foot too,. in his eager haste;
Three holes too low—the buttons y'know—on such a doggoned waist!

Mr. A. N. Moulton,
Decatur, Michigan.

Dear Editor,—

I shall be happy to write something of early days. As I first saw the light of day in a log house in Waverly township November 1, 1878, there is something of a change in ways of living.

Perhaps I can borrow a little from a family history I wrote a few years ago. So I might say with the poet,—

"Sit with me by the homestead hearth
And stretch the hands of memory forth
To warm them at the wood-fire's blaze."

In the year 1881 we moved to a farm in Geneva township. Black river was our boundary line on the west. Years before there had been a tannery there, but of that I will speak later.

My earliest memory is of standing on the river bank where it was high, in the spring of this year, and seeing rafts of logs floated down to Pennell's saw mill which stood just across the river from our place. I was old enough to thrill to the sight of seeing the men riding on these rafts, and jumping from one to the other of the logs. I believe it was quite a feat to be able to keep right side up.

That year there was a new iron bridge put there, taking the place of a long rickety wooden bridge. The year 1881 was on the iron railing. Today that bridge has been replaced by a modern concrete bridge. I think I sighed a little when I first saw it, and remembered that the wooden rail at the end of the old bridge had so many initials carved on it,—N. J. and H. A.; also E. U. and A. J. Some day maybe I can write a poem about it, and so preserve the memory.

Perhaps this is long enough for this first letter of reminiscences. It is easy and very pleasant to write. I like this stirring of old memories, the echo of voices, many of them now stilled.

"Thus memory brightens o'er our past,
As when the sun, concealed behind
some cloud,
That near us hangs,
Shines on a distant field."

Sincerely,
Nellie Truesdell.

Dear Editor,—

Again I am back in Van Buren county in the early eighties. In early days there had been a stage coach running parallel with the river on my father's farm, and there were several old houses showing that it had been a busy place at one time. We could locate the site of the old tannery which had been run by a man named Hanna. It seemed he wanted to call this locality "Hunter," but the workman insisted on calling it "Jericho," and that is the name it is called to this day. I am sure most of the readers know where Jericho school house is on the road between Bangor and South Haven.

The tannery was moved to South Haven and one of my early memories is seeing and smelling the pungent tan bark as loads of it went by our house. This was bark stripped from hemlock trees, later to be ground by machinery and used in a solution needed for dressing skins. This industry, however was on the wane when we came, due to the exhaustion of trees to supply this bark, and gradually loads of tan bark faded from the picture.

Small bands of Indians were quite common. They often camped near the river and made baskets. I remember of going to their camp with my mother. She asked the price of a basket, and the Indian woman replied in her soft drawling voice, "Two shinin," meaning "two shilling," or as we would say today, " a quarter."

Celebrating the Fourth

And now that it is near July 4th, I must speak of the celebrations of those days. We nearly always went to Bangor, and usually in a lumber wagon. My mother would pack a dinner, and we would eat it in the grove just west of town. There was a speech, but we young folks never listened to it, we were more interested in the lemonade stands along the sidewalk, and the fireworks at night. What a long, hard day for the grown-ups it must have been, with all the chores to do after getting home, but then they had good visits with the neighbors they met there.

My little cotton challis dress that looked so nice in the morning when I started out was sadly rumpled by the time we arrived home, but it had been a great day, and how I had loved to hear the band play "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." It had filled me with more patriotic fervor than many speeches could. I still love to hear it, don't you, Mr. Editor?

(Yes, mam.)

Dear Editor,

Van Buren county in the "gay 90's." I was walking nearly two miles to the Lafler school, where so many young Bangor graduates taught their first term. How I loved to sing the songs in the little "Knapasck" a songbook most schools used. I wish I had one today, but I remember many of the songs. Here is one we used to like to sing.

"When the golden hued October
Tells us we have time to spare
We'll just yoke up Buck and Brindle
And whoa, haw, gee, to the fair."

Would someone want all the words of it, I think I remember all of it, although I may not be able to spell the words in the chorus which were "cocoa ka chelunk, chelunk" etc.

Noons and recess we played in the school yard, crack-the-whip, drop the hankerchief, sheep in the pen, and duck on a rock, and in season went to a near by woods for wild flowers and paw paw apples. I believe this is the only section of the state where paw paws grow. I love to see them growing—a sort of tropical tree they seem, and in the fall they are such a bright yellow. The fruit is a little too sweet to eat much of it. It is something like the papaya we find in Florida.

The last day of school we spoke pieces, and had some dialogs as we called them, and some songs. Our mothers usually came, and we were so proud to walk down to the front of the room and make a stiff little bow and speak our piece without a mistake.

My sister had a pocket on one side of her skirt, and while speaking her piece she put both hands in the one pocket. The teacher would give us a pretty card which might have "Reward of Merit" written on it. We had what we called copybooks in school and at the top of the page would be written some saying like this:

"All is not gold that glitters".

All down the page we copied it. I sometimes look at my carelessly written letters, and remember those perfectly crossed t's and all the other letters in the old copy book.

Spelling lessons always seemed to be the last class of the day, and now and then we would have what we called a spell down. How proud the last one would be until some simple little word would be mis-spelled by them, such as "acre" which made me sit down once, after that I remembered it was not spelled "acer."

I did not mean to make this quite so long but as the old song goes,

"Meadow and orchard and brooklet,
Schoolhouse that stands in the lane,
Come while sweet memory is roaming
Back to the old home again."

Dexter Brigham Is Paid $100 for Lb. of Onion Seed

East Lansing.—The Michigan Onion Growers Association voted last week to pay Dexter E. Brigham of Decatur, 72-year-old internationally known onion breeder and master muck farmer, an all-time record price of $100 for one pound of seed of his special Long-Keeping Yellow Globe onion variety.

The growers directed Brigham, famed the world over for onion varieties bearing his name, to deliver the precious seed to Dr. Paul M. Harmer, Michigan State College muck crops specialist for use in his research work at the Michigan Agricultural experiment station. Dr. Harmer was requested to preserve the purity of the seed and assist the breeder in further improving the variety.

Besides being a long-keeping variety, Brigham's special onion was reported to be exceptionally blight resistant.

Retain Two Directors

Owing to unfavorable weather developments during the past two weeks, the association requested the federal surplus marketing administration to extend its onion purchase program another two weeks and buy 200 cars additonal for welfare distribution.

With factional difference over compulsory state inspection unappeased following the farmers week meeting, the growers ousted the old guard in the election and named almost a complete set of new officers and directors.

To Revise Rules

Admitting that the anti-compulsory state inspection faction was in complete control, Nelson Velliquette of Plainwell, retiring president expressed the hope the organization would do nothing to permit the return of cull onions to trade channels. He explained the association was formed two years ago for the expressed purpose of outlawing culls.

Death of Sela N. Eckenberger

1871-1940

Sela Eckenberger is dead.

That seems very strange, almost unbelievable.

Four weeks ago Sunday we drove the pretty Chevy over to the shore of Lake Michigan, pointed it toward the place where the sky and water meet, and watched the storm.

The rain came down from the black clouds in torrents, the wind piled mighty waves upon the level of the water and crowned their peaks with white caps.

It was a glorious sight. We saw in it the vastness of the universe of the Almighty, and the measureless grandeur of His power. It seemed for the moment as though we were lifted out of our small environment into a world without end, without limitation and beyond the reach of human frailty.

Sela sat there in silence and his mind apparently was traveling over oceans and mountains and far away beyond the clouds to where the sun was shining, and sorrow and loneliness were alike unknown. We drove back in the rain, but there was no discomfort in the warm October air of the twilight.

That was to him one of the best Sunday drives we ever took together. Several times afterward he asked if I had not written of the trip for the Republican, but the spirit had not moved me, and it was plain that he was disappointed.

The Chevy was his most cherished plaything. He kept it spotless and shining as though it had just come out of the sales room, and his alert ears caught the slightest sound of imperfection in its running.

He knew automobiles well. In fact he knew many things well. He was a woodsman and the fall was his favorite season. The coloring of the leaves when they turned from green to the various shades of red, yellow, orange and brown, was to him nature's most beautiful picture. He once said that the colors of nature never clash. No matter what the combinations that are brought together in the forest they always harmonize. No human artist can accomplish such a result.

He was a hunter, a trapper and a photographer. Of late years he did not hunt to kill, but never lost interest in shooting striking scenes or old time friends, with his camera.

He was a carpenter, a painter, a cabinet maker, a farmer. In his earlier years he built several substantial houses in this village, and he raised muck land crops for the market.

He was a musician, having played for many years in Decatur bands and orchestras.

He clerked in Decatur stores,—furniture, hardware and drygoods stores for upwards of thirty years, and for a number of years was head of a department of the Clayton clothing store of Detroit.

Sela Nelson Eckenberger was descended from the earliest pioneer families of Cass and Van Buren counties.

Both Charleston and Nicholsville were named for his ancestors, and his father, John Eckenberger, Jr., was born on the Charles farm in Volinia, in 1832, in a log house which has long since disappeared.

Sela was born in this village August 6, 1871, the only son of John Jr. and Delphyne Copley Eckenberger. He was married July 31, 1895, to Ella M. Scudder of Galesburg, Illinois, a school teacher of strong character whose influence for good is still felt by many men and women of Decatur and elsewhere, who were once her pupils. She passed away September 16, 1936, in the same room in the Lincoln home in which our fellow townsman breathed his last on Friday, the first day of November, 1940, at three minutes past the hour of noon.

He is survived by a half sister, Mrs. Linnie Brell of Bridgeport, a half sister, Mrs. Nellie Ashley, of Ellister, Montana; a niece, Mrs. Myrtle Taylor, of Montana, and several cousins.

He had been a salesman in the Mosier drygoods store where he stayed till the business was sold out and the key turned in the door for the last time one Saturday night in June.

He thought then he would be forced to retire, but at least three lucrative jobs were offered him and he began work in the Gale hardware store the next Monday morning. He had the delightful two weeks trip to Vermont in July and then he returned to his job. After working the first week in October his health gave out and he was forced to retire and Saturday, October 26, he suffered the paralytic stroke which took him away.

He had lived in the easterly apartment of the Lincoln home six years and received there the best of care during his last sickness.

Funeral services were held at Newell and Son's chapel Sunday afternoon at 2:30. Rev. T. W. Chisholm officiated and burial was in Lakeside cemetery. The Odd Fellows lodge, of which he had been a member for many years, had charge of the service.

THE GOFORTH MISSIONARY SOCIETY

The Goforth Missionary Society of the Decatur Bible Church enjoyed an all day meeting at the home of Brother and Sister DeBruin in Kalamazoo Thursday, October 30th.

A co-operative dinner was served by the hostess at noon. Covers were laid for 22. A favor marked the place of each guest at the dinner table. The tables were centered with a colorful bouquet of flowers. Devotionals were in charge of Mrs. Dexter Brigham.

Following the business meeting, the meeting was turned over to the program chairman who in turn presented the guest speaker of the day, Miss Hattie Smith. She is a missionary from China on furlough in this country until such time as the government sees fit to let her return. She has spent several years working among the Chinese with the South China Boat Mission. Her work was among an outcast class of people who live on the rivers in boats and are called "egg people." She too lived on a gospel boat, whereby they might move up and down the rivers and proclaim the gospel to those heathen people despised by all. During the Japanese bombings her duties became multiplied and she being a nurse went ashore and worked with the Salvation army lassies in relieving suffering and bringing souls to Christ.

Isn't is grand to have men and women who are willing to go forth and proclaim the message of salvation to the heathen? And to tell them "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," Rom. 3:22, and that they cannot save themselves, as "Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me," John 14:6 and that salvation has already been provided for them. John 3:16, "That God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish but have everlasting life;" and that salvation is an individual experience, "Ye must be born again."

The meeting was brought to a close by group singing of choruses, followed by prayer. It indeed was a day of blessing to each person present as Miss Smith's talk again brought to our minds that God is able and does provide our every need through the riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

Sec'y Marguerite Dow.

Memorial Day

Written for the Republican by Fred W. Green.

DECATUR

Memorial day services were held at Lakeside cemetery, Friday, May 30. Weather was not all that one could wish, but the outpouring of visitors was not diminished on this account. This year the impressive services of the Legion were held at the Upfield grave. They were conducted by Commander H. H. Creagan assisted by Leo Helmer.

A firing squad gave the usual three salutes, after which taps were sounded at the grave, while off in the distance the echo was heard coming slowly, but so impressively, as it trickled through thick foliage of trees and shrubs, back to the Legion who were standing at attention until the last strains of the echo died away.

The visitors were invited to listen to an address by Rev. T. W. Chisholm who was standing on a platform, from where he gave an eloquent talk about Memorial Day Services. His address was full of meaning to fit the occasion. The salient point was a caution to those who at this time are careless about all that is going on around them. Carelessness is a sad mistake at any time he stated, but when there is so much at stake all should make every effort to learn everything, and form their own opinions. Some may not be right, and again some may be correct, but with giving attention to every day things and throwing off the carelessness now going on around us, a whole lot could be learned which would not have been dreamed of otherwise. Rev. Chisholm had in spite of threatening rain a very attentive audience. They came to listen to an eloquent address and were not disappointed.

The parade to the cemetery was led by the American Legion with flags and banners afloat. Then came our own high school band in full uniform. It was a proud day for parents who had some member of their family in the band, and for the members. Their fond hopes had been realized,—to march through the streets of their home town, a full uniformed band playing their marches like true veterans.

No band is complete without the Majorette and her escort of twirlers. Evelyn Dow was selected as the Majorette and Joan Hulton, Dorothy Eckard and Peggy Wiles were the twirlers. They performed their parts well. Evelyn led that band just as if she had been doing so for a long time, one must have a level head to guide a band so they do not get all twisted up, but she saw that that did not happen. Her eyes were both in front and behind and saw all that was going on every step.

Following the band came the color bearers carrying the band flag. The six were assigned to this duty,—Helen Kroeg, Marjory Blake, Adelle McAllister, Loris Jane Bennett, Barbara Huff and Jeanette Van Voorst. They all threw grace and ryhthm into this important assignment. It was not hard to see the import of the flag, especially at this time, when all is not as peaceful as the world would wish. Evelyn led the band through the walks of the cemetery, both before and after the exercises, and back to the high school.

HAMILTON

Hamilton Memorial Day services were held Sunday, June 1. Never was there so many who attended the services as this year. It was estimated at least 1500 persons were present during the exercises and many more from far off departed before the exercises commenced.

The day was perfect, enough seats to go around but none to spare and the program was entertaining and patriotic. Florence Watson, teacher of the Barber school, must have taken lots of pains to prepare the pupils for the parts, they so spendidly performed.

The drill by the scholars must not be overlooked, the marching, counter marching and forming twos and fours in such a small space was wonderfully done by those little tots, led of course by some of the older pupils to the music by pianist Frances Toof. Katherine Howland sang "America" and "God Bless America," which was joined in by the assembly also by Miss Howland, introducing her to Hamilton as a sweet singer and a born artist.

The American Legion, under Commander H. H. Creagan, went through their Memorial Day ritual, firing a salute over the graves of World War veterans, then taps were sounded, followed by the echo, while the members stood at attention.

It is doubtful if the High School band will ever again have the same setting they had Sunday, June 1, to show their skill both in playing and maneuvering. They paraded through the cemetery, finally coming to rest while the Legion read their ritual. Then they took up their part of the program on the lawn, which the town board had specially prepared for them. The grass had been cut, and the rain during the night had brightened it to the point where it showed up the bright new uniforms of the band, making a very pretty picture.

The band was led by Majorette Evelyn Dow and her three assistant twirlers,—Joan Hulton, Dorothy Eckard and Peggy Wiles. This activity brought smiles of satisfaction from the visitors, the twirlers and the bandsmen themselves. It was spectacular to see those young girls and boys go through their marches led by their Majorette. The day was just fit for such a demonstration and everyone was happy to see their band perform so well in so short a time.

The graceful manner in which the flag bearers carried their band flag was commented on by many, the flag caused considerable talk. Something out of the usual generally does, and it was through the manner these young girls followed the band that drew admiration from the spectators. They certainly are a real part of the band.

Following were the flag bearers,—Helen Kroes, Marilyn Blake, Adelle McAllister, Loris Jane Bennett, Barbara Hulf, Jeanette Van Voorst.

The speaker of the day was Leonard Ormerod, World War veteran. After being introduced by Guy Collins he traced the activities of the World War, the annoyances they encountered until President Wilson approved of the action taken by General Pershing, who insisted that the Americans act as a unit and not as a filler for European armies. There was a feeling the speaker stated that the American army were not fighters. They did not know us, so had no confidence in us as fighters. After General Pershing was upheld all went well and it was but a short time before the American army was thrown into the fray. Well, it is not necessary to go over that again as it happened long ago, but now the Europeans have a different feeling toward any troops the United States may if necessary throw into any war.

He made reference to the present controversy which brought from the assembly a vociferous round of applause. It was well brought out, warming up to the subject he stated that under our form of government the President was the Commander in Chief and the people should follow him. We may differ with him and it is the people's right to free press and free speech, to give utterances to our thoughts.

He referred to the Civil War when an attempt was made to split the country which brought about terrible loss of life, destruction of property, misery and want for many years, which he prayed would never happen again. Just at present the country is being aroused as never before since the Civil war. The country had not been made a military country, an army is under course of construction, while all this criticism is going on, men are being sent to camp, as a protection and a demonstration to the world that we, like other countries, are preparing to protect our country both on land and sea at any cost. If it is necessary to call on our armed forces now or at any other time it would be a calamity to make our men feel the country is divided on the issue. The assembly caught the implication and showed they felt the same way as the speaker.

The graves were all decorated, the committee saw to that. No one was forgotten, there were plenty of flowers to go around, and as usual a flag was left at each veteran's grave. Hamilton lived up to tradition to turn out at all times for any real occasion. Many reunions took place, neighbors from far and near greeted each other and enjoyed each other's company for a short time. So after all a cemetery is a common meeting place, where joy and sorrow often join hands.

Appreciation of Ira D. Sankey's Stories of The "Gospel Hymns"

By Bessie B. Fuhrman, 813 Washington Ave., Kalamazoo, Mich.

Perhaps it is trite to say that we too often take many of our greatest blessings for granted, but the other day, on discovering the little volume of stories of the gospel hymns by Ira D. Sankey, I realized how little I had appreciated the value of some of the world's greatest treasures in the way of song, and this in spite of the fact that I had enjoyed singing and playing hymns for many years. But after having read Ira D. Sankey's rich store of information concerning these hymns, I realized what I had lacked in my chance of appreciation of them. And as I thought the matter over, it occurred to me that many of those beautiful poems were like pictures without backgrounds. They had needed something to set them off and make their true worth more apparent. Besides, they had needed a proper introduction—and most of those with which I had been acquainted were just lovely poems set to music—no more, no less.

Then recalling my student teacher days when I was taking my training in teaching reading, I remembered how much more Lowell's 'Dandelions' meant when I was taught how to present the subject, for I was instructed to make special preparation by procuring materials such as pictures, facts, anecdotes, etc., and create an appreciation of the author whose work was to be studied; also something interesting and instructive concerning the writing as well as about the locality of the poem or story. Thus the pupil was to receive an "apperceiving basis" or a seed plot well prepared for the planting of the following lessons.

So, when I read Ira D. Sankey's stories of the gospel hymns and the brief but very interesting autobiography of Mr. Sankey, I felt that I had at last stumbled upon the right pedagogy of hymns. And as it was such a rich find it seemed that it would be a selfish disregard for others, not to pass on a glimpse into that splendid treasure store of stories about some of the world's greatest and best loved hymns. But not only a little insight into the stories of those songs is important, but a tiny peep into the life of the great but modest hymn writer and singer is almost as necessary.

Moody and Sankey.

The name of Ira D. Sankey was so closely associated with the great evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, that for many years the two were spoken of together almost as if they were twins, Moody and Sankey. And such a gospel team as those two men made—the one a singer of the gospel and the other a preacher of the gospel. But before they met, both men were achievers in their chosen lines. Sankey, only 27 years old had raised over $40,000 on the sale of Gospel Hymns, and his singing and had with that money paid for a new Y. M. C. A. building for the city of Newcastle, Penn. He had also purchased a lot for a church building and assisted in raising funds so that when the edifice was dedicated there was no debt.

Thus, as a very young man Ira D. Sankey showed a talent for business. He was no poor fisherman. He had a government position when Moody called him to come with him, but like the poor fishermen of old, when the call came to "follow me," he answered the call, and today the world has still a good many people who have directly or indirectly been benefitted by that man's rallying to the call for gospel singing, for he sacrificed his position, to go as a singing evangelist with Moody.

The Great Chicago Fire

This, in itself should set him apart as honored as an apostle of old, but when we behold his singing career against the background of the tragedy of the Great Chicago Fire, we have something as moving as a mighty drama in its fire and force of spiritual victories over evil forces in the lives of people that the team of Sankey and Moody faced.

The beginning of the great Chicago fire as described by Ira D. Sankey: "Sunday evening, Oct. 8, 1871, we were holding a meeting in Farwell Hall, which was crowded to the doors. At the close of the address Mr. Moody asked me to sing a solo, and standing by the great organ at the rear of the platform I began the old familiar hymn, "Today the Savior Calls." By the time I had reached the third verse,

"Today the Savior calls:
For refuge fly;
The storm of justice falls,
And death is nigh."

my voice was drowned by the loud noise of the fire engines rushing past the hall and the tolling of bells, among which we could hear, ever and anon, the deep, sullen tones of the great city bell, in the steeple of the old court house close at hand, ringing out a general alarm."

"On reaching the scene of the fire I found a whole block of small frame buildings burning fiercely, and with others I assisted in tearing down some board fences, to try to keep the fire from spreading to the adjoining territory. While thus engaged the wind from the southwest had risen almost to a hurricane, and the flying embers from the falling buildings were quickly caught up and carried high upon the roofs of the houses adjoining, which were soon in flames. Thus the fire spread from building to building and from block to block, until it was evident that the city was doomed."

"By this time the people were fully awake, rushing about the street or anxiously looking out of their windows and from the tops of their houses in the direction of the fire. I could not help thinking of the Bible story of the destruction of the cities of the Plain in the long ago, as many still made light of those who said the city would be destroyed. The air was filled with flying sparks of fire, resembling a spring snowstorm, when the sky is filled with huge, falling flakes."

"After seeing something of the fearful destruction wrought by the conflagration, I made my way through the heated streets to the railway, and took an outgoing train to my home in Pennsylvania. As we left the city it seemed as though the whole country was on fire; in all directions we could see huge banks of flame sweeping across the prairies, and the air was filled to suffocation with smoke."

Thus, as Shakespeare opens his great play, "The Tempest," with a scene of a tempest and shipwreck, the career of Sankey and Moody as gospel messengers opened with an even mightier and more terrible scene, the burning of a city.

Sang for Spurgeon

One part of this notable teamwork of Moody and Sankey was carried on for two years in the largest cities of Great Britain, Scotland and Ireland and later in Switzerland. One time when Sankey was stopping in London for a rest, he attended the morning service at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, a great building with balconies like a theatre, where the great Spurgeon gave an address and at its conclusion, one of the deacons in charge was sent to Mr. Sankey by Mr. Spurgeon.

On Mr. Sankey's response to the call to come to Mr. Spurgeon, the latter explained that he was to preach a sermon on a bill in Parliament and that he was going to deliver his address that night and then he asked Mr. Sankey to sing "Hold the Fort."

Mr. Sankey complied with the great man's request, but knowing Spurgeon did not approve of an organ at public worship, he wondered what he would do without it. But when the time came for the song, the organ was provided, and "that evening," said Mr. Sankey, "he announced that I was present and would sing 'Hold the Fort', and he asked them to join heartily in the chorus. When the chorus was sung it was heard two blocks away. At the conclusion of the service, Mr. Spurgeon exclaimed: "There now, I think our roof will stay on after that."

Historic Incident Upon Which "Hold The Fort" Was Based.

One of the stories in Mr. Sankey's book "Stories of the Gospel Hymns" is a description of how a fort was held during the Civil War. It was just before Sherman's famous march to the sea in 1864. A million and a half rations were stored at a certain fort on a hill and General Corse was stationed there with 1500 men. Hood sent Gen. French with 600 men to take the place, and they had already surrounded Gen. Corse and his men and had summoned the latter to surrender. All seemed lost, when an officer caught sight of a white flag far across the valley twenty miles distant, on the top of Kennesaw Mountain. The signal was answered and soon the message was waved across from mountain to mountain: "Hold the fort; I am coming; W. T. Sherman."

More than half the 1500 men were killed or wounded as they fought for three hours but they held the fort, and Gen. French surrendered instead with his 6000 men, or all he had left of them.

Major Whittle told this war story at a Sunday school gathering where P. P. Bliss was present. The next day Whittle and Bliss held a meeting at the Y. M. C. A. in Chicago. Bliss went on the platform and wrote the chorus of the hymn on the blackboard. Then he sang the verses and the audience joined in the chorus. That was the first public singing of "Hold the Fort," and now on the Bliss monument there are these words: "P. P. Bliss, Author of 'Hold the Fort'." Thus "Hold the Fort", of all P. P. Bliss's many songs is the one on which his fame depends.

But perhaps Ira D. Sankey's great singing of that hymn has something to do with the emphasis which that song received, for Mr. Sankey says: "'Hold the Fort' was used frequently in our meetings in Great Britain during 1873-74. Lord Shaftesbury said at our farewell meeting in London: 'If Mr. Sankey has done no more than teach the people to sing 'Hold the Fort', he has conferred an inestimable blessing on the British Empire'."

And now I may say, if you liked this story, you should read the whole book.

Postmasters of Decatur Since the Inauguration of Postal Service in 1848

The Republican is indebted to Postmaster Creagan for some accurate and interesting history of the village of Decatur. The authentic history of this village has never been written, unless it may in time appear that Henry Houseman has written it in qualifying for his Master's or Doctor's degree.

It is quite evident that the authors of the Van Buren county Gazetteer made a mistake in stating that it "sprang into existence in response to the first scream of the locomotive in 1849." The first scream of the locomotive in Decatur was in the fall of 1848, ninety two years ago, and the proof of this statement is in the record that follows.

At the request of the Republican Mr. Creagan wrote to the First Assistant Postmaster General for a list of the postmasters of Decatur and received this reply:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT
Washington
October 23, 1940.

Mr. H. H. Creagan, Postmaster,
Decatur, Michigan.

My dear Mr. Creagan:

In accordance with your request of October 12, 1940, there is enclosed herewith a list containing the date of establishment of the post office of Decatur, Van Buren County, Michigan, together with the names and terms of service of the postmasters appointed to serve at that office.

The Decatur post office was advanced to the third class on July 1, 1868, and to the second class on July 1, 1923. On July 1, 1933, the office was relegated to the third class, and it was advanced again to the second class on July 1, 1936.

Sincerely yours,
Ambrose O'Connell,
First Assistant.

rate in its record. It says, "The site of the village of Decatur was originally obtained of the U. S. government by Messrs Beers and Sherwood of New York City, in a grant to them of 5,000 acres. These gentlemen, though never residents of the place, seemed to have left their impress upon it and to have, to some extent, given character to its institutions."

When reading what follows we wonder what sort of a character Decatur started out with. The Gazetteer continues, "In 1850 they built a steam saw mill in the southwestern part of the village. This saw mill was afterwards converted into a distillery, which in its turn, has happily disappeared, leaving only rank grass to mark the spot it once defiled."

The Washington record shows that George Sherwood was the first postmaster, holding the office about two years. It might have been possible then for the postmaster of Decatur to have lived in New York City. They had the New York and Michigan Central railroads to travel over, although it is doubtful if in 1848 the round trip could have been made in a week.

William Beers and George Sherwood stamped their marks indelibly on Decatur when they named four streets after themselves. They evidently expected the village to develop on the south side of the track, for the street paralleling the south line of the land grant to the railroad company was named after the surname of the senior member of the firm of Beers and Sherwood, and the street paralleling the north line of the grant was named for the surname of the junior member.

The north and south street a block west of Main street was named Williams for Beers, and the north and south street a block east of Main street was named George for Sherwood.

Evidently the post office remained in the depot for a year, and then according to our best information it was moved into a small building on Sherwood street just west of the Charles Brigham building. Sometime during the seventies it was moved into the old town hall. It was moved into the building now occupied by Dine's while Theo. Trowbridge was postmaster and into its present location during the term of W. H. White. Postmaster Creagan says the next move will be into a building of its own to be built by the federal government. However there are no plans yet for such a building.

Early Postmasters

Theodore Phelps was the second postmaster. Main street was named for him. He was twice appointed. If we remember local history correctly he died in office and his widow was appointed to fill out the unexpired term. Their son Charles Phelps, later lived in Colorado, and some forty years ago spent a summer in this community. His special friends here were the Charles Rosevelt family of Keeler.

The third postmaster of Decatur was Wiliam N. Pardee, one of the prominent founders of the village, and we regret that his name has not been perpetuated in a way that it would be familiar to the present generation. Some village street should have been named for him. Mr. Pardee has no namesake here of the present generation, but Mrs. Frank Curtis of Volinia was his grand daughter, and Homer Curtis, his great grandson, was a graduate of the Decatur high school, class of 1930.

William N. Pardee lived in this county twelve years. He was a Decatur attorney and served as land agent, surveyor, postmaster, merchant, justice of the peace, and overseer of the poor. He was appointed prosecuting attorney of the county in 1857.

Charles N. Poor likewise has left no namesake in the village but Melvin Poor of Hamilton township was his great nephew. The three story buildings known as the Poor block were built by him as was also the William Wilcox residence, for many years known as the Potts house.

Hard Fought Contests

There is an old story, now almost old enough to be called a tradition, that Eri Beebe had a hard fight to win the postmastership and in his efforts to clinch the appointment he got a couple of his backers to accompany him and they went direct to headquarters at Washington, D. C.

They took the night train which stopped at the Decatur station at 1:30 and met a little early for sociability at the saloon on the corner of Phelps and Sherwood streets.

It was the night of the desperate fighting there in which Joe Pierson was shot and killed by Officer Aaron Sweet. As the report of the revolver that sent the bullet into Pierson's drink crazed brain rang out on the night air they rushed for the train and were soon far away from the scene of one of the worst tragedies in the history of Decatur.

This was on the night of February 25, 1869. The next terrible Decatur tragedy was the Morris murder which occurred ten years later.

Lyman A. Roberts, better known at the time as Alanson Roberts, died in office and was succeeded by May Nicholson, Decatur's second woman postmaster.

The contest between Mr. Roberts and Dr. Henry M. Brodrick was also desperately fought. It probably has not an equal in the history of the Decatur post office.

Roberts was backed by the Civil War veterans, the G. A. R.'s, who were then at the height of their power as an organization. Brodrick was backed by socially prominent people of the village who generally expected to get what they went after.

Julius Caesar Burrows was our congressman and it was his duty to name the postmaster. He was clearly between two fires. As a captain in the Civil War and a fellow member of the Grand Army of the Republic he felt in duty bound to name Roberts; as a social friend of the backers of Brodrick he was naturally inclined to name their candidate.

The campaign became so intense that the Congressman was in most uncomfortably hot water until he hit upon a plan that seemed to find favor with both candidates. He proposed that the patrons of the office hold an election and he would recommend for the appointment the candidate receiving the larger number of votes.

A day was set and the election was held in the old town hall. Roberts had from the start the solid veterans' vote of about one hundred, but Brodrick was strong in the country and with the younger village set, and was confident he could overcome it. So likewise were his backers, and bets at even money were freely offered and taken.

No election ever held in Decatur beat this one for excitement. You who remember Fundy Shoudy know that he was less than five feet tall. You who remember village officer and Veteran Henry H. Van Camp know that he was over six feet tall.

Mr. Shoudy became so incensed at Officer Van Camp, who was keeping the peace at the polls, that he shook his finger up as near as he could reach into the officer's face and in language heard above the din of the crowd challenged him to a fistic encounter in the rear of the township building, but nothing came of it.

As the record shows, Mr. Roberts won the election and the appointment. He was the father of our townsman, George Roberts.

Four Classes of Offices

The position of postmaster has always been a political appointment. Since the first Word War the candidates have been required to take an examination, and this year it has been made a civil service position.

Postmaster Creagan passed the civil service examination last spring and was given a life appointment dated June 18, 1940.

Postoffices are divided into four classes as follows:

1st. class. Gross postal receipts amount to not less than $40,000 per year. The salary of a first class postmaster is regulated according to receipts and ranges from $3,200 to $12,000.

2nd. class. Gross receipts from $8,000 to $40,000, with salary of postmaster ranging from $2,400 to $3,000.

3rd. class. Gross receipts $1,500 to $8,000, with salary of postmaster ranging from $1,000 to $2,300.

4th. class. When the gross postal receipts of a post office of the third class for each of two consecutive calendar years are less than $1,500, or when in any calendar year the gross postal receipts are less than $1,400, it shall be relegated to the fourth class.

History of Decatur Public Library

Decatur had been without a library for a number of years. Owing to the fact that books of the Ladies Library were housed in the old fire hall which was consumed by flames in March, 1934, only about 100 books which were in circulation at the time were saved. Mrs. Alma Greenman, Mrs. Myrtle Van Antwerp and Mrs. Lena Stapleton comprised the board for this library.

With these 100 books as a nucleus, Mrs. Zella Benton, county librarian, secured assistance from the state and a library was opened in the Kaplan department store, with Mrs. Marie Knoll as librarian. At one time the books were moved to the township hall, and then housed in a down town store for a short time. When the new village hall was built a fine room to house the village library was provided in the front of the building. Mrs. Bessie Lawrence was appointed librarian and has continued to serve in that position since then.

Mr. Arba Moulton is the president of the Library Board and Mrs. R. J. Huyck is secretary and treasurer; the other two members are Mrs. W. P. Bope and Superintendent of Schools Frank Dodge. These members have served since the library was organized in 1936.

Books were given the library by individuals of the community and also by former Decatur residents. Other gifts came from the churches, clubs and lodges. Two Book Clubs were organized and as a result 120 new books were purchased. When read by the clubs, they were given to the library for circulation. $184.38 remaining from a public benefit fund of world war days was given to the library.

The W. P. A. helped to organize the library and paid the librarian for a period of four years, also the N. Y. A. assistants. Now the librarian is paid by the township. The village furnishes the room, light, heat and shelving. Baked goods sales have been an annual event at the Celery Festivals for the past five years. The money obtained is used for books, files and other necessary expenses.

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has donated 100 books, 33 of which have been received.

The village council gave the library $200.00 for the purchase of a set of Americana and a set of Compton Encyclopedias, also an International Webster's Dictionary.

The Kellogg Foundation has given the library 577 new books. This was our quota after discarding some of our old books which were of no value. The Foundation has also loaned us 409 juvenile and adult books, and has given the Van Buren County Library many new books, which will be loaned to this library for circulation. These books will be brought to us in the new Bookmobile and exchanged for new ones as needed.

Recently $500.00 was given to the library through the sale of tickets for the Edgar Bergen entertainment this summer.

The Study Club which was organized two years ago is an outgrowth of adult education work of the library.

Our average circulation per month for adults is 1,158 and 379 juveniles, total 1,537. The accumulated circulation since 1938 is 43,465. Total number of registered patrons is 1,824. The population of the village is 1,599 and the township is 2,618. Number of permanent volumes to date is 3,003.

The library is open from 1:00 p. m. to 9:00 p. m. except Sundays and holidays which totals 48 hours each week.

Many activities have been sponsored by the library to further the use of books. For the observance of "Book Week" the village and rural schools co-operated, as a result 95 posters, each representing a book which the children had read, were made, These posters were judged and books for prizes were given.

As a stimulus for summer reading a Reading Club was organized with a membership of 80 school children.

The Book Exhibit of the new books given by the Kellogg Foundation was recently held in the library room. Short book reviews were given by local teachers, ministers, business men, and members of various clubs. Community singing and music by the High school girls' sextette constituted the program. The Garden Club co-operated with beautiful flower arrangements. Mrs. Zoe Wright, Kellogg Foundation Librarian from Battle Creek attended.

First State Bank of Decatur Observes 70th Anniversary

Friday, September 20, is the seventieth anniversary of the organization of the First National Bank of Decatur, which for the past fifty years has been the First State Bank of Decatur.

The bank has an outstanding record, it has always been known as a conservative, sound institution and on its completion of seventy years in the service of the people of this community it is known as one of the best banks in southwestern Michigan.

The First National Bank was organized September 20, 1870, with a capital of $75,000. The stockholders as shown by the original subscription list, were E. P. Hill, O. S. Abbott, A. S. Hathaway, A. B. Copley, R. J. Huyck, Samuel Morris, J. H. Wallace, H. A. Northrup, Chas. Duncombe, Tobias Byers, Elias Morris, L. B. Lawrence, Don S. Rogers, E. J. Sherman, J. S. Dowd, O. W. Fisk, William Anderson, T. Brownbridge, Henry Brown, Amos Morris, Jesse B. Ames, Thomas Browning and M. DeHart Matteson.

A. B. Copley was president, E. P. Hill, cashier and other directors elected were C. W. Fisk, Charles Duncombe, L. B. Lawrence, O. S. Abbott and A. S. Hathaway.

September 20, 1890, the First National bank charter expired. The bank then took out a charter from the State of Michigan and the capital of the bank was reduced to $30,000. At this time A. B. Copley was again the president and A. H. Huyck was cashier. The stockholders were A. B. Copley, Tobias Byers, E. B. Copley, A. H. Huyck and Thomas Browning.

In the published statement of December 19, 1890, deposits were $68,000.

In the early morning of March 23, 1895, the bank building burned, along with the Duncombe Hotel and other buildings. A notation on the minutes of the directors' meeting of that day says that "banking operations were resumed at 2 p. m. in the Browning Drug store."

In 1897 the bank limited the payment of interest on accounts of up to $200 to any one person or family, and only took such accounts upon personal application.

A. B. Copley, the president, died in 1899 and was succeeded by Edwin B. Copley, and after the death of the cashier, A. H. Huyck in 1900, L. D. Hill was made cashier. He continued as cashier until 1913 when he was succeeded by L. E. VanAntwerp. Edwin B. Copley died in 1916. Earl E. Copley was elected president the same year and has continued from that time. L. E. VanAntwerp resigned from the bank in February, 1939, after a service of thirty-three years.

The present officers are Earl Copley, president and cashier, Belle A. Baker, vice-president, J. K. Shanahan and H. L. Hutchins, assistant cashiers. The directors are E. E. Copley, Margaret Copley, Belle A. Baker, D. J. Fox and Robert Rudzinski.

Humble Tribute to the Late Harry D. Lee

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF ONE OF MICHIGAN'S BEST CITIZENS

Harry D. Lee was born in Hamilton township July 15, 1878. He graduated from the Decatur high school in 1897, and obtained a life certificate to teach from the State Normal College at Ypsilanti.

He was principal of the high schools at Frankfort, Shelby, Holland and St. Joseph in the lower peninsula. From St. Joseph he went to Lake Linden in the northern part of the northern peninsula as superintendent, from there he went to Hancock and in 1917 was elected superintendent of schools at Waterloo, Iowa. He remained there until taking the position of superintendent of training in the Northern Michigan State Teachers College, which position he held 18 years until the time of his death December 17, 1940.

He had received degrees from the University of Michigan, Northwestern, The University of Chicago and from Columbia University, New York.

Harry Lee was a classmate of Harry Lurkins in the Decatur high school and they have since been close friends, although as the latter writes, their paths had not crossed for some years.

In response to our invitation Mr. Lurkins wrote the following letter:

St. Joseph, Michigan
December 23, 1940.

Mr. Arba N. Moulton,
Decatur, Michigan.

Dear Arba: Received your card this morning. I do not know as I can give you any information about Harry Lee that you do not already know.

It is too bad that we on the average cannot say some of these things that we should say about people before they pass on. I think it is due to my notion of these things that I'm likely to tell people how I like them, if I do, and I do. I'm not like Bill Rogers, he said he loved everybody. I can not say that and tell the truth, but I do like people, old or young, rich or poor, white or any other color, and there isn't any one on earth that I hate.

Well, Harry Lee will always be alive to me. I know nothing of his last journey except what I may read or what I may hear someone say.

I'll always have a clear mental concept of him from school days, as we all knew him and from the last time I saw him about 15 years ago.

Harry Lee was a fellow anyone could depend upon, because he always did as he promised to do. He was an honest, industrious lad and grew to be that kind of man.

He was a man of good habits and high ideals. He set a good example for all youth, boys and girls alike. And he not only asked youth to be good, but urged them to be good for something. He never asked anyone to be or do something he would not be or do himself. I know we shall all miss him and those who were the nearest to him will miss him the most. It seems to be the way of life. I'm sure that all of us are better that we have known him. No doubt he has done more good in his short life than some of us can do even though we may live many more years.

Personally I regret that Harry had to pass on so soon, but it seems to be the will of the Divine Creator, so we must accept it. I'm glad I have pleasant memories that I can retain as long as I live. To me it is good night Harry.

H. J. Lurkins.

THE STUDENTS LOVED HIM

(By Manthei Howe)

The Daily Mining Journal, Marquette, Michigan.—December 19, 1940.

Northern State Teachers college faculty and students have been shocked and grieved by the death of Harry D. Lee, who, for the past 18 years, has been director of training at the college.

The students feel especially bereft for Mr. Lee, better than any one else at Northern, was, because of his work and his interest in his prospective teachers, more than ordinarily in touch with the students.

He knew their problems, and on his shoulders devolved the task of placing the students in teaching positions.

Is Personal Loss

As one youngster remarked forlornly: "I've lost my best friend on the faculty at Northern."

Another commented: "What will we do without him?" for the young men and women at Northern, when death took Mr. Lee, became fully aware of the part he has played in the life of the institution. The more than 1,500 students whose training he has watched and who have been placed by him in various schools, will feel that they have lost a real friend.

One can well believe that his death was in no small degree due to the worry he carried about his boys and girls. For the mere fact that he had placed a student in a position did not end his interest.

He wanted to know how they were progressing. Though he aimed to give the superintendents the best possible teaching material, he also wanted to be sure that his teachers were getting a square deal. He made it his business to find out whether they were.

Took Pride in Them.

When June arrived he was always concerned to the exclusion of every other interest, in placing his graduates. Every time a young man or woman was engaged for a teaching position and did fine work Mr. Lee was as jubilant as though he had received a valuable personal gift; was inordinately proud of the teacher's record.

Though he had definite convictions, often tending to be conservative in his judgment, he was, too, tolerant and understanding, and quick to resent any injustice done a student or teacher.

Often members of the college faculty have little social intercourse with the townsfolk, but that was not true of Mr. Lee. He was a resident of Marquette, keenly interested in what went on in the community and in the peninsula. He gave of his time, generously, to respond to requests to speak to young people's groups, and to help in community activities.

Liked People.

For some years he has been keenly interested in the work of the Marquette Family Welfare society and it was as the result of his efforts that last year the organization put out a booklet explaining the objectives and operation of the society, which received commendation from the national organization. This interest was entirely unconnected with the college or its work, and is cited as indicative of his community spirit and participation; and his interest in and liking for people.

As far as townsfolk and residents of the peninsula are concerned, Mr. Lee was probably one of the best known of the college faculty group.

He had an active sense of humor, and only last week he telephoned to tell me a good joke on one of the folk at Northern, a joke so good he thought it should make Chitter-chatter. His delight in a joke was never evidenced with a quiet grin, but with a good robust laugh, the sound of which most students and faculty recognized even if they did not happen to see him.

Had Sense of Humor

He adored teasing and did that teasing with a perfectly straight face, but an eloquent glint in the eye.

Mr. Lee was in no doubt about the possibility of a sudden death. He knew that he was not a good risk and said frankly that he might have only a few months or two or three years, but his attitude toward the students was little changed. He still twitted them about their oddities, and listened with closest attention to their problems.

When a few weeks ago a friend died from a heart attack, Mr. Lee, in commenting on it in critic meeting, said to his students: "Well, it's a fine way to go." Some of those students, taking practice teaching, recalled the comment when news of his death reached them Tuesday afternoon. They remembered too that he had seemed tired at critic meeting Monday afternoon, but had not complained or made mention of his weariness.

Didn't Count Cost

Those who knew him best were well aware that, for some weeks, he had been working harder than was good for him, since he had been warned about the necessity of caring for his health, but work was Mr. Lee's middle name, and he was so desirous of Northern State Teachers college always giving a good account of itself; of its students making a creditable appearance in public; of their conducting themselves to reflect with honor upon themselves and the college, that he gave little thought to the toll his work was taking of him.

And yet, he went as he would have chosen to go, at his office in the interim between the work of the morning and the afternoon.

In Mr. Lee's death, Northern State Teachers college has lost a loyal and conscientious worker, and the city has lost a splendid citizen. His place will not be easily filled, neither in his professional capacity, nor in the affections of Northern's alumni.

HONOR MEMORY OF W. H. PEARCE AND HARRY D. LEE

This evening at 8 you will hear the chimes of the First Methodist church played in memory of the late Webster H. Pearce, former president of Northern State Teachers college, who died a few weeks ago, and of Harry D. Lee, director of training at Northern, whose funeral will be held this afternoon.

The college is an institution of such import not only in Marquette, but in the whole peninsula, that the loss of two of the faculty in such a short space of time affects the community profoundly.

It is fitting that the chimes this evening should be played in memory of those two men who held the interest of the young folk and of the peninsula so close to their hearts and tried so hard to serve to the best of their ability and to the limit of their strength.

The chimes will be played from 8 to 8:30. That will be followed by five minutes of silence, after which the usual Christmas carols will be played.

Benjamin Hathaway Farm In Volinia Township Sold

THE BEAUTIFUL COUNTRY HOME WHICH HAS BEEN IN THE FAMILY MORE THAN ONE HUNDRED YEARS BECOMES THE PROPERTY OF S. G. WRIGHT, DETROIT.

It Once Took a Prize from the State Board of Agriculture as the Handsomest Small Farm in Michigan.

The report has come to us direct from the daughter, Miss Helen Hathaway, the recent owner, that the Benjamin Hathaway farm in Volinia township, Cass County, has been sold to Mr. and Mrs. Stanley G. Wright, of Detroit. Mrs. Wright is a sister of Mr. Freeman Cross, who, not long ago, acquired the William Morlan farm that lies just west of the Elmer Morris farm, which adjoins the Hathaway farm on the west.

This is the farm that was in its prime from about 1850 or 1860 to 1890, under the able management of Benjamin Hathaway himself, aided by his younger brother, to whose untiring efforts the executive ability of their mother, Mrs. Naomi Hathaway contributed largely. Their family of eight children was one of the pioneer families which removed from Cayuga county, New York, to Michigan in 1836, coming part of the way in covered wagons, and part of the way by Erie Canal, settling in Little Prairie Ronde, Cass county, Michigan, on the farm which has from then until now continued in the family name.

A Poet Farmer

Benjamin Hathaway was widely known as the "Poet Farmer of Michigan," whose three published volumes were, "Art Life," "The League of the Iroquois," and "The Finished Creation."

It was while Mr. Hathaway was spending some time at the library of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, Michigan, in preparation for the writing of his Indian Epic, "The League of the Iriquois" in about 1872, that he met the talented Amalia John, who later became his wife. She shared with him the labors and the joys of the rural life on the farm, while she also prepared the lectures in speculative philosophy, which she delivered before the Philosophical Society of Chicago. Mrs. Amalia John Hathaway passed on in December, 1881, shortly after the birth of her daughter, Helen.

The unique manner in which the "poet farmer" worked out the ideas which were embodied in his poems, has been described by the late Frank Kern in one of his articles in the Republican covering "Prominent Prairie Pioneers," as follows: * * * "Hoeing at his side, I have seen Mr. Hathaway pause and jot down some notes on a scrap of paper or a shingle to be worked out at night into beautiful figures of imagery and lofty aspirations."

Nor was writing of poetry Mr. Hathaway's sole contribution to the literature of his day. Some considered his prose equal to, or better than, his poetry, as evidenced by his articles in the Michigan Farmer and the Country Gentleman, regarding tree planting, crop growing, and fruit culture.

A Pioneer Forester

A pioneer in forestry, a horticulturist and landscape gardener, Mr. Hathaway built for the future as few men of his day were able to do.

I quote Frank Kern once more: "Mr. Hathaway transformed his farm into a veritable Villa Rustica, the beauty spot of Cass county with its once rare foliage, evergreens and flowers in every nook, and in 1865 it won a cash premium from the State Board of Agriculture as the handsomest small farm in Michigan."

The following quotation from an article by Miss Jennie Buell, which appeared in "Farm and Fireside" in September, 1908, gives us an idea of the magnitude of his work along the line of Forestry:

"Your committee would direct attention to the planting of trees found upon Mr. Hathaway's farm. On portions of his woodlands which had been cut off he had set out in rows, like the trees in an orchard, eight hundred and ten hard maples, two hundred and fifty white and blue ash trees, two hundred and fifty black walnut, one hundred and fifty butternut, 180 soft maples, one hundred and eighty white pines, thirty Austrian pines and ninety Norway spruces, which, added to the one hundred and seventy hard maples and eighty white pines planted by the roadsides, make a total of 2,190 trees, a portion of which show a vigorous growth and form an experience in tree planting the equal of which we do not have in the state."

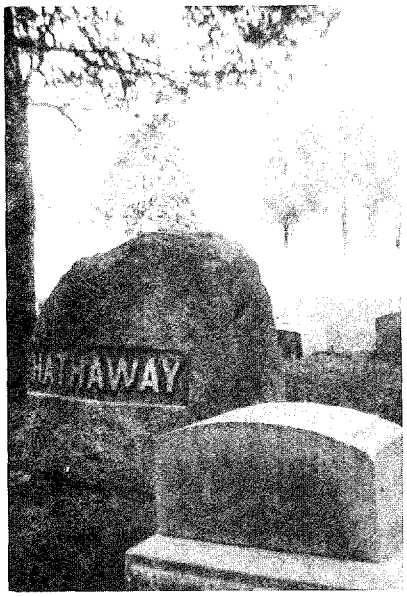
Another paragraph furnishes equally interesting reading:

A Second Burbank

"While this ardent lover and student of Nature found personal reward in the perfecting of fruits, commercialism was not neglected. At first his thriving cooper shop supplied fruit packages mostly out of timber from the place; later, for a number of years, an evaporator preserved his own and the surplus fruit of the neighborhood; his splendid chestnut orchard sent shipments of barreled nuts to the cities; the maples of his own setting furnished an active sugar bush each spring, and the sale of nursery and garden stock of all kinds added not a little to the resources common to all farms."

One of Mr. Hathaway's outstanding accomplishments in his experimental work was the propagation of the "Hathaway Yellow Dent" corn, which was for quite a period of years the standard variety of seed corn grown in Michigan, and it is reported to have been a favorite in a number of other states. His "Hathaway No. 5 Strawberry" was well known for its unusually sweet flavor. He also originated a grape, which he named for his mother, "Naomi," and the Naomi grape vine furnished the luxuriant growth that adorned the trellis over the front porch of the old colonial home that was burned in May, 1921.

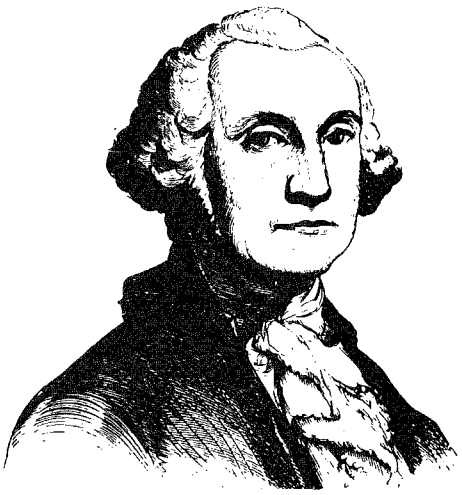
The original farm, which was rather large, was divided between the brothers, Benjamin and Judson, Judson taking the north half and a portion off the south half, while the homestead with the smaller acreage (110 acres) went to Benjamin. The Judson Hathaway farm is the one on which Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Hathaway (Judson's son) resided for many years, and on which Roy Hathaway (Ernest's son) and family now reside.



Mrs. Hathaway Carries On

Not only under the hand of Mr. Hathaway himself, did the farm teem with prosperity and beauty, but it continued to flourish under the capable direction of the late widow, the well known contributor to the Republican, Mrs. Catherine L. Hathaway, who passed on in May, 1939. Too much cannot be said of her devotion to the farm, her sorrow over the loss of the old home, and her tireless efforts to keep up, against all odds, not only the fertility of the soil, but the beauty of the home. Her fine Jersey-Guernsey herd of cattle was well known, as were her many varieties of lovely flowers, and the trees and hedges were maintained with care while she remained at the farm even for a portion of the year.

It has been the dream of the daughter, Helen, to sell the farm to some one who would make more of it than the average tenant farmer would do; and as the old farm, with its remarkable background, goes into the hands of Mr. and Mrs. Wright, she feels that this dream is in a fair way to be fulfilled.



THIS WEEK

The late Albert M. Todd of Kalamazoo had a hobby. He was a collector of valuable paintings and books. He once went to the Art Institute in Chicago, picked out three small paintings in an exhibit and wrote a check for $30,000 for them.

His collection of books was sold at auction in New York last week and it brought a total of $36,875. A set of five volumes of Gould's "Humming Birds", published in 1861 was sold to a private collector for $1,775.

It reminds us of the time we were looking over a fine collection of books in a second hand store in Chicago. A man of prominence had died and it was his library. None of his family was enough interested in the library to preserve it, and there it was, sold in one lot to the second hand man. We remarked to another book lover standing by,—what a pity for a man to spend a life time collecting such a wonderful library of books, only to have them sold and scattered at his death. We were so impressed with his reply that we never forgot it,—"Yes, but what a wonderful time he had collecting them."

Forty to fifty years ago Albert M. Todd was a familiar figure in Decatur. He did not live here, his home was in Kalamazoo where members of his family now reside, but he owned land here, 160 acres within a couple of miles of the village. It was one of his early muck land experiments and he watched development of the peppermint industry closely here.

Mr. Todd worked and advised with our local muck land men and perhaps his closest associates were M. S. Carney and D. W. Brodhead.

It was thought at one time that Mr. Todd would concentrate his efforts on building up the muck land industry in this community. He had it in mind and had it worked out that way he would have done in the growing and distilling of peppermint what Becker and Company are now doing in the raising of celery and onions and other muck land crops.

Decatur muck land was then in its first stage of development. It had not reached the top and gone back in value. Decatur people in all walks of life were putting their savings into small acreages of muck and they had visions of its rising in value to as high as a thousand dollars an acre.

Mr. Todd saw that he could not accumulate a tract of desirable land here of sufficient size to carry out his plans and so he bought an undeveloped tract of about 2,000 acres in Allegan county, and a few years later he bought the Mentha farm nearly as large in the north part of this county.

Two other splendid Kalamazoo citizens became interested in Decatur muck land in the early days and their visits here in the growing and harvesting times were so frequent that they became as well known on the street as our own citizens. They were J. C. Parsons and J. N. McCall. They were true pioneers in the development of the Decatur muck land area and should be remembered when its history is written.

The question has been asked, how many acres are there in the Decatur muck land area, and the answer is 10,000.

The awful scourge of war comes home to our townspeople with the boys who have given their lives for their country. The last one to be brought back and buried in Lakeside cemetery was Wubbo Klaassens, last Thursday. Others before him have received the last earthly service and still others will follow. In all twenty-one from this community were sacrificed but some cannot be brought home.

This tribute to our American dead has been given wide circulation and it seems appropriate to publish it here:

America's Honored War Dead—
Among the First to Leave, and Among the Last to Return.

Rest in your "Family-Plot," ye brave!
May thankful hearts e'er visit your grave!
Your dirge be the moaning wave
'Neath which countless "Freemen" sleep in peace!

O, there was mourning, when ye fell!
'Mongst "Comrades" and "Loved Ones" a solemn knell!
An agony, a sad, tearful farewell,
Which, true to your memory, will never cease!

Rest with your silent solemn fame!
"America" keeps record of your name.
And never can a touch of shame
Darken your buried brow!

Life's parting beams were in your eye!
Life's closing accents on your tongue!
When 'round you, pealing to the sky,
The shout of "Victory" rung!

Then, 'ere your gallant spirit fled
A smile so bright illumined your face
O, never of the light it shed,
Shall memory lose a trace!

Your's was a death, whose rapture high,
Transcended all that life could yield!
Your warmest prayer was so to die!
So, "Old Glory" gallantly to shield!

And they may feel, who loved you most,
Just pride, holy and most pure!
Death Has No Power O'er Those Who Boast
Their Treasure With God Secure!

Being an Account of the Roberts Family of Lawrence, By Bessie B. Furhman, 813 Washington Avenue, Kalamazoo.

The proverbial remark, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating," may be paraphrased just a little now that democracy is being tested more severely than ever before, for it is the proof of democracy of which we are thinking now instead of "the pudding." But we must have evidence of its efficiency and enough of it to make it convincing. So, since the main unit on which democracy depends is the family we must look for the effect of democracy on that unit.

Many families attest the efficiency of democracy but in most cases they could have been just as creditable to any other form of government, for they had the prestige of the white race, wealth, position and education. Thus it is seen that the real test of democracy does not rest on the favored families but on those whose racial inheritance discriminated against them and whose lack of wealth and position lent no advantages comparable with those having those benefits.

Now, let us take a couple who had none of those things, but on the contrary were of mixed races—the husband mainly white but part colored, the wife mainly French but part Indian. Then place them in a pioneer community with all the deprivations of pioneer life and all the rigors of northern winter, and the aftermath of a great Civil war; give the man the trade of a barber in a tiny village with only a few clerks, a doctor or two and farmers who came to town about once a week, for patrons. Then see how the family of that couple turns out. The family I have chosen to write about is the well known Roberts family of Lawrence, Van Buren county, Michigan. That family has most ably demonstrated the efficiency of democracy. They "proved the pudding."

There were six children born to that couple and all grew up and became useful citizens. Five of them remained in Michigan and one went to Illinois and resided there for many years until his death. Of the Michigan residents of this family one became an expert mason, one an expert penman, one an able band musician and salesman, one an excellent cook and an efficient, practical nurse, while both daughters became first class homemakers. The son, who went to Illinois, became a law maker—one of the best in the state.

And now that you have had this general introduction to this record-breaking family, you will have a brief "close-up" of each member of it.

"Barber" Roberts

Although known as a colored man, Barber Roberts was not black. His complexion was rather like a good coat of tan. The picture accompanying this sketch shows the intellectual face and fine character of this man who was self-educated to a great extent, although part of his education came through his experience as a drug clerk in Indianapolis. He read much and he chose good reading along many lines including law.

As an instance of his intelligence and character which gave him his kindly, lovable personality there was his scalp tonic that he originated and attempted to place on the market. Through his acquaintance with drugs while a drug clerk and his experience as a barber Mr. Roberts worked out a new remedy for his customers. Then having found that his scalp preparation was a success he decided to advertise it and sell it, but it had no name as yet. So one day when Dr. Zell L. Baldwin dropped into the barber shop Mr. Roberts asked him to suggest a name. The doctor at once suggested the name Dandene. So Dandene became the name of the new product. Mr. Roberts then invested in materials, pictures and advertising with an eye toward selling his preparation to many people. But just then the Danderene Co. started up and Mr. Roberts was against a stone wall. He was confronted with the assertion that he was infringing on Danderene by having a name so near like it. As Barber Roberts had invested all that he could spare to launch his venture he was unable to start over under a new name for the remedy. Thus the poor barber lost the money he had invested in advertising and was headed off from a probable fortune. However, the humble barber had demonstrated his ability to make a quality product while his Christian spirit in forgiving the wrong spoke well for his character.

Barber Roberts was a Methodist and he raised his family to be Christians and after seeing his children grow up and become useful citizens and especially successful in their chosen and varied occupations his wife died. After that Barber Roberts spent his last days with his daughter Lena of Kalamazoo. At the ripe old age of 83 he passed away after having reared a family that would have made any white father very proud and happy.

Mother Roberts

The wife and companion of this remarkable colored man was born in Carthage, Ind. From there she came to Almena, Mich., when she was about 9 years old. Later her parents moved to Lawton and there she met Wm. G. Roberts, whom she married.

Unlike her husband, she received her education in large part from Michigan schools. One of her teachers was Miss Sylvia Sandborn. This little hunch-backed lady by her fine character, her determination to carry on in spite of her terrible physical handicap, undoubtedly had its effect on the character of little Parthenia Windborn, who was to become the mother of the Roberts family.

This Parthenia Roberts, who became the mother of one of the most outstanding families of Southwestern Michigan kept her home in pioneer fashion. Rag rugs and rag carpets were on her floors. A new rag carpet about every two years was made for six pairs of youngsters' feet with all the extra pairs of neighboring children's feet made new carpets necessary more often than in the smaller families' homes. Her daughter remembers still how they used to put straw under the carpets of those days.

Undoubtedly "Aunt" Libbie Jacobs, the pioneer carpet weaver of Lawrence, wove those carpets and rugs that the Roberts kids wore out, for she was the only carpet weaver for miles around Lawrence. However, we do know that Mr. Wm. G. Roberts made a wise choice when he married the little French and Indian girl, Parthenia Windborn.

WALTER ROBERTS

The oldest son of this family, 'Walt' Roberts, as he is commonly known, lives at Paw Paw, and although 81 years of age, he still works at his trade. He is a stone mason. This man became a first class stone mason many years ago, and many beautiful buildings owe their fine artistic touches of stone work to his hard labor. One of the most distinctive and beautiful office buildings was built by him for Dr. Zell L. Baldwin at Lawrence.

This office building became the property of Dr. Arthur G. Six, when Dr. Baldwin turned over his practice to the young physician and surgeon who came to Lawrence. It was later the scene of Dr. Six's tragic death.

Another beautiful stone building that Walt Roberts built was the home of Glenn and Clair Weaver of Lawrence. At Christie Lake he built the lovely home with stone porch for Mr. and Mrs. Albert Abrams. A stone chimney that he made for his sister Lena of Kalamazoo exemplifies his original ideas of placing smaller pieces of stone between the larger broken ones so that the mortar does not show. The effect is interestingly different and it is as if nature had been a little more lavish with her materials than when the more precise mason work is done.

Although these are only a few of this stone mason's achievements, it is obvious that the list of his works would be a long one, for work of his high quality would bring him many customers and as he has followed his trade for many years, we can only guess at the number of his finished buildings.

Walter Roberts married Miss Louise Shaffer, sister to his brother William's wife. He had three daughters: Rhea deceased; Nina, now Mrs. Jackson of Lansing; Margaret, now Mrs. M. Hagget of Los Angeles, California.

He had two sons Otto and Lavon. The former had an affliction of the eyes from birth. Consequently he has been nearly blind all his life and has to content himself working around home. Lavo follows his father's trade of stone mason and lives at Paw Paw.

WM. R. ROBERTS

Wm. R. Roberts received his education from the Lawrence schools. From there he went to Lansing where his talent for exceptionally fine pen work attracted state wide patronage. It was said that there was but one other man in Michigan who could do engrossing as well as he. He engrossed many diplomas (my own included) and besides that he did similar work for the State Board of Pharmacy, the State Board of Education, the Supreme Court and State Legislature. He also engrossed the names of many of the members of the state legislature on their photographs which hang on the walls of the offices of the president of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Besides working with his pen, Mr. Wm. R. Roberts, his father's namesake, was busy in other ways. He served four years as clerk in the office of Gov. Fred Warner and from 1913 until his death, he was clerk in the State Welfare department. Outside of office hours he was active in many fields in both political and fraternal affairs. He was past master of Capitol lodge No. 872 A. M., and past grand secretary and deputy grand master at Union Grand lodge.

He married a home town girl, Miss Minnie Shafer, a beautiful blond mulatto, mainly white. She, too, was unusually capable so that she was able to take a position at the State Capitol after her husband's death. This handsome couple—the husband a decided brunette with just enough racial difference to lend distinction to a fine intellectual face, and the wife a decided blond with no trace of the negro race, but withall a sweetness of expression, were the parents of one daughter—now Mrs. Cleo M. Taylor of Lansing.

ENOS ROBERTS

This son's talent was music. He played the tuba in both the Lawrence and Kalamazoo city bands. He lived in Kalamazoo for a number of years and worked for Ihling Brothers and Evarhard. Later he went to Chicago and worked for the Fuller and Fuller Company, wholesale druggists. Fifty years ago this company was considered the leading drug house west of New York.

About 15 years before his death by an automobile accident he returned to Lawrence, married and settled down there. Ene. Roberts had the respect of the entire community. His high moral standard was recognized and his ability as a musician gave him a ready welcome into the best homes where he was known.

At the time of his death his brother Adelbert was a Senator of the Illinois state legislature and the senate adjourned as a courtesy to Adelbert in his bereavement.

ELENORE ROBERTS BROWN

'Lena' as she was known to her Lawrence friends and family graduated from the Lawrence high school and sometime later met her fate at her brother's in Paw Paw. That was in the horse and buggy days.

The writer recalls that when a child she saw Lena Roberts about the time of her graduation from high school. She was a tall slender black-haired, dark-eyed girl with a white woman complexion. I thought then that she was as pretty as a colored girl could be. She is still a beautiful woman with good figure, snow white hair and dark friendly eyes that sparkle now and then with happy memories, although she had a case of what nearly approached a stroke and several attacks of arthritis have since caused her much misery.

After questioning her in regard to the rest of the family, I asked her what talent she possessed. Her quick reply was, "Oh, I'm the nit-wit of the family," which when interpreted probably is that she is the wit of the family. However, it finally leaked out that her talent is cooking although she has been very successful when she has tried her hand at nursing. But she always wanted to learn to cook so that was what she became and no ordinary one, either. But more about that later.

Lena Roberts married Joseph Brown, a native of Lebanon, Ind. He was a messenger in the court of Cincinnati under Judge Taft. This position was that of librarian to the Judge. And later he was court messenger under Judge Severns of Kalamazoo. He remained with Judge Severns for 16 years until the Judge retired from the bench. Then he became manager of the Kalamazoo men's club known as the Park Club. The club building is the large red brick mansion near the city library.

Chef of Park Club

On asking if her husband were the chef for this club, the fact came out that Mrs. Brown herself was the chef, although she called herself the cook. They remained there eighteen years, leaving in 1927.e

A menu pamphlet from the Park Club during their stay was convincing evidence that there was no common place cooking and that only a first class chef could have handled the situation. The fact that a salesman from a Chicago firm carrying the rarest foods and beverages stopped only at the Park Club, indicated the quality of the menus there, and a glance over the menu caught items such as Russian caviar, hearts of palm, baked Alaska, breasts of gulnea and many kinds of expensive beverages no longer obtainable. And the one who had charge of all that fancy and elaborate style of boarding people a nit-wit?

One instance of special orde a dinner for 40 people at $5 per Baked Alaska was to be the d Instead of making it the usu in general style, Mrs. Brown dec to use her own originality and made 40 individual Baked Alas When you realize that each serv had to have a separate plate of cream with a meringue covering and then baked just long enough slightly brown the meringue, one see how quickly and hurriedly she to work to get 40 of those dis ready for that dinner. And was tired when they were all served

Although baked Alaska was a orite dessert that she made she came an expert cake and bread ba She practiced and practiced, was a good many eggs until she bec sure of herself. After that she n failed. Her specialties were A food and Sunshine cakes. For t she won several blue ribbons at and once she won $10 for the best of bread.

After their long service at the Club they opened their own home South Westnedge to special di parties. Their patrons at the followed them so that they hardly any other than special dinner or cheon orders. The leading people Kalamazoo entertained there with sp cial dinners. Judge Weimer was o of their star patrons. Dr. McCra of the Normal entertained the me members of the faculty while his wi also entertained the women membe of the faculty at the Brown's. Orie tal rugs and many pieces of antiq furniture gave the home an air quiet comfort and quality.

But cooking and baking success were not the only causes of her su cess as a chef. Kindly consi for the happiness of others ed trait in her, as it seems been in the whole family. lowing instance of her thoug will illustrate. When Ju Grant, grand daughter of Ge Grant and niece of Mrs. Pot mer of Chicago returned to this co try after having had to flee for life from Russia during that countr revolution, Mrs. Brown sent her large full page newspaper clipp about the life and death of Gene Grant.

For this courtesy Mrs. Brown ceived a letter graciously acknowle ing the notable clipping, written the Princess' own distinctive ha writing.

So, here in America were two men of extremely different situati in life with hands across the coun exchanging courtesies to each oth The "White House baby" as the Russian Princess was called, h greatness thrust upon her where the other woman achieved her grea ness, and who shall say but that ea one in her station was as great as t other.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown have one daug ter, Maxine. She is employed at t office of investigation of Kalamazo Some of her duties are interviewi people for finger printing, typing a photography. One of her hobbies photography. Recently she won for a snap shot sent to a Detr paper. The picture was of a t neighbor child, on a step ladder, wa ing a window.

LETHA ROBERTS BURTON

The younger daughter of the R

erts family married Dr. Burton of Benton Harbor. He is a foot specialist and a man who keeps up to date in his profession by attending conventions on his subject. They were the parents of two daughters. One married Attorney Golden of Battle Creek, the other died at the age of 23. From her photograph at graduating time one could see what a lovely girl she was. Graduated from high school at Benton Harbor at 16, she attended the Chicago Conservatory of Music. There she graduated also and became a vocal teacher in a college at Atlanta, Georgia. Some time later while in a Chicago school she had an attack of pneumonia and died. The grief over her daughter's untimely passing may have had something to do with the stroke that Mrs. Burton sustained last winter. At present the stricken woman is still unable to come home to her beautiful modern house as both health and mind were afflicted.

While no special talent has been attributed to this member of the Roberts family, her two brilliant daughters speak well for her as a mother and successful home maker

HON. ADELBERT H. ROBERTS

From an enlarged portrait of Adelbert H. Roberts one can readily notice the resemblance to his father. In fact few white men have shown a nobler bearing and handsomer face than does his picture, in the possession of his sister Lena.

This one time Lawrence boy graduated from the Lawrence High school and then attended University of Michigan. Later he went to Northwestern, where he graduated from the law school. After his graduation he became interested in politics and never practiced law. Instead, he became a lawmaker. He was first clerk in the Municipal Court of Chicago. Then he became state representative for his district for several terms. During the 53rd General Assembly he passed more bills than any other member of the House.

In consideration of this splendid record and service a grateful constituency elected him to the State Senate, a position which he is said to have filled, "with credit to himself, with honor to his race and eminent satisfaction to his district and state."

"The best testimony that can be given," it is said, "comes from the words of James O'Donnell Bennett, acknowledged to have been the greatest newspaper correspondent in America."

The Chicago Tribune sent Bennett to Springfield during the 54th General Assembly to make a careful study of the work and worth of the members of both houses.

This is what he said about Senator Roberts: "I was much interested in noticing that the best diction I have heard in the course of two days senate debating was that of the colored Senator Adelbert H. Roberts, 3405 Calumet ave., Chicago, chairman of the committee on Criminal Procedure and member of a dozen other important committees. He is one of the few senators who ever quotes from anything but a public document. He has frequent recourse to the words of Charles Sumner, as he put it, and he quotes him tellingly. That great spirit who suffered much for the race from which Senator Roberts sprang would be proud if he could hear this able and distinguished legislator citing him. He secured the enactment of one law during the last session of the General Assembly that should endear him to every man and woman in Illinois. It was the Fugitive Warrant law. He secured in addition a $15,000 appropriation to the Kersy Bill for the erection of a magnificent monument in honor of the old 8th Illinois Regiment."

Another notable achievement of Senator Roberts was the law that he had passed for colored people. It was said that "The most constructive piece put upon the statute books of any state in the union by a colored man was the law providing for the creation of the 35th Street Branch of the Illinois Free Employment Office. This branch is officered by colored men and women drawing lucrative salaries. In a single year 12,000 negro men and 6,000 negro women secured positions without a cent of cost to them.

Senator John Dailey said of him: "I measure my words when I say I have been a member of the Senate for over 20 years, yet during that time it has never been my pleasure to serve with any member who equals Senator Roberts in diction, eloquence and power of speech. He is an able legislator. It is such men as he who successfully solve the so-called race problems.

Senator Harold Kessinger said: "He is the greatest orator in the Senate."

Representative Norman G. Flagg said: "You made your place in the House in a day."

Rep. Truman A. Snell said: "Your speech is the most brilliant one of the session. It is a classic. And by it you have displayed the greatest moral courage that I have seen in the House for 12 years."

Ex-Governor Frank O. Lowden said: "I congratulate you upon the honor and glory that you have won for yourself and race today."

Governor Len Small said: "Senator Roberts is a brilliant scholar, and an able legislator and a dependable friend."

Lt. Governor Fred E. Sterling said: "No particular race need try to claim Senator Roberts as its own. He has used his splendid powers in the interest of all the people whom he has made his debtor."

Mrs. Florence F. Rohrer, Senator, said: "I consider it a happy privilege and distinguished honor to have as a colleague during the session a gentleman of so many excellent qualities of mind and heart as Senator Roberts."

Chief Justice Harry Olsen said: "I feel proud of the splendid record that Senator Roberts has made as a legislator, and the high esteem in which he is held among the members of both Houses."

Favorably as Senator Roberts is known in Springfield and much as he is appreciated there, it is in his home city that he is best known and most highly appreciated. For 35 years he has moved with and among the people of Chicago doing a work here for the uplift of the people that makes him our most useful citizen.

His courage, uprightness of character, loyalty to his race and usefulness to his district make him an ideal public servant and one who should be kept where he has learned by experience and contact how to get the legislation the people need and desire."

Not only was Senator Roberts an influential man in the Illinois legislature but his words had weight elsewhere as shown by the following instance:

Two negro students had tried for two years to gain admittance to the Medical School of the University of Illinois, but when Senator Roberts wrote a letter to President Kinley of the University of Illinois in behalf of those boys he got immediate action. Each student received a telegram advising him that his application for medical school attendance had been accepted.

Possibly no one knows how many more cases of Senator Roberts' influential assistance were given out of his life, but perhaps enough has been said to show what the world would have missed had that colored boy, Adelbert H. Roberts, been a slave or the citizen of any country where democratic rights are withheld.

Adelbert H. Roberts married Lulu Wiley of Kawana, Ill., to whom he paid tribute of much of his success. It was said of his wife that she is a very gracious lady worthy of such a husband. Their homes were both 3-story stone mansions, the former in Calumet avenue, is still owned by Mrs. Roberts, but she lives in their newer stone mansion on Michigan avenue, Chicago. They were the parents of two sons, both pharmacists, but both are in defense work now for Uncle Sam.

Senator Roberts passed away January 2, 1937, and the resolutions passed by the Senate of Illinois at the time of his death bespeak the highest regard for him:

. . . . Whereas, his work in the General Assembly and especially in the Upper Branch thereof was conspicuous because of his scrupulous integrity, marked ability and untiring application to the minutest detail in matters of legislation: and, whereas A. H. Roberts was a man of clean personal life, kind and courteous to all, devoted to his family, loyal to his friends, quick to give credit and encouragement to any and all who rendered true public service. Whereas, in his every daily walk and conversation A. H. Roberts conducted himself as an exemplary American citizen and Christian gentleman. Therefore, be it resolved by the Senate that we express our deep regret at the loss sustained by those nearest and dearest to him and by the State of Illinois at the passing of this true public servant, citizen and Christian gentleman."

Now, having presented the leading facts in the lives of the Roberts family as one of the most telling pieces of evidence of the efficiency of democracy that any family can offer, I must close this sketch with the hope that this little candle lit in the window of democracy may shed its beams afar.

The Beginning of Hamilton Township

Original Records of Clerk and Justice of the Peace Discovered. Was First Covington, Then Alpena, Then Hamilton.

Did some one say, pass up the history, or will it be acceptable in good humor, and like a little nonsense now and then, be relished by the best of men?

The history at hand is in a book that came out of the attic of the home of a former townsman of Decatur. It is the clerk's record of the first proceedings of the township of Hamilton. It is also the township's first justice docket. The book is easily worth $100 and undoubtedly the Hamilton township board will readily pay that amount for it.

The first entry is seemingly unexplanable, but it gives every evidence of 'genuinity' and age. It reads:

$47.35. Decatur, Mich., May 22, 1784

On or before one year from date I promise to pay to the order of O. R. Marks the sum of forty seven dollars and 35/100, with interest at 12 percent.

George Washington.

The next entry is where its value as history comes in:

Alpena, April 1, 1839.

At a meeting legally holden at the house of Henry Coleman in Alpena agreeable to previous notice for the purpose of organizing said township and to elect the several officers for the preceding year proceeded to business as follows, towit:

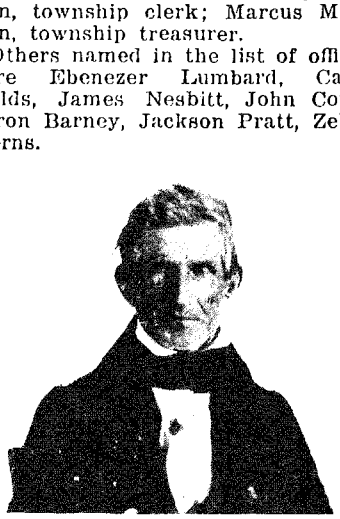
1. Elected Philotus Haydon, Moderator.

2. Elected Ralph Mason, clerk, pro tem.

3. Elected Henry Coleman, Robert Nesbitt and George A. Bentley, Board of Inspectors.

We hereby certify that the following officers were elected, viz.: George A. Bentley, supervisor; Henry Coleman, township clerk; Marcus Merriman, township treasurer.

Others named in the list of officers were Ebenezer Lumbard, Calvin Fields, James Nesbitt, John Comly, Aaron Barney, Jackson Pratt, Zebina Sterns.



Ralph Mason, clerk pro tem.

At a township meeting on the first Monday of April, 1839, voted there should be raised a tax of one hundred dollars to defray the expenses and incidental charges of said town.

Road survey in the township of Alpena, 1839. A survey of the road known as the Mason road. Beginning at the Prairie Ronde road  and intersects Mr. Luke's road in the township of Alpena. June 20, 1839.

Surveyed by H. P. Barnum.

A survey of the Butterfield road, June 20, 1839. The town line road between Alpena and Lawrence, July 6, 1839.

Then surveyed and laid out under the direction of Wolcott Keeler and Tobias Byers, commissioners of the town of Keeler, Philotus Haydon and Jackson Pratt of Alpena, and Eaton Branch and Uriel Barnes of Lawrence, the center line of a public highway described in detail, and extending to the center line of the Territorial Road so called.

Dated at Alpena December 27, 1839.

The next entry is of the surveying of a road by Alonzo Crain, surveyor. It is dated March 19, 1840, the entry beginning as follows:

"Attraction of road running east and west on the north of road line of Mr. Field's barn in the township of Hamilton."

This is the first entry under the name of Hamilton, but there is no record of the change of name from Alpena township.

At the township meeting April 6, 1840, "The amount of tax voted to be raised to defray the incidental expenses for the coming year, $2.00.

Annual meeting in April, 1841:

Voted to raise $50 to defray the necessary expenses of said town. Resolved that we withdraw from the county and support the paupers belonging to said township independent from the county.

Annual meeting in April, 1844. Geo. Bentley still supervisor and Henry Coleman, clerk. Voted to raise $50 to defray expenses. Voted to raise $25 for library purposes.

Annual meeting April 7, 1845. Philotus Haydon elected supervisor, Henry Coleman, clerk. Voted to raise $70 to defray expenses. This is the last clerk's entry in the book.

The next is a record of early marriages. Next the book becomes a justice docket.

The first case is in assumpsit,—L. R. Barker vs. Harley Thomas. Judgment rendered plaintiff in the amount of $6.00 damages and 58 cents costs. Total $6.58. Dated July 5, 1849. Truman Foster, Justice of the peace.

In the seventies there was a bounty on woodchucks and there are pages of affidavits similar to the following:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that the 23 woodchuck scalps which I have here this day presented were captured and taken in the township of Hamilton since April 7, 1873.

Frank Sterns.

Jarvis Skinner, Justice of the Peace.

The above is a brief outline of what is contained in the book, and will leave it to Supervisor Collins if it isn't worth $100 to the township.

Capt. O. W. Rowland in his history of Van Buren county accounts for the change of name.

The county of Van Buren was organized in 1837, the year that Michigan became a state. It contained seven townships. The townships of Hamilton and Keeler were one township named Covington, with no apparent reason for the name.

The legislature of 1839 made two townships of Covington and dropped the name. One of the townships was named Keeler and the other Alpena.

The name "Alpena" did not prove satisfactory to the citizens of the township, and in 1840 the legislature, on request, enacted that, "The name of the township of Alpena in the county of Van Buren, shall hereafter be altered and changed to that of Hamilton."

EARLY VAN BUREN COUNTY DAYS

By Nellie Truesdell

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

(We would like Mrs. Truesdell to select another head for her column. The above heading was all right for the way she started out to write, but she has gone way past that now. The heading is too limited in scope and does not indicate the general interest to which her column is entitled. We are going to leave it to her to work out a new title in her own way.

Mrs. Truesdell's letter this week is in two sections, but we are putting the sections together because they just do not belong separate.

We are mailing George Kloosterhouse a copy of this Republican, and he may be interested in knowing that we are well acquainted with his Decatur relatives and see them often. We send the Republican regularly to Johnnie Kloosterhouse, whose mail is directed, c/o Postmaster, New York. That means he is overseas, perhaps in England or Ireland or possibly Iceland.

Mrs. Irving Mead is a new contributor. She will cover Celery Center and is falling naturally into our ideas of what makes an interesting newspaper.

Ed. Plopper has been busy this fall selling apples. He has had a nice crop and his big hearted way of wanting to give his customers a little better bargain than they bargained for, has enabled him to dispose of it. He said he met with good success in advertising in the Republican.

Mrs. Prudie Curtis is one of the good pioneer residents of Volinia township in Cass county. Her health is not good and it may be hard for her to write, but if she felt able to do it, an occasional letter from her would give pleasure to her many friends who read this paper. But this is Mrs. Truesdell's column, not ours. Before turning it over to her, however, we wish to say, Happy birthday to you.)

Sept. 15, 1942.

Dear Editor:

Thanks to you, Mr. Moulton, and to your paper, The Republican, for a very pleasant surprise yesterday, for it was through your paper I located my mother's cousin, Sophia Gray Combs.

My door chimes rang about one p.m. and there stood a car full of happy looking people. Four generations were represented, to be exact. The youngest, Miss Goodroad, five years old, and the eldest, but far from looking like a great grandmother, Mrs. Combs.

So many years since we have met, and such a short time to say the many things we wanted to! For this was to be a brief call. I believe there was to be a picnic dinner later, for I noticed thermos bottles, etc., in the car.

Sophia used to play with my oldest sister, Annis, and Uncle Abrom, as she calls my grandfather Lewis who lived near Lawrence. I think his farm is now known as the Deming farm. Sophia and Annis were about ten years old at that time.

I wish you had time, I said, to tell me things you did then. "Well," she said, "that would take a lot of time, but I do remember how Annis and I used to like to use big words, and one of the words was, ostentatious. I suppose it was used on every occasion possible, a new calico dress or hat, was ostentatious, and sometimes even if it did not fit the case, it was a nice big word to roll out of small mouths."

Sophia is a collector of antiques, a very good one I am sure, for she saw at a glance that my little drop-leaf walnut table which was handed down to us, was genuine. Neither did she miss seeing the decanter that I keep on a shelf by the clock with camphor in, just as my father and mother always kept it in our home. They bought camphor gum and alcohol and mixed it themselves, and there was always bits of undissolved gum in the bottom. I believe she said this decanter which was used for wine was about General Grant's time.

I am a collector too, I said, of memories, and so some day in the near future we plan a visit. Ostentatious, ostentatious, I believe my garden is ostentatious. Nellie Truesdell.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

Will Someone Suggest a Name?

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Nov. 20, 1942.

Well, as the Hackensack gossip would say, "Here I am again." And with a sad ending to my salt-rising bread story, I hate to switch over to "Paw's" side but it is all those things he said and more. I was not one in the ten thousand he spoke of that had good luck.

Mrs. Chas. Ruple of Decatur sent me the recipe from her Dr. Chase cook book. I appreciate her kindness and her good wishes that came with it. From 5 p. m. on Tuesday until 6 p.m. Wednesday I watched hopefully for a bubble or an odor. I am afraid I shall never live it down in my own family.

My one grain of comfort is from an article I read in my neighbor's Farm and Home cook book and was written by Mrs. Rorer, who was considered authority on cooking a number of years ago. She writes: "Salt rising bread emptying is made by fermenting flour, water and milk. Judging from odor produced bacteria plays a part in fermentation. Wild yeast plants of the air find an exceedingly good resting place and grow with great rapidity. Carry basin of emptyings to a room where floor is covered with carpet, especially if the carpet has not been carefully cleaned and almost immediately the emptyings begin to foam." And so I try to think my kitchen was too clean, and our mothers did not have a vacuum sweeper.

I want to thank everyone who did their best to help, especially Mrs. Marvel Berge. It was fun while it lasted, but I'm willing to drop the subject now. Yesterday I sent those three sullen-looking loaves to my nephew for his chickens or pigs. So it wasn't an entire loss.

And this is another day, it seems like spring and in my husband's rose garden there is a half opened bud. Preparations are going on next door for a church wedding Thanksgiving eve, Doug and Betty. Doug, who is our neighbor's son, will no doubt have to leave his pretty bride and help Uncle Sam. I have never seen Doug out of sorts, as one might say. He has always had a smile. And my neighbors on the other side left yesterday for Maxwell Field, Alabama, to be with their son, Pvt. Jay Hurni, over Thanksgiving and with them went Pvt. Jay's wife, Maude.

Mr. Moulton brought back more memories when he spoke of the nuralgia cure and the nubia.

"A name, a name what's in a name?" Do I quote Shakespeare correctly? Mrs. Ruple suggests, "Garden of Memory," or "Memory Garden." Mrs. Berge compliments me by suggesting, "Just Looking." Mrs. Berge, the following little verse from the pen of Dr. Frank Crane has been my prayer for many years:

"Give me not scenes more charming, give me eyes
To see the beauty that around me lies."

Nellie Truesdell.

P.S. Mr. Moulton, I am so glad you printed the words to "Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition." I, too, can sing it reverently. My husband said he heard one over the radio better than that one. I said what was the name of it; he couldn't remember. Then, I said it wasn't better you couldn't forget this one.

NEWTON WOODS CALLS TRAVELERS

Wilderness Is Intact After 100 Years

(Detroit Fee Press)

Serene autumn, a panorama such as inspired the man who named Brown October Ale, now greets the traveler who comes unexpectedly upon Newton's Woods.

Here at the intersection of the roads connecting Dowagiac and Marcellus, and Cassopolis and Decatur, in Range 5 south, 14 west, Sections 20, 29 and 30, lie 400 acres of wilderness as it appeared hundreds of years ago, and more especially, as it appeared to the first white settlers who came upon it before Paul Bunyan shaved the forest whiskers off the face of Michigan.

Thousands of hardwood trees, a solid hundred acres of oaks, a great grove of whitewoods, variously known also as tulip trees or yellow poplars, are turning brown with the advance of autumn on Newton's Woods.

Fame of Woods Spreads

Hundreds of persons visit the woods annually and its fame as a spot of unmarred nature beauty is spread farther each year.

No other such tract remains in the North Central States of the Middle West.

Approaching Newton's Woods from the south, one comes over a hill and from about a mile away sees the road disappear across a broad valley as it enters a tunnel of arching trees so dense that they shut out the sun.

At the south entrance to the half-mile avenue of trees stands an old church, long abandoned by the Dunkards who built it, and now converted into a community center. A half mile north the beautiful old home of the Newtons is found beyond the heaviest timber.

Across from the house on the north side of the road is the 100-acre block of oaks. A little farther east Dowagiac creek crosses the road and meanders southwest through the timber.

The grove of whitewoods lies to the southeast, a beautiful tract of densely set trees of great height.

Warren Reynolds, former surveyor of Cass county, has taken measurements of one of the whitewoods that was 20.6 feet in circumference, two feet from the ground, and 145.3 feet tall. There is one 150-foot elm in the tract, 24.2 feet in circumference.

Because the Newton family has owned the timber from the day it passed from the Federal Land office through a patent to Col. James Newton more than 100 years ago, the tract is in a fine state of preservation.

Forestry instructors bring students from nearby colleges and from the University of Michigan to Newton's Woods for field trips, and efforts have been made from time to time to convert it into a state park and game and fish preserve.

Commanded a Regiment

Col. Newton, the original owner, came to Michigan from Ohio, where he had acquired the military title as commanders of a regiment of militia

Col. Newton was a member of the Commission that framed the Constitution of Michigan and was commissioned judge by Gov. Steven T. Mason, but never accepted the post. He served in the State House of Representatives in 1837, '38 and '39.

George Newton, the Colonel's son, inherited the 738-acre estate, and his daughter, Mrs. Jane Crego, fell heir to it in turn. She is said to have refused $150,000 for the timber during the World War.

The property now is in the hands of Jesse Green, administrator for nine cousins, heirs of the original family.

WELFARE RELIEF EXCEEDS LAST YEAR

The state welfare relief commission estimates that it will give aid to 225,000 families in November. This will represent an increase of 25,000 over former estimates and 23,000 over a year ago.

Every county is asked to furnish one-third of the welfare appropriation and where the administration fails to reach an agreement with the state aid will be dened it. This will make the situation in Van Buren county somewhat uncertain.

Mrs. Chas. Ruple, living south of town, picked Johny Jump Ups in the woods last week. This pretty little spring flower seldom makes its appearance in the fall.

Newton Woods Deeded to MSC

Fred Russ of Cassopolis, the Giver, Has Done a Grand Thing for the State of Michigan and This Community.

Fred Russ of Cassopolis has given the Newton farm in Volinia to the Michigan State College for the use of its forestry department for educational purposes. The deed was delivered Wednesday afternoon of last week to William H. Berkey, chairman of the Michigan State College Board and editor of the Cassopolis Vigilant, and Editor Berkey was the first to publish a complete account of the transaction.

Mr. Russ obtained the property, consisting of 580 acres, of Jesse Green, administrator of the estate of Mrs. Jane Crego, in 1935. He bought it at a cost of $40,000 to save the famous Newton woods which is a major part of the property.

Four hundred acres of the farm lie on the south side of the Dowagiac-Marcellus road and east of the Cassopois-Decatur road and 180 acres lie across the road to the north. That part of the farm not in timber or planted to timber is being farmed by Mr. Russ and his tenant, Floyd Robinson.

Col. James Newton took the land from the government in 1830 and it remained in the Newton family until the death of Jane Newton Crego, more than 100 years later.

Lost Boy Found By Bloodhound

[From Rawlins (Wyoming) Republican]

A twenty-man searching party made up of sawmill workers, county officers and Rock River residents, aided by a one-year-old bloodhound, yesterday found Harold Jackman, 16-year-old Rock River youth who was lost in the Sand Lake area, near McFadden, on Monday.

Undersheriff Frank Lemoine, who was in virtual charge of the searching party, said the boy was discovered on the banks of Carlson Creek about 12:15 p. m. yesterday. The youth had wandered more than 40 miles in search of his parents' camping site, but when found was only about 10 miles as the crow flies from camp.

Killed Squirrels

He was well and healthy, although tired from his wanderings which covered a period of two days and three nights. He had managed to feed himself by killing squirrels with a homemade slingshot and eating them raw. Only once, he said did he make a fire with his pocket knife and a piece of flint, and then it took him more than two hours to get it started. He wandered only during the daylight hours, sleeping at night in shelters which he constructed with pine-boughs.

After he was taken back to camp, while munching on sandwiches and coffee, the 16-year-old attributed his well-being to earlier Boy Scout training.

Bloodhound Found Boy

The searchers, however, made their attributions to the bloodhound, which is owned by Jack Garber. Without the dog, they said, the search would have been impossible, for not only was Jackman wearing moccasins which left no track, but he first wandered down Deep Creek, then crossed the stream divide to Stud Creek, wandering down this and finally crossed to Carlson Creek, which he strayed down and then began following up on the other side of the stream.

Lemoine said the country in which he was lost was filled with dense timber and underbrush.

Jackman had been camping with his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Jackman of Rock River, near Deep Creek about three miles from Sand Lake. He left the camp at 3 p.m. Monday to go to Crater Lake, a trip of about one and a half miles. His parents did not miss him until after dark. He had missed Crater Lake, wandered beyond it and had then turned back to retrace his steps but had missed the trail back to camp.

Went Opposite Direction

Tuesday he found Crater Lake. There he searched for a trail, but finally found one which led him in exactly the opposite direction. It was at this point that he began to wander aimlessly, up and down streams.

Jackman carried a .22 caliber homemade pistol, but soon shot away his ammunition and reverted to the slingshot.

Searchers left Rawlins Tuesday afternoon to begin the hunt and radioed Sheriff Glenn Penland late that night for the dog which Penland brought to to them.

At night the searchers built fires but the lad never saw them. They spent every daylight hour searching for him. At times the men thought the dog was misleading them for it sniffed along in what seemed an aimless manner, but it was following every footstep of the boy.

Before leaving camp Jackman had substituted moccasins for his shoes. Thus the searchers had a fresh scent to give the dog. Lemoine said that when the bloodhound was on the trail it took two men to hold him back.

The youth was startled when three workers from a nearby sawmill finally caught up with him as he was walking calmly beside the creek, swinging a stick which he used as a cane.

Remarkable Work of a Sutton Bloodhound

A graphic story of how one of J. G. Sutton's bloodhounds found a lost boy out in Wyoming was sent to Mr. Sutton last week. The pups were shipped from Decatur to the officer last winter and are now about a year old. The purchaser sent this letter:

Rawlins, Wyo.,
August 31, 1942.

Mr. Sutton,
Dear Sir:

Just a letter about the dogs I bought from you. I named the pup from Investigator Red Hawk, and the pup from Dr. Watson Tarzon. I have worked with these dogs ever since I got them.

I found a 16-year-old boy that had been lost for over 70 hours with Red Hawk. The trail was 40 hours old when I got there. Am sending a newspaper clipping of the search.

I have tried to trail 3 escaped convicts. We caught the last one who had been hitch hiking through the mountains on a country road. He would get a ride for 8 or 10 miles, then he would walk till another ride would pick him up. At every turn off we would let the dog out of the car to see if the man had been there, and if he had the dog would let us know. We finally overtook him at 1:30 that morning. Sometimes the dogs will go in the wrong direction just looking for the trail, but they can find any trail we have set for them except down through town.

What do you feed a dog when on a long trail of more than one day, and where can you buy dog supplies such as harness and shoes, as these rocks are very hard on a dog's feet?

When I was trailing the lost boy I trailed him 25 miles the first day, to say nothing about the many times we lost the trail and would back track and circle. The next day Red Hawk took the trail for 15 miles. He got pretty hungry but would not eat his regular dog food. He lost about 20 pounds and just about played out. Some fellow told me we were supposed to feed them nothing but beat up eggs. So please try to straighten me out on these problems.

Yours truly, Jack Garber.

Where The Old Grow Young and The Sick Get Well

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Goble are supplying a real need in this community, and as the fact is more fully realized their business will grow till they will need to build onto their spacious home on the South Side.

This home is one of the outstanding places in Decatur. It was built by the late William H. Tuttle about 60 years ago, and stands in a grove of tall native oak trees on Williams street where the street merges into the New Swamp road.

Will and Annie Tuttle lived there till Annie died. Then Will, in his sorrow and discouragement, thought he never wanted to see the place again. He disposed of his furniture, sold the home to the Gobles and took a room in the home of the late Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Roberts. They showed him every kindness, but his thoughts about the old home underwent a reversal and he literally died of homesickness and grief.

Albert Gantz, who has lived in Decatur about 70 years, and so far as we know never knew what it was to be sick, got that way while living alone in his house on east Delaware street. It was several days before he could attract the attention of anyone. When he did the doctor was summoned and it was determined that he was a fit subject for a hospital. He entered Lake View and then Bronson, had his operation and convalesced. The hospital became unendurable to him and he was brought to the Goble home.

He lies on his comfortable bed and looks out upon the trees and the long highway that leads on over Fifield hill, and almost forgets his physical difficulties. Albert is now on the road to recovery, and when Tommie Bass with his traveling barber shop failed to keep his appointment, Al actually shaved himself. That is a sure sign that he is recovering.

Mrs. Mary Vining Lisk also lives at the Goble home, receives the best of care and enjoys her life there. When we called last week she was ready for a good visit and we talked over old times. Mrs. Lisk was a daughter of Amos Morris. She was born on Little Prairie Ronde, we guess about 80 years ago, and was brought up there.

That was a wonderful place in the days of the early settlers. The very name is a synonym for rural elegance and refinement. Little Prairie Ronde stands in a distinctive class like the Blue Grass of Kentucky, the Gold Coast of Chicago, and the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts. Some good novelist, catching the inspiration of the life there 50 to 100 years ago, could write a great story under the title of "Little Prairie Ronde." What a good assignment it would be for Iole Fuller Goodspeed who wrote The Loon Feather, and who has relatives residing on the Prairie's edge.

Mrs. Clara Abbott, whose ancestors were among the founders of the Prairie, now owns the farm on which Mrs. Lisk was born. The latter told of coming to town over the corduroy road now the paved Old Swamp road. She spoke of the bridge across the Dowagiac Creek which to this day is known as the Red Bridge because it was originally painted red. The old wooden structure has long since been replaced with cement, and Mrs. Lisk thinks that in keeping with the name it should be painted red. We second the motion.

Well. I Ain't As Young As I Used To Be

John Shaad was born in Three Rivers August 23, 1864, and the next June, the Shaad family consisting of the father and mother, Anna and Mary and little ten months old John, pulled up stakes and moved to Decatur.

They came across the country in an open wagon drawn by two horses. The trip which now takes 40 minutes, took them the entire day. They came through Marcellus to Nicholsville where they stopped at the Potter House for dinner and a needed rest.

They arrived in Decatur with the setting of the sun and put up at the Tittle Tavern on East Sherwood street. John sr. opened his boot and shoe shop on Main street in June, 1865, and continued in business here until he died.

John Shaad jr. is still here, was 78 last month and this poem, which was taken from the South Haven Tribune, is printed for him:

I had a birthday just of late,
The calendar says I'm seventy-eight.
My spirit says I'm twenty-three,
And I'm feeling as young as I used to be.

The old clock ticks in this breast of mine
As true as can be, and keeps good time.
My eyes are good, no trouble to see,
Still I hain't as young as I used to be.

My mind seems clear, and I try to think
As straight as I can with nary a kink.
I feel like laughing and joking with glee
And acting as young as I used to be.

I'm full to the brim with youth's ambish;
I like to hunt and like to fish.
But when it comes to climbing a tree,
Well! I hain't as good as I used to be.

But time is passing, and I'm going along,
Taking life with a laugh and whistle and song.
And hoping I'll live to be ninety-three
And still feel as young as I used to be.

DREAM HOUSE OF CIVIL WAR VETERAN REMAINS UNCHANGED NEARLY 40 YEARS

Colonial Type Home Erected East of of Paw Paw by Carpenter and Painter, Both Deaf.

(From the Kalamazoo Gazette.)

Paw Paw.—Dignity of the early years of the century is reflected in the large colonial home of Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Morrison, along U. S.-12 east of Paw Paw. For much of the house has remained the same as when it was first opened in 1902—with only two rooms re-decorated in those 39 years.

The stately house was built by the Rev. and Mrs. Edward Harvey, who lived in the barn at the rear of the house during the two years of construction. They watched the day by day progress of the one carpenter and one painter—both deaf—each of whom was paid $2 a day to put his finest work in the new home.

His Dream House

The Rev. Mr. Harvey probably saw every piece of lumber that went into the house. He had been recently retired as head of a pension bureau in Detroit, and had come to Paw Paw for the building of his dream house.

The site was a four-acre tract purchased from his brother, Henry Harvey, who owned the farm nearby, and the two families lived side by side for years. Both brothers were Civil war veterans, the Rev. Mr. Harvey having lost a leg in battle.

Every morning he drove a team to Paw Paw, picked up his builders, William Simmons and John Caleb, and brought them to the farm for the day's work. They returned to the village on foot at night.

Meanwhile, the Harveys partitioned the barn into a kitchen—and slept in a box stall, awaiting the day they would move into their huge home. Their floor plans were taken from the home of Robert Wagner, a Detroit artist of the time, and the interior decoration was done by a Chicago house designer.

The entire downstairs floors and woodwork is of quarter-sawed oak, and all the windows are made of plate glass. The front entrance has a brass replica of the national emblem for a knocker, and the two-story high white columns are distinctive to make the house remembered beyond most others.

The large living room has a wide fireplace—built of red brick with an arched facing. The wall about it is handpainted, and there is a raccoon rug before the hearth, given the Morrisons by Mrs. Harvey.

Handpainted Walls

The wide, graceful stairway curves up from the living room, with a landing and small balcony directly above the fireplace. The lighting fixtures, as are all others in the house are left from the gas-lighting days, but wired for electricity.

The music room has Mexican mahogany woodwork, with hand-painted walls of harps, violins, and other instruments.

Next to it was a guest room with the gayest imaginable wall-paper in, what was then, a modernistic design. It has a huge window seat, with blue cushions, and the brass chandelier has several prisms, added as ornaments by Mrs. Harvey herself.

Across the living room and to the south side of the house, the dining room is outstanding for its big bay alcove, where five narrow and tall windows provide plenty of sunlight. The lighting fixture is of wrought metal, with a greenish glass in the shade. Imitation leather with diamond-shaped inserts is used for wall covering below a plate rail, and above, the plaster has been painted with oil colors in blended reds, greens and browns.

Japanese Cloth

The butler's pantry seems to have enough oak lumber in it to floor a huge room. The floor, ceiling-high cupboards, and a 300-pound ice box are made of the highly polished wood.The icebox also opens to the rear entrance hallway, and here too is a dumb waiter to the basement.

The kitchen is decorated in oak as well, and adjoining is a bath, linen closet, and rear entrance to the porte-cochere at the back of the house. The hall wall-covering upstairs and down, is a Japanese cloth, something like a linen weave.

The upstairs front bedroom—the one with double doors opening to the little balcony on the house front—was formerly a library, with corners filled with oak bookcases, now converted into space for clothes storage. The walls are covered in a heavy green paper, with white stencil design, and there are two window seats in the room. One of the doors has a cut glass door knob. From the library, Mrs. Harvey later gave 2,000 volumes to start the Paw Paw public library.

Adjoining is a smaller bedroom, finished in ash woodwork.

Another bedroom, once the master suite, has a Japanese grass cloth, much like today's reed rugs, on all walls. A large hall way, linen closet and clothes closet are next to the room, with a white tiled bath at the rear. The maid's room, across the hall, was finished in Georgia pine.

A rear deck, which is reached from the upstairs hall, overlooks a particularly scenic expanse of fields and woods to the west.

The Rev. Mr. Harvey died in 1916, and Mrs. Harvey lived alone in the house until May, 1941, when it was sold to the Morrisons. She, at 81 years of age, has moved to Paw Paw to spend the remainder of her life in a smaller home. She is very active, and often drives her car the four miles to her former home for visits.

Civil War Tales

Eli Street near the grade school in Decatur was named after an old Civil War Veteran by the name of Eli Hincher. He lived there many years after his return from the War.

Probably the high light of his declining years was the yearly ride of the old soldiers in the Memorial Day parade, and the honor shown him by the G. A. R. on that day.

He was an inveterate story teller, and his favorite pastime was "reeling off by the yard" incidents and happenings of the Civil War.

His stories were greatly exaggerated and he never failed to make himself the hero of every yarn. It was his delight to tell his tales to the old timers who sat on the sidewalk benches along Main Street.

One of his best and most exaggerated stories was about a famous march he took with his comrades. His company had been maneuvering near the East Coast, and he swelled with pride as he told of his accomplishments. He climaxed his story with this statement, "Why, I walked the full length of Hampton Roads," (Hampton Roads being a strip of water in the Atlantic Ocean.)

GALE HARDWARE STARTED BUSINESS 15 YEARS AGO

This month of February is the fifteenth anniversary of the entry of G. R. Gale into the hardware and implement business in Decatur.

J. E. Renne had established the business, dealing principally in farm implements, and it was with the idea of expansion that he formed the partnership with Mr. Gale. They moved into the 3 story Clark building which has since been destroyed by fire, and in November of the same year Mr. Gale bought the interest of his partner.

In 1930 Mr. Gale moved into the Stewart building where he is still located. He has gradually built up a big trade in hardware and International Harvester Company implements and repairs.

The store has become almost indispensible to the farmers of the surrounding country. When old machinery wears out or they need repairs and the help of an expert mechanic, they go to Gale's and their troubles are overcome.

The proprietor and his assistants, James Hall and Max Graham, have gained a wide circle of friends for their competency, their courtesy, the time they give and the effort they make to meet the needs of their customers. They have the reputation of being accommodating and that in their business is worth much to a community.

D. G. Locke, agricultural teacher at the high school and leader of the Future Farmers of America, desires to extend the best wishes of his organization to Mr. Gale. He said, "We realize the value of the implement service he is rendering to the farmers of the community and wish him much success in the future."

R. M. Roop of Kalamazoo, IHC blockman for this territory, expresses the good wishes of the Company in the following letter received last week:

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER Co.
February 18, 1942.

Mr. A. N. Moulton,
Dear sir,—

We wish to congratulate G. R. Gale on the fifteenth anniversary of our business relationship. Also we want to thank our many customers that have developed through this dealer's efforts. His contacts have brought an ever increasing volume of business at this point.

Mr. Gale has always conducted his business on a fair and honorable basis which cannot help but spell success.

Very truly yours,
R. M. Roop,
International Harvester Co.

Curiously enough, while we were considering the writing of these few lines as a surprise for Raymond, the little journal, "The Live Wire," published away out in Seattle, Washington, by our brother, Will C. Moulton, arrived, and in it we discovered this comment:

A Wise Advertiser

For many years G. R. Gale, hardware merchant at Decatur, Mich., has made his 4x6 space in The Decatur Republican look like a tiny two-column newspaper.

He heads it in heavy, black type —"Town and Country," Vol. 13, No 12—and there's an address and date line underneath the heading.

There are little snatches here and there which tell ever so briefly about his goods; new shipments of plowpoints, harrows, garden tools and paints.

Each snatch is followed by a joke or bit of wisdom, the items that are usually read first in any publication.

The ad occupies the same position in every issue and we find ourselves looking for it when the old hometown paper arrives every Saturday.

No doubt other readers look for it too, even though they are hundreds of miles away from Decatur—and never buy any hardware.

In any event, what an ad for the town and farmer folks, who live on the spot, and need the goods.

WALTER BROWN SEZ

(Walter Brown came in Saturday morning wearing his overcoat. If there was ever a man who does not like to wear an overcoat it is Walter.)

You got to have a permit to buy a gallon of kerosene now. Bime by you will have to have a permit to buy a loaf of bread, but I see in the paper this morning that the president is going to look out to see that there don't anybody go hungry.

Say, but I remember a lot about the old crowd of fellows that used to keep things lively in Decatur back in the seventies. Tom Brownbridge was one of the leaders of that crowd. He was an Englishman, came over here from England, direct I guess. He was a mighty good fellow, Tom Brownbridge was, but full of the old Harry.

Tom Burke told me that one time back in the seventies Tom Brownbridge was going to have a big Christmas dinner and he had a turkey for it that filled the oven. Those Chadwick boys got next to it and slipped into the kitchen when there wasn't anybody around and stole the turkey out of the oven.

J. S. Dowd was one of the good citizens of Decatur back in the seventies. He kept a grocery store just north of Henry Rosenberg's clothing store. He sold out and moved to Missouri, but I don't remember who he sold to. He had a boy, Shep. Dowd, about my age, and I got a letter from him occasionally, but that was many years ago. I've completely lost track of them now.

Well, I must be getting home now, the Kalamazoo folks are coming this afternoon.

Well, Guy and Clara McGowan of Lawrence were up here to see us Sunday and said their son Kenneth is going to move to Kalamazoo. Kenneth works in a machine shop in Kalamazoo and has lived on a farm near his folks. He and three others have been driving back and forth, but they're not going to do it any more. Rationing gasoline and saving tires is going to make it impossible to do much driving, and the men have got to be near their work.

You want to know if I remember Tom Lyon? Why of course I do. He was a good fellow, sure he was. He had a brother Dick who was a good singer, I guess he was, but I didn't know him so well.

There were a number of pretty good fellows around here when we first came to Decatur in April, 1870. I can remember some of them and you probably remember them, too. There was Harry and Walter Hodges, two boys, brothers, William Hodges' boys, and there was Harry and Millard Russell. They were two good boys, too, they sure were. There were some more of them, but it takes quite a little thinking to bring them all back in your memory.

Yes, my father came here in '69. His name was Henry Brown. He was born in 1818 in the town of Plainfield, 11 miles the other side of Rochester, New York, and Tom Burke was born in the same place, so he said. There was a pretty smart fellow, too.

My father's family moved onto a farm near Chagrin Falls and father got married there. Father started out on a prospecting trip all by himself. He went down through Missouri and all around, and when he came back he stopped here, and stayed.

He bought 5 acres of Ben Lee right at the bend in the road northeast of town. He paid Ben $500 for it, and there wasn't a building on it. He got Frobenius, who lived north of town, to build the house, and old man McCormick who came from old Virginia, did the mason work.

I had 3 sisters. One of them was a musician and the other two were dress makers. They got established in the town of Fenton and mother decided to stay there with them, so I came out here alone to live with father. That was in April, 1870, and I lived here till I went to Kalamazoo in 1910. We were there 27 years, and then the old home town looked so good to us that he decided to come back.

Father was always doing unusual things, and he cut two big lions out of plank, painted them and fastened them to the fence on either side of the gate. Then he made an eagle and put it over the gate. That made our house a marked place in town.

Well, I guess I'll go now.

MEMORIES OF A CHILDHOOD HOME

From Rev. LeRoy L. Dewey

Sturgis, Michigan,
December 10, 1942.

My dear Arba,

The news of the burning of our old farm home and my birthplace as recorded in this week's issue of your splendid paper came to me as a severe and saddening shock.

It was in no sense a pretentious house but around it clustered many happy memories of our joyous early home life. There I was born. That was no great event of course. In fact, I guess it was evidently not a great event even in the home circle for, in father's diary, there is the simple, unemotional and unenthusiastic statement "boy born to-day." But anyway I am glad I was born and I am not at all ashamed to have been born in a humble place such as that was. It was a shrine,—a shrine to no one else, of course, but a simple shrine to me, where I always went every time I have visited Decatur, and there recalled again the times that were, and the simple things that made life so full and so happy in my early boyhood days.

I well remember a Sunday of my boyhood when some man who was driving by, seeing smoke coming from the roof, rushed into the door and shouted "your house is on fire." We all jumped from the table where we were eating our Sunday dinner and out to see about it. My sister Vedith grabbed the bird cage and hurried out the door. She was going to save the bird anyway. A spark had lodged in the bell frame atop the wood shed and the frame was ablaze but father soon had it out, so we saved not only the bird in the gilded cage but the house as well.

It was there in my early childhood that I seemed to get my first inspiration to be a preacher, for I can remember preaching to my sisters out there in that, what was then glorious yard west and north of the house.

I may have made a mistake in being a preacher but evidently the idea was embryonic in my brain at rather an early age as set on the old farm which I have oftimes wished I owned.

Are we getting old when we like to think of the glorious days of yesteryear? Well perhaps, but anyway memory is a great and happy blessing. So, as my memory reaches back to those early years of my life, to the sheep washing and sheep shearing days, the threshing days, the hog butchering days, the school days with the daily lunches prepared by Mother's loving hands, the skating, the sledding, the truly "white Christmases" and the "sleigh bells in the snow" and all, without telephone or electricity or gas or automobile or radio or much of anything that modernity dictates as necessities, I am really deeply saddened at the passing of the plain and very simple center of all of that happy life some fifty and more years ago.

I was delighted to have Clare Barron and Camilla Potts, as I knew them in our school days together, in our service one Sunday last fall. It was a real reunion and a happy event. I wish some more of the Decatur friends would drift over this way as Jay and Maude Lyle did also one Sunday last summer. But I suppose gas and tire rationing will prohibit that for a while, at least.

We pray that this terrible war may soon cease and that real peace may be established in the earth, and as a permanent world possession.

Our son George is S/Sgt. in the Air Force Gunnery School at Las Vegas, Nevada, where he has been ever since his induction a year ago last July. He received his Master's degree in Journalism the June before his induction and is now in the Public Relations Office, editor of the Camp paper, "The Horned Toad," and also script writer for their weekly Camp broadcasts. He is a busy young man but likes it.

Well, forgive me for this lengthy reminiscence and treatise.

Merry Christmas to you.

Sincerely, LeRoy.

History of The First Presbyterian Church

By Danny (D. W.) Brodhead

The First Presbyterian Church was built and dedicated in 1868, Nearpass and Bray were the builders. Its ground area about 45 x 75 feet.

For many years, thirty or more, it was surmounted by a tall, tin-covered spire. Once, so the story goes, a little boy asked his mother if that was God's toothpick.

Some years ago the spire was supplanted by the present belfry.

An immense gathering of people attended the ceremony of laying the corner stone when the building was completed and they were very impressive. Rev. Toof was the pastor.

Deposited in the corner stone were several papers, two or three coins and a new testament.

Two years ago when the basement was excavated the corner stone was removed, the enclosures were examined and then replaced under another stone and were inclosed in a tin can. The coins were black and coated. The papers stained, yellowed and too rotten to be unfolded. The only word made out in them was the signature "Blackman," who was the editor of the Republican.

As I remember there were three papers, a history of the village, a history of the church. The third might have been the contributors to the building fund.

I remember Robt. Nesbitt contributed $100.00. I remember that distinctly as I heard the conversation between Hon. E. P.Hill and Mr. Nesbitt. When asked by Mr. Hill for some aid Mr. Nesbitt asked why he should contribute to the church. "You know it don't represent my religious ideas, I never attend your services, and no doubt I would not be very welcome if I did." Mr. Hill assured him he would be welcomed, and he should help for the general good of the community.

"Mr. Hill, how much do you think I ought to give?"

Mr. Hill replied, "$100.00."

After a moment's reflection Mr. Nesbitt said, "All right, Mr. Hill, make it $100.00."

The church was built larger than was necessary at the time as it was not only the hope and ambition but the expectation that Decatur would soon be the largest town between Niles and Kalamazoo. Some of the leading men were optimistic that Decatur would outstrip even those towns.

Decatur was the best and largest wheat market on the line and was the market for an immense amount of timber products, wool, fruit and livestock. They could not foresee that in a few years we would be sandwiched between two lines of railroad and our trading area more than cut in two.

Many minor changes, refinements and improvements have taken place in the church during its nearly half century of usefulness. The windows were changed, some years ago a grand pipe organ was installed and just recently the basement was excavated and a banquet hall put in with all accessories, as kitchen, dishes, silverware, tables, seats, etc. An ideal heating plant was installed consisting of two large furnaces, their equipment costing over $600. The entire insurance carried on building and contents was $4,000.

And thus another landmark of pioneer days, along with the sturdy pioneers, devoted men and women, who made the church a reality, has gone into history. All that remains is a memory, precious to most of us in association and retrospect. Its history and activities are closely entwined with the thoughts and lives of many of us and it will be good to think that though the church has gone its influence still lives to all eternity. D. W. Major H. H. Creagan Writes Interesting Letter To Firemen

BOYS IN SERVICE

(The Republican is indebted to the Firemen for the privilege of printing this splendid letter from Major Creagan. It was received by the Chief and read in Firemen's regular meeting last week.)

Office Depot Quartermaster
Columbus, Ohio.

December 15, 1942.

Dear Chief and all the boys,

It has been a long time since I wrote and longer still since I answered roll call back there. I have enjoyed your letters, everyone, and hope there will be more. The letters in the Decatur paper are sure interesting and the boys are scattered to the far corners of the earth and many others are on board ship in strange waters. I was fortunate in being assigned to duty so near home as I have been able to get back quite often. Have to spend about fourteen hours on the train and car to Decatur so it breaks up a week-end leave.

A short time ago I was sent down in Kentucky on duty and then on to Evansville, Indiana. Had a good trip and enjoyed the city of Louisville. After coming back had to make a trip to Detroit and that was too close to Decatur to miss coming home so took advantage of it.

The work down here is increasing all the time. We handled over fifty-five hundred car loads of supplies last month. Lots of supplies come and go by truck in addition to railroad car loads. I am still Depot Quartermaster and operate central receiving station for supplies. All cars, trucks, cranes, tractors, and locomotives are on my accountability and I am responsible for their maintenance and operation.

A new steam locomotive of the eighty ton class is on its way in here for yard work. We got a hundred-twenty ton Diesel last summer and it has been a big help in handling all the freight. It takes a lot of coal to keep this place going. The coal is another one of my headaches. I had five thousand tons of coal in three piles last fall and the piles were bound to catch fire from spontaneous combustion. All you can do is move the coal and get at the fire and put it out. It doesn't do any good to soak the coal pile with water. Have burned up most of the coal now so no more danger.

About two weeks ago I moved from the Army Country Club to new bachelor quarters. A nice new steam heated building with small room for each officer. It is well located and a nice place to live. Sure beats those elephants iron huts that some of our officers on this post are living in. Have heard from Tom Elliott a few times and wrote to him Sunday. Had a card from Dick Schonbok this week also had a letter from Fausto, the mail carrier. He is in the Navy, a Marine Engineer and on the Western coast. Believe he is a graduate of engineer school.

When I think of all the boys from Decatur who are in the service, I am reminded of lines written by Cardinal Gibbons many years ago and which carry a message that is extremely timely today.

"You will know it is great and grand to serve your country. Yes, and if the sacrifice is asked you will realize that it is a glorious thing to die for this country. Remember, that to you belongs an honor than which there is none greater on this earth, the serving of the grandest land in all the world. Pray and put your trust in God; be obedient, for without obedience to lawful authority, to commander and other officers, victory is impossible; help your fellow soldiers in times of fighting and in times of respite from the battlefield; lead clean lives as befit men found worthy to serve such a noble cause. Be men of courage, place your faith in God and then go out and fight valiently against the foe."

I know the Decatur boys will turn in a good record wherever they are. Things look much better now and surely hope they continue to improve.

With best wishes to all, Herb.

A Biblical Curiosity

Noah's Diary After the Deluge —Where Will You Find it?

By Bessie Fhurman, 813 Washington Avenue, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Noah's Diary After the Flood

Genesis I:1. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

That the beginning verse quoted above was a quotation from the account of creation written by the author who referred to God as "Lord God' is seen when we read Chapter II:4: "These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens."

Therefore that verse does not signify that the author of Chapter I is actually going to describe the creation of the world, but here is evidently a situation that reminds him of the description of creation, so he puts it down as an appropriate thought for the occasion at hand. The picture that is given in verse 2 of Chapter I is quite obviously similar to that one would imagine as having been true in "the beginning." However it does not necessarily follow that verse 2 was concerning the creation of the world, so we quote that word picture in verse 2 to bring it to mind to the reader.

"And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

Knowing that Noah had experienced a flood that overtopped the mountains, it is no assumption that "the earth was without form and void" and that darkness was upon the face of the waters" when he looked out of the ark. And that he did one may be certain for when he opened the window to let out the raven and the dove, he must have had a glimpse of just such a picture. The electrical phenomena known as St. Elmo's fire must have seemed to Noah as the Spirit of God moving on the waters.

Thus, it seems that verse 2 of Chapter I had no connection with the original creation but was a clear picture of Noah's view of the situation after the rain had ceased.

Then as light that had been missing through all those 40 days and nights of terrific downpour and surge of rising waters appeared, he attributed it to God's command just as he had done, when he received the admonitions to build the ark. And as the night also came, he credited it to God's command. But the combined unit made up of night and day, he himself called day. "And the evening and the morning were the first day."

The observations concerning the firmament marked the second day as did also those of the separation of the waters into seas and the appearance of the land areas.

The third day records the appearance of grass, herb and fruit trees—all of which could have been true in Noah's case for we know there was the olive tree (a fruit tree) because the dove returned with an olive leaf in her mouth after Noah sent her out to reconnoiter. But it could not have been true at the beginning of the world, for fruit trees are highly developed plants and did not appear on the earth until just previous to the arrival of the mammals—many eras after the "beginning."

The fourth day records an event, not a mere fact as we who are accustomed to see the sun, moon and stars would think, when we see them, for as we shall find the sun, moon and stars had never been seen before the flood and certainly not during it.

And that this is true must be shown before going on with the story.

Why The Sun, Moon and Stars Appeared To Be Creations After The Flood

Turning to Chapter II:5-6, we learn that it had not rained on the earth but in verse 6 "there went up a mist from the earth and watered the whole face of the earth."

As this was a part of the account of the story of Adam and Eve and the Garden of Eden, it is possible that that condition did not prevail until the time of Noah, but when we turn to Chapter IX and learn that God gave the rainbow then, it is certain that there had been no rain and no sun or there would have been rainbows before the flood and therefore it could not have been used as a token or promise of no more floods. For had it appeared before the flood its significance as such a promise would have been lost, for those who would have seen it before the flood could have said, "O, I saw rainbows before the deluge and now that we have had the flood, the rainbow is no sign that we'll never have another such occasion."

So it is apparent that the rainbow was a new phenomenon to Noah, when he wrote about it, and that being true the sun had never shone clearly enough to be seen as an object. And that the moon had not been seen either is seen by the fact that both sun and moon were "two great lights—the greater to rule the day and the lesser to rule the night" and one is no more novel than the other. Had he been accustomed to seeing the sun as an object giving light the sudden appearance of the moon which had not been seen before (as we shall show) would have come in for some special mention, it would seem. But it doesn't. It is just one of a pair of great light bodies that appeared on the same day as did also the stars which he seems to have added as an after thought or which may not have shown until later.

Therefore, the appearance of both sun and moon were as twin events and impressed Noah as if they had just that day come from the hand of God. So no wonder that the notation was considered important enough to mark the fourth day of that great new year of 601. The further recording of the facts that those lights were to be for signs and seasons, days and years may have been inserted later when the seasons resulted from the tipping of the earth's axis, and in making this additional notation, it is possible that the records got disarranged then. But, we know that if this is the diary of Noah, the seasons did not begin until after the flood. And if we know that the seasons caused by the inclination of the earth on its axis did not occur until after the flood, the earth had not tipped on its axis 23½ degrees before that event. From this it is apparent that something occurred that caused that change, and that sometime just previous to or during the time of the flood.

The Creation of the Moon Cause of Flood, Glacial Age, and Distribution of Coal Mines

Although a series of events took place in connection with the creation of the moon and the flood, that would fill many pages if written up in detail, a brief and comprehensive presentation of the situation can be given.

In the first place look at the shattered jig-saw puzzle appearance of the world map. Now look at the great circular bodies of water of the Gulf of Mexico and Hudson Bay as well as the Arctic ocean and see that they resemble crater-like openings into the earth's surface. Besides, notice the huge saucer-like depression that the lands around them show, thereby indicating a loss of the earth's contents beneath. Also, recall that mines of various kinds of ores are located around these centers and one must conclude that those bodies of water are now filling huge volcanic craters.

Then see how nicely the Eastern and Western Hemispheres fit together along their Atlantic sides, and it is seen that a belt of land once spanned the globe, but a part is missing now as shown by the broken edges and the great gap between North America and Asia. But we know that there is a great trough in the floor of the Pacific ocean that shows that the earth split along one side. Then we find that the earth was put to a great strain of unequal weight, or that would not have occurred.

The unequal weight of the two hemispheres is seen by the greater land mass being in the Eastern hemisphere. So it is clear that a great deal of the earth's volume was lost or the unbalancing of the earth would not have been brought about. So we conclude that great explosions— either those cited or one still greater—made the earth shift its land to new positions and locations. If it did such a gigantic task as that, it must have had to gyrate to a different position. Being a gyroscope it could do that and now let us see if it did.

To find this out we must see if the equator and poles are still in the same location. To learn this we look up all the known coal regions of the world, for we know that coal was formed from tropical forests. Therefore the coal mines should be along the equator. So we fit the sig-saw map of the world together and find that instead of the coal regions being along the present tropical belt, they were along the 90 degree meridian and extended on each side of the globe.

Thus, the world had changed its position. It had gyrated to a new angle and this in order to maintain its equilibrium. But with the unequal land mass of the two hemispheres it inclined on its axis 23½ degrees.

Since the earth had to gain or lose weight in order to gyrate to a new position, we look again at the world map and find that a large area of land belt is missing on the Pacific area. Judging the volume in proportion to the approximate area that was lost, it is seen that here was the possible cause of the gyration of the globe. But we do not know whether the weight of the lost portion was sufficient to cause that result. But we do know that if the portion missing was blown out by an explosion powerful enough to carry it beyond [illegible] of gravity to pull it back The moon is the only body large enough to correspond with the volume missing that is out there. So, the moon must be the missing part of the globe that when it left the earth caused the earth to gyrate and to incline on its axis and in turn brought about the seasons. And that being true the crater made by the moon was deep enough to reach the intensely heated interior of the earth there by providing a mighty caldron of heated water and vapor which in turn caused a mighty rain for 40 days and the over turning of the earth, and changing the tropical regions to polar ones caused the glacial age. The former polar ice fields being then placed in tropical heat, moved away as icebergs until one reached Canada by way of the Pacific, another by way of the Atlantic to Labrador. Both of them were preceded by the ice sheet that formed over Canada when the polar cold began. As that ice field melted it was succeeded by the two glaciers that had moved onto Canada and had been stalled by the polar ice fields. As those two moved south ward and disappeared, the snow and ice held back by them in turn moved southward and melted away. Thus seemingly four glacial periods resulted from the creation of the moon and the flood.

So when Noah recorded the advent of the "two great lights" and that they should be for signs and seasons, days and years, he did not know that that "lesser light" had been the cause of the flood, glacial periods and well distributed coal mines.

In his notations for the fifth and sixth days he reports "great whales" in the sea and cattle on land. All the animals were mammals with the exception of the fowl and creeping things, probably lizards or serpents.

So we see that of the fifth and sixth days, were a geological period it was that of mammals, the very last of all the geological eras and therefore not the beginning of creation.

Then when he had completed his notations concerning the animals which had seemingly reminded him all along of the story of creation, he ends his sixth days notation with what seems to have been a quotation from his reading about creation for it is not only given here but also in verses 6 and 7 of Chapter IX, as if it were a favorite of his. "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

He continues this quotation as if it were a prayer or hope that God would bless him and his family as He had done the first couple.

Then in Chapter IX God did bless Noah and his sons and the verses 1-4 are almost perfect duplication of the words just cited as Noah's quotation from his reading of Creation. Thus it seems to be an answer to his hopes or prayer that he had expressed through his quotations in verses 28-30 of Chapter I.

Thus God's blessing and gift of all that the land and waters provided and the appearance of the rainbow as God's covenant with Noah that there should never be another world flood made the day a blessed and sanctified one.

Hence, it must have been the seventh day of his diary for he said, verse 3, Chapter II, "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it He had rested from all his work which God had created and made.

Thus by combining Chapter IX with Chapter I and just preceding verses 2 and 3 of Chapter II we have the rest of Noah's diary of the first week of the New Year after the flood. And what a wonderful and beautiful day it must have been—that first Sabbath. Sunshine clear and bright such as they had never known before when mists prevailed, and a rainbow so lovely and mysterious and a promise from God—all in one, and God's blessing on him and his sons and that day for rest and a memorial to God.

So having re-assembled the following passages Gen. Chapter VIII: 13 to Chapter I, skip to Chapter IX, 1 to 18 then back to Chapter II: 2-3. We have what seems to me to be Noah's masterpiece—a diary of one of the greatest weeks in all history.

These, with many others, such as Frank Stapleton, the man who put Decatur township on the good road program (although a slightly belligerent Democrat) still make up Decatur as is.

Chicago Pearson Pioneers

The Father and Mother of Ingeborn Pearson Olson were born in Norway in 1775, but came to Chicago in the early years of Chicago's history. When they died they were buried in what is now Lincoln Park, at North Ave., as my Uncle Iver Olson related to me in 1890. Iver Olson told me he got a letter from the Cemetery Association to come and help take up the remains of his Grand-Parents, and see where they will be buried in Graceland Cemetery. That letter he had received before our Civil War.

My father, A. S. Olson, his brothers Iver and Elias, (children) all less than 4 years, arrived in Chicago with their mother in 1841. Her name was Ingeborn Olson, a daughter of the Pearson pioneers who came here in the 30's. She was born in Norway in 1800, came here to Chicago because her parents were here with her three boys to support; their father had died in Norway. They lived at the Chicago Loop district. At times there was no water in the Chicago River and my Uncle Iver told me they played in the sand as he often recalled.

Iver, when a young man, told some friends one day he had bought some lots at Clark Street and Division. They told him it was too far out. He helped to build the first railroad out of Chicago, 10 x 12 inch timber, 16 feet long was the rail with a strap iron on top.

My father, A. S. Olson, when married worked in a chair factory.

My sister, Albertina Ayers, was born in 1861, I in 1864.

As the Civil War ended in April, 1865, father moved out of Chicago to the Prairies, 15 miles southwest of Kankakee City. No roads. Bottomland at $8.00 per acre; nearest neighborhood then was 5 miles. No roads, flocks of deer at our Prairie home, all night feeding at our haystacks, when the snow at times was 3 feet deep, and no feed for the deer.

When I war 5 or 6 years old, I well remember a neighbor plowing with 3 yoke of oxen.

Father started a colony there and year by year quite a lot of friends and relatives located on the rich soil in the Mississippi Valley.

Richard Duckworth, a slim, firm man served his country for four years in the Rebellion, bought an 80 at our corner. He built a 20 x 20 foot 2-story building—hogs, cows and horses were on the first floor; dining room and kitchen on second floor His Christian spirit was a Godsend to the neighborhood and his honesty in dealing with the farmers.

His farm soon proved to be a market center, for all kind of stock, which he bought. He built a house fitted to the plans of a lovely girl in the neighborhood whom he married. A boy was born, then later twin boys,—those boys unnamed for a long time. No name lofty enough for the occasion, so the names finally came—Peter Cooper Duckworth and Samuel Tildon Duckworth.

The father of the boys uppermost in leadership because the richest man in the county leaving a fortune of $500,- bought. He bought corn, oats, hay from the farmers—never sold a bushel or a ton. Had 100 fat cattle, ages from 3 to 4 years old, their weight 1400 to 1800 lbs., then ready for the market. As I earnestly saw them as a boy. He dominated over a great school of agriculture.

My father lived as a pioneer and broke up a wilderness fitted only to the barbarians. His colony and his roadside home still of dear memory, his monument just above the sweet clover tops—will rise to the memory of Albert" and wife Alice Olson, the foremost of the pioneers who settled in the wilderness in April, 1865. I, the youngest of the pioneers, one year three months old.

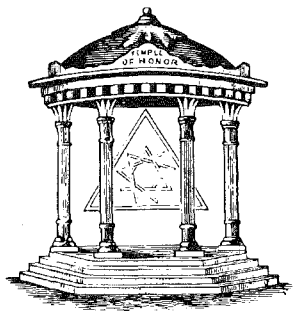
Ingeborn Pearson Olson, mother of A. S. Olson, now seven (7) generations, are scattered far and wide, living and dead. The 7th generation are twin girls, born in 1937, now reside in the state of Missouri. These twins have a distant relationship to Woodrow Wilson (former President) in marriage and blood.

Connecting up with the old Virginia stock of pioneers, who migrated into southwest Missouri in pioneer days, sharing in the agricultural wealth as before the coming of the transportation age, which yielded to the force and memory which made our midwest agricultural empire. A collection yet incomplete as over pioneer days in the success or failure of the adventure of mankind, will it be able to obtain in the economic life of the far-reaching question of how far our civilization will be able to march over the country-side in the struggle to strike down world autocracy.

Children of A. S. Olson and Alice Johnson Olson, are a daughter Albertina Ayers, sons are Henry E. (Elmer J., deceased), George A., and John P. Olson.

Compiled by Henry E. Olson, Chicago lawyer and historian, being the sixth generation of the Pearson pioneers.



THE ORDER OF EASTERN STAR

The Organizing of New Star Chapter No. 333, and a Few of the Happenings Since the Organization In the Old Masonic Hall Located Over the Carney Drug Store.

By Minnie C. Mosier, a Charter Member.

In the year 1904—38 years ago—a man named Ellsworth, better known as Charlie, came to Decatur to live. He was a good Mason and did love his lodge. The members of the F. and A. M. Lodge No. 99 at that time were all elderly men excepting one Charlie whose surname was Dine. He was master of the lodge and he longed for the companionship of some members of his own age. They therefore did conceive the idea of organizing an Eastern Star Chapter thereby interesting more of the younger men in Masonry, for the young ladies of Decatur wanted to be Stars, so, of course influenced their husbands and brothers to join the Masons.

The two men visited the families of the Masons and secured names enough and more than enough of those who were eligible to become members of an O. E. S. Chapter.

In the spring on the 19th day of April of 1904, the Worthy Grand Matron, Mrs. Mary Tubbs and Worthy Grand Patron, Lewis C. Goodrich, and thirty members of the Lawton Chapter came to Decatur to organize and install the officers who had been selected to fill the offices until the annual meeting. Thirty-two of those who wished to become members formed a half-circle around the altar and repeated the obligation after the Worthy Grand Patron. Then the Lawton Chapter went through the order of business and the initiation ceremony for the instruction of the new members. New Star Chapter No. 333 was declared duly organized to meet each month on the first Tuesday after the full of the moon. All retired to Stewarts Hall for a banquet. The members of Lawton Chapter returned to their home town by train about 12:30 in the morning.

In the fall of 1904 the same officers were elected to fill the stations. Sister Sherrod, W. M.; Brother Roberts, W. P. In December 1904 W. G. M. Mrs. Moore and A. G. M. Mrs. Emma Ocobock and members of the O. E. S. of Lawton and Dowagiac came to install the new officers. After the initiation of Mrs. Maude Hughes and Mrs. Fannie Thomas, refreshments were served and enjoyed by all.

During those first years there was a great deal of work to do but it was a labor of love as we were in need of many things in that old Lodge room. On the floor was an old bright red patched ingrain carpet. The pattern was of the Masonic emblems. In the southwest corner of the room was a Beckwith stove. The officers would meet in their homes for practice so as to save fuel and kerosene oil lights.

We worked to earn the money for the chairs for our Worthy Patron and points of our Star, and when it came time to entertain for our first county meeting the chairs for our officers and the Charter had to be moved from the third floor of the Carney building to our old Town Hall in order to have room for our guests. Soon after that it was decided by our Masons to hold a social meeting for the Eastern Star members and husbands, and Masons and wives. This meeting with a banquet was held in the Odd Fellows Hall for the purpose of planning the building and the furnishings of the room we occupy today.

When we had our Charter Member night about 25 years ago, it was recorded that we had about 152 members. Now some have other homes; some have withdrawn for different reasons; and others have gone to that city not made with hands, but they left a pleasant memory of their words of council and their cheerful help in every good work connected with the Chapter.

In the trying months to come our Chapter may feel quite disturbed. But our's is an Order that should stand as a light upon a nation's hill, a voice forbidding all that is ill; an inspiration in the land, a source of strength for all that's good, in Justice, Love, and Brotherhood.

THREE OLD TIMERS

Three fellow townsmen called at the Republican office at the same time last Friday morning. They were Fred Stern, 84 last July; Newell Phelps, who was 83 December 29, and Walter Brown, who will be 83 January 22. They are all old time residents of Decatur and community.

Fred Stern renewed his subscription to the Republican and said he had taken it 53 years. Andy Johnson was the editor when he began. We would like to know if the Republican has a subscriber who has taken the paper for a longer time.

Mr. Stern visited his brother in Chicago in the fall. The brother came over from Germany three years ago and he told our townsman some inside causes which led to the breaking out of this second World War which he will give to the Republican later.

Mr. and Mrs. Newell Phelps gave a new Year's dinner in honor of the "Old Gang"— Hamilton township neighbors for many years. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Murl Abrams, Mr. and Mrs. Earnie Osborn, son Clayton, and son Donald and wife. It was a potluck dinner and a good one.

The Old Gang lived in the Bell district, and Mr. Phelps brought out the first school district record which he has kept for many years. He was director there three terms.

The Bell school was built in the fall of 1869 and this record was begun that same year.

Mrs. Abrams' mother, Ophelia Copley, and Mrs. Beulah Hemenway's mother, Jennie Perry, and Percy Nash, now Mrs. Seymour of Bangor, all taught there during the seventies.

May Duffin was the first teacher, in 1869, and Newell Phelps went to school to her. The ruling wage paid during the seventies was $40 a month.

Decatur's Young Orator

Olivet, Mich., March 11.—The man whose name is in everybody's mouth at Olivet today is Charles H. Mahoney, a colored student from Decatur, who Friday night delivered an oration on, "The Negro, a Man."

He is a member of the Junior class of the Adelphic Society, and his was the closing oration of the Adelphic public program.

Mahoney is a fine athlete, popular among his fellows, and one of Olivet's brightest men. His oration showed the difficulties under which the Negro labors, the injustice done him by his white brother, and the results which must inevitably come if the present atitude is not changed.

Old professors say his speech was the finest ever given by a student here. Mahoney graduates in 1908, and although his future work is undecided, he will probably devote his life to the interests of his race.

The above dispatch and a picture of Charlie Mahoney was in the Detroit News Tuesday morning. Supt. Hungerford was present at the meeting and says the oration was one of the finest he ever heard.

Mr. and Mrs. Barney Mahoney are justly proud of their son, as are his many Decatur friends.

EARLY DAYS OF M. C. R. R.

Charter Was Secured June 29, 1832, and Took 16 Years to Year Reach Dowaglac

The Michigan Investor says the Michigan Central was chartered June 29, 1832, under the name of tne Detroit & St. Joseph railroad. Six years later, February 3, 1838, the road was opened for traffic to Ypsilanti, and an excursion was run from De roit. On the return trip the engine gave out, and, as the road had but one engine, teams were procured to draw the train back to Detroit.

In 1839 the freight receip s averaged upwards of $300 per day, and it took until 1846 to complete the the road to Kalamazoo. In the latter part of that year the state, having expended $1,954,308 28, on the road, sold the road to a corporation for $2,000,000, and it required six years of further struggle to reach Chicago.

In fact, it took the road many years longer than that. The original charter called for the road to reach some point on the lake, and the state intended to go to St. Joe. When the company bought it they deflected to New Buffalo, their objective point being Chicago, but when they reached Michigan City they found the Michigan Southern strong enough with the legislature to keep them from getting a a charter from tne state of Indiana and it was years before they finally did get one. They went into Chicago upon leased lines in the meantime.

EARLY DAYS OF LITTLE PRAIRIE RONDE

This is a welcome letter from Miss Laura N. Morris, daughter of Amos Morris and probably the oldest living former resident of Little Prairie Ronde. Miss Morris attained her 87th birthday the 16th of September. She was a sister of the late Mrs. Grace Vining Lisk and aunt of Mrs. Laura Vining Coleman to whom she refers.

Miss Morris' personal recollections of Little Prairie Ronde go back to the sixties and it will please the Republican as well as her many old time friends if she can spend more of her time in setting them down for the paper.

Hartford, September 21, 1942.

Kind sir,

I was much pleased with the nice writeup you had about my father's cane. I had kept track of it all these years since 1893 when he passed away.

Once when Laura was here she asked if I did not think it best to let you have it. I did not know who would care for it, and I told her yes, if she thought you would care for it. I am pleased it went to some one who will keep it.

I am going to write about someone's mistake. A lady wrote about the school house in Charleston, and said it was a church. That is where she made a mistake. The schoolhouse was often used for church services. I attended school there one summer when Miss Emma Hathaway was the teacher. She taught two summers. She was Benjamin Hathaway's youngest sister.

I think among the pupils was a little girl named Jannie. I remember Jannie as her father was poisoned when the Vigilantes were after horse-thieves on the Aunt Betsy Charles place, known then as the Greenman place.

Please overlook mistakes.

Laura N. Morris.

An Algonquin Legend

By Lowell W. Mattox

(500 years before Columbus came to America, the story goes, an Indian prophet traveled from tribe to tribe begging the warriors to cease to fight and unite against a new foe. He spoke these words, "Out of the rising sun shall come a great white monster who will devour the land. His words passed unheeded, but time has proved his prophecy true.)

This is an old, old story told to me
by the southern breeze,
As I sat on a lonely hill top and gazed down at the scarlet trees,
And the purple maze of autumn rose like a camp fire's breath
To tell of an Indian prophet, a lonely
Indian prophet, a tale of his life and death.

He traveled afar in the forest and out on the prairie so drear:
Traveled from village to village and begged them his message to hear.
Dressed in white garments of buckskin white was the wampum he wore,
And white were the plumes in his headdress, the snow white plumes in his headdress, to tell of the message he bore.

Go bury your hatchet, my brothers, and let all their strife be done.
A terrible white foe is coming from out of the rising sun,
Bringing a deadly sickness and weapons
that rumble and roar,
Like the voice of the echoing thunder,
the terrible lightning and thunder, coming in goodly number to drive
you back from the shore.

Loud they scoffed at his warning and laughed at the camp fire side,
And his hair grew white like the snow drifts, and he laid him down and died.
But the Gitchi Manito spoke to him from his throne in the sky so blue,
And he spoke in a voice of thunder, in a voice of the rolling thunder—and told of his judgment true.

Long have you carried my message and suffered privation and grief;
So you shall come back in the autumn
in the moon of the falling leaf.
And the smoke from your burning peace pipe shall descend to the valleys low,
To carry your peaceful message thru the vale of the Old St. Joe.

Now the Redman is broken and scattered, like a wind swept autumn leaf,
And the war cry brings no longer its message of terror and grief;
For Redman and Whiteman are fighting together the common foe,
Down in the tropic islands, the wind swept tropical islands, fighting again for freedom as he once did long ago.

Gazing down at the winding river and its curtain of smokey haze,
I thought I could see this prophet who lived in the old, old days,
Smoking his red stone pipe—with his smoking and ever hoping for the message of love and peace,
In the month of dreamy October, in the scarlet and golden October—
Smoking and ever hoping for the days when wars shall cease.

Battling For Legacy In Chicago Court

Will of Muirl Klinger Howe Being Contested by Her Half Sister.

A battle of lawyers is waging in Chicago over the property of Muirl Klinger Howe, for many years a resident of Decatur.

Muirl died in Chicago in 1939 leaving a sizeable property variously estimated at from $30,000 to $50,000. She died a slow hard death of cancer, and a short time before it became necessary to remove her to a hospital, she willed her property to her landlord.

Her only near relative was a half sister, Opal Klinger Bridges, who is attempting to break the will.

Muirl's mother was Delia Howe Klinger White and her father was John Klinger. They were brought up on Little Prairie Ronde and were married in Cassopolis in 1877, when Delia was 17. John was working for Henry Morris at the time of the Morris murder in 1879.

They went north to the little village of Sand Lake in Kent county in the early eighties and a few years later Delia with her little daughter Muirl came back to Decatur.

John Klinger never came back to this community and the records show that he was married to Alice Stocking at Petoskey in 1887. Alice obtained a divorce from Klinger in 1899 and died in 1939. Opal was their only child.

Delia was married to Frank (Deacon) White at Cassopolis in 1888, and they lived contentedly together in Decatur until her death in 1936.

The attorneys can find no record of a divorce obtained by either John or Delia Klinger, and the outcome of Opal's suit depends in large part on her obtaining this record.

Two weeks ago J. B. Meyerling, representing the attorneys for the beneficiary in the will, made the trip north to Petoskey and Kent and came on to Cass and Van Buren counties, in an effort to find a record of the divorce.

His mission was not successful. He spent a day in Decatur interviewing old timers who might give him definite information, but none of them could. There are only a few left who can go back in personal recollections of Little Prairie Ronde 50 to 60 years ago, and there being no record it is quite evident that the divorce was not obtained in either Cass or Van Buren counties.

Last Friday Herbert G. Bantz, representing the attorneys for Opal, covered the territory to northern Michigan and back, and arrived in Decatur. He was seeking the same information and was likewise unsuccessful.

John Klinger, who was something of a rover, might have obtained the divorce in any county or state, and the record would be almost impossible to find.

Both investigators were deeply interested in the outcome of the search the first hoping that no divorce record existed and the second that it could be found.

The case is now up for trial the second time in a Chicago court. In the first trial the jury disagreed, 9 of the 12 jurors favoring Opal and 3 opposing her.

Perhaps when the lawyers and the courts have the case fought to a final decision the prize of the victors will not exceed the price of a good dinner.

FIRST FAMILIES OF LITTLE PRAIRIE RONDE

One of the first settlers of 1829 was Samuel Morris who came from Ohio with his wife and six children. He built his home on the east side of Little Prairie Ronde on the finest land of that wonderful prairie. There were three sons and all remained on the prairie except John, who sold his farm and went to Kansas. Levi Lawrence bought this farm which later was the Pollock farm.

Elias Morris, who died a few years since, owned the former Sam Morris estate. The son Dolphin was a very energetic man and he accumulated quite a fortune. Dolphin was a devout Methodist and organized the society which met in Charleston. His farm was a mile long and consisted of 320 acres. Wheat, oats and corn were raised. Wheat brought $3.25 per bushel at that time.

Dolphin and wife were the parents of eleven children. In this family is recorded the greatest tragedy in the history of the prairie when Henry, the 4th son, with his wife were murdered at their home in the year of 1879. Henry Morris and wife were highly respected and the mystery of the object, and cause of the tragedy was never discovered.—F. B. in Marcellus News.

CAME TO HAMILTON IN 1836

H. N. Geer One of the Earliest Settlers in the Township

Henry N. Geer was born in Connecticut, May 8, 1833, and died at the home of his son near Prospect Lake in the township of Lawrence, December 29, 1907, aged 74 years, 7 months and 12 days. He was married May 8, 1861, to Calista Osborn, who died in October, 1901, since which time he has made his home with his children. Their family consisted of three sons and one daughter, all of whom are living, namely: Charles, whose home is in Decatur; Wilton, near Prospect Lake; Mrs. Addie Goble of Decatur, and Elisha of Fargo, North Dakota. He also leaves six grandchildren.

Seven years ago he suffered a stroke of paralysis, since which time his health has been frail. The second and fatal stroke came just one week before his death. He was an industrious citizen, a kind husband and father, and possessed a genial and pleasant disposition.

The funeral was held at the home of his son Wilton, Tuesday afternoon, December 31st, Rev. F. G Varney officiating. The Masonic lodge of Decatur, of which order Mr. Geer was an old and faithful member, attended in a body and conducted the Masonic burial service at the grave. Burial was in Hamilton cemetery.

The passing of this aged friend seems a fitting occasion for a brief backward glance into the pioneer days of the country. He was one of a family of twelve children, of whom Oliver, residing in South Dakota, is the only one living. Their father, Elisha Geer, came from Connecticut and located on section 20 in Hamilton in 1836, one year after the first land entry was made in the town by Robert Nesbitt. Eight years later he sold to Stephen Osborn and removed to section 28, where he carried on the business of coopering, and where he remained until his death.

Two brothers, Prentice and George Geer, came to Hamilton township about the same time. Thus we see that the deceased was identified with the early history of the town and community, and with the exception of a very few years his entire life has been passed in Hamilton. He bore his share of the hardships and privations that fell to the lot of the early settlers, the nature and extent of which we cannot now dwell upon.

A few more years will pass away; a few more times the death message will be sent abroad, and then, of the small number who now recall the scenes and incidents of those early times, none will be left.

LIKE AN IRISHMAN.

An Englishman, traveling in Ireland, stopped to inquire of an Irishman who lived in a certain house they were just passing.

The Irishman replied: "That is Mr. O'Hare's house, and if he had lived until tomorrow he would be one week dead."

WAITING FOR HIM.

"When are you going to fix that front fence, Hiram?" said the farmer's wife.

"Oh, next week, when Silas comes home from college."

"But what will the boy know about fixing a fence, Hiram?"

"He ought to know a heap. He wrote me that he'd been taking fencing lessons for a month!"

Christian Science War Relief Work

The Christian Science War Relief Committee of The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts, which was established in September, 1940, has recently released its second annual report. This shows that it now has more than 1500 branch units active in the United States of America besides many more in Great Britain, Canada, Australia and the Union of South Africa.

The Committee has assembled since Pearl Harbor over 60,000 pounds of durable clothing and bedding, in waterproof, wooden cases, at convenient locations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, ready for instant use should emergencies arise because of local enemy action.

More than 32,000 garments have been distributed, through military distribution centres, to men in the United States forces. A large British transport vessel which had arrived from tropical waters and was being repaired at Boston received 100 overcoats for officers. Folding cots have been given to overcrowded seamen's clubs. Civilians arriving in the United States suffering because of war conditions or action have been provided with clothing and other forms of relief. Among them are refugees from the Far East, who landed in California; and merchant seamen rescued from ships torpedoed along the Atlantic coast have been similarly cared for. This work is carried on by the Committee without regard to creed or race.

One of the most impressive branches of the work from the start, before America entered the war, has been the distribution of clothing and comforts to bombed-out people in Great Britain and to refugees from Holland, Norway, Russia, Poland, Belgium and other European countries. Clothing has gone direct from Boston to Russia, and knitted goods have been sent there from branches of the Committee in England. One example is the preparation, within six weeks, of 1820 knitted garments for the Russians. Overseas workers have won the commendation and co-operation of local authorities by their prompt arrival on the scene of trouble. In cities heavily bombed, such as Plymouth, Coventry, Bristol, and Southampton, they have got there with food and clothing, ready to go to work, even before the "All Clear" sounded.

THE GYPSY'S WARNING

(Copied for Republican readers by Nellie Truesdell.)

Do not trust him gentle lady,
Though his voice be low and sweet;
Heed not him who kneels before thee,
Gently pleading at thy feet;
Now thy life is in its morning,
Cloud not this thy happy lot;
Listen to the gypsy's warning,'
Gentle lady trust him not.

Do not turn so coldly from me,
I would only guard thy youth
From his stern and withering power,
I would only tell the truth,
I would shield thee from all danger,
Save thee from the tempter's snare;
Lady shun that dark eyed stranger,
I have warned thee—now beware.

Lady once there lived a maiden,
Pure and bright and like thee fair,
But he wooed and wooed and won her,
Filled her gentle heart with care;
Then he heeded not her weeping
Nor cared he her life to save.
Soon she perished, now she's sleeping
In the cold and silent grave.

Keep the gold, I do not wish it,
Lady I have prayed for this,
For the hour when I might foil him,
Rob him of expected bliss;
Gentle lady do not wonder
At my words so cold and wild,
Lady, in that green grave yonder
Lies the gypsy's only child.

ANSWER TO GYPSY'S WARNING

Lady do not listen to her,
Trust me, thou shalt find me true,
Constant as the dews of evening
I will ever be to you;
Lady I will not deceive thee,
Fill thy tender heart with woe,
Trust me lady and believe me,
Sorrow thou shalt never know.

Down beside the flowing river,
Where the dark green willow weeps,
Where the leafy branches quiver,
There a gentle maiden sleeps.
At early morn a lonely stranger
Goes and lingers many hours;
Lady, he's no heartless stranger,
For he strews her grave with flowers.

Lady do not heed her warning,
Place thy soft white hand in mine,
For I ask no fairer laurels
Than the constant love of thine.
When the silver moonbeams brighten
Thou shalt slumber on my breast,
Tender words thy soul shall lighten,
Lull thy spirit into rest.

THE LADY'S REPLY

Down beside the flowing river,
Where the willows bend and weep,
Where the leafy branches quiver,
Stranger, why this vigil keep?
Why go there alone and early Morning flowers there to strew?
Did you love in truth so dearly?
Do you mourn as others do?

Stranger I've been thinking sadly,
How she's in her cold grave sleeping,
Innocent her love, who gladly
Heard fair words, built hopes thereon;
How you promised, wooed and won
By the river's moaning wave,
How the willows now are weeping
O'er the maiden's early grave.

Stranger I will heed the warning,
Coming from that river-side:
Flowers you strew there in the morning
I'll replace at even-tide.
And we'll walk no more together;
For the gypsy tells me true,
Mourns her child in tears that smother
Every kindly thought of you.

The Passing of Mrs. Henry Byers

The last member of the family of the first couple married in Van Buren county died in Tacoma, Washington, at the age of 90 years, 2 months and 22 days.

Nancy Clarinda Byers, daughter of Elija and Eliza Goble, was born in Charleston, Little Prairie Ronde. She was named for her maternal grandmother, Nancy Morris Tittle, sister of Dolphin Morris, the first white settler in Van Buren county. Her father, Elija Goble, was credited with the discovery of Little Prairie Ronde, which later became the birthplace of all nine of the Goble family.

Clarin Goble, as she was known as a girl, was the youngest of the four Goble girls, later known as Mrs. Zerelda Warner, Mrs. Arrenah Fuhrman and Miss Isabell Goble. There was one brother younger, Lewis Cass Goble, who died at the age of 12 years.

In 1873 she married Henry A. Byers, the son of a Michigan pioneer, and that year both united with the Decatur Methodist Episcopal church.

To them were born three sons: Burton, Wilbur and Harley. Some time after marriage they went to Texas and resided there for about two years. Then they returned to Decatur and when the youngest son was about 16 years of age they moved to Washington state, where they remained for many years. There her husband died, and wishing to be near her sister she came back to Michigan where she made her home for six years with her sisters, Mrs. Arrenah Fulurman and Isabell Goble. During that time her eldest sister, Mrs. Warner, passed away and her son Burton was accidentally killed. Soon after that her health began to fail and she decided to return home to her sons, Harley and Wilbur, in Tacoma, Wash. Then, or four years later, her sister Isabell died and a few months after her son Wilbur was found dead in bed from a heart attack.

Though saddened by her several losses of her nearest relatives she still maintained a cheerful outlook and for the last sixteen years has had a comparatively happy old age at the home of her son Harley and wife and their two children, Dorothy and Glenn.

She retained her affiliations with the Methodist church as long as she was able to attend and much of her happiness of her last years was made possible by the thoughfulness of those kind friends which her church membership had made possible.

But even kind friends could not have sufficed during the long trying last months of her stay on earth. Only the love and care of a devoted son and just as devoted a daughter-in-law could fulfill that need, and they did until she no longer recognized them. Then she was removed to the hospital where she could have the care that only nurses and hospital facilities could provide. Then she passed away August 31, 1942.

Old friends who had formerly lived near Decatur who attended the funeral were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Selby and Mrs. Byron Bradly.

She leaves one son, Harley E. Byers, two daughters-in-law, Mrs. H. E. Byers of Tacoma and Mrs. Burton Byers, Vandalia, Mich.; three granddaughters and five grandsons; one brother-in-law, Charles Byers of near Decatur, and one cousin, Mrs. Laura Powers, Detroit, Mich.

She could have said as did the Apostle Paul: "I have fought a good fight. I have kept the faith. I have finished my course."

Historical significance of the two life-times of a father and daughter:

In reading this brief account of the life of one of Michigan's pioneer daughters, the achievements of those years of Van Buren county and particularly of Little Prairie Ronde stand out more forcibly than they would otherwise, for within the span of life of that one family is the entire history of Little Prairie Ronde, and almost all of that of Van Buren county. And when we go further afield for the historical significance of space of time covered by the life-times of the father of this family and the last member of it we are struck by the comparative growth of our state and nation, for when Elija Goble was born in 1805 our nation was only 29 years old. When his first child was born our state was still a territory. Thus the lives of these two people, a father and daughter, have covered all but 29 years of our country's history as a nation, and all of our state's history as a state. So, when we stop to think of the tremendous progress that has been made in the span of just two people's lives we are more than ever impressed with the power of democracy and its capacity for bringing forth a great people. The old giant story of the seven leagued boots reads like a midget story in comparison with the vast strides that have been made by both our state and nation within two life times. And that not withstanding that during that period seven wars have been waged in which our country participated—the War of 1812, the Black Hawk War, in which Elija Goble served as a captain, the Mexican War, The Civil War, the Spanish-American War, the World War I and the present one.

Professor Goddard Of U. of M. Dies

His Wife, Who Was the Former Lillian Rosewarne of Decatur, Passed Away 3 Years Ago.

Ann Arbor.—Emeritus Professor Edwin C. Goddard, whose home was also home, at various times, to more than 100 students whom he had provided with free board and lodging during their college days died last Friday in University hospital.

He was 77 years old and had been with the faculty of the University of Michigan law school for 35 years.

Prof. Goddard first came to the university in 1885, as a student, receiving his Ph. B. degree four years later. From 1889 to 1895, when he was recalled as an instructor in mathematics, he served as a high school principal in Saginaw.

He completed his law studies in 1899 and became a member of the law school faculty in that year. The university accorded him his professorship in 1917.

He found time, apart from his academic work, for many and varied off-the-campus activities. He was a member of the original committee appointed to study proposals for the beautification of the Huron river valley and the development of its recreational resources.

He also served as a director of the Farmers' & Mechanics' bank until its merger in 1936 and as a trustee of the Board of Education.

Prof. Goddard likewise was affiliated with many clubs and organizations. He was a past president of the Michigan Schoolmasters' Club, a leader in the Emeritus Club of Michigan Alumni, a member of both state and normal bar associations and of the U. of M. Club. He wore the keys to two honorary fraternities, Phi Beta Kappa and Phi Delta Phi.

Prof. Goddard married Lillian Rosewarne, a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Rosewarne, one of the pioneer families of Little Prairie Ronde. The wedding took place about fifty years ago in the pleasant Rosewarne home, now the home of Vivian Rosewarne, grandson of the original owner. The couple had met when both were students of the University. Mrs. Goddard preceded her husband in death about 3 years ago. Prof. Goddard was an occasional visitor here during the many years that the older generation of relatives were in their prime. He was a splendid citizen and made lasting friends here and wherever he went.

Upon the death of her father Miss Katherine Rosewarne, sister of Mrs. Goddard, became a member of the family and still resides in the household.

Funeral services were held in Ann Arbor at 3 o'clock Monday afternoon and the Misses Kate and Lana Kern were present from Decatur.

History of Fritzburg.

In September of the year 1837 the now famous city of Fritzburg was first brought before the world, although at that early date the founder little thought that the wild place in the wilderness would some day become a popular city.

Sixty-seven years ago Henry Coleman, father of Jerome Coleman, later a Decatur attorney, came to the present site of Fritzburg and thinking it a model place to start a town erected a fine two story structure and called it a tavern.

At that time there was but one main thoroughfare across Michigan and it passed his tavern. It was the stage line from Detroit to St. Joseph and there was a large amount of travel.

He did a rushing tavern business and soon added a store and the Postoffice

The tavern and its beautiful surroundings attracted the attention of stage drivers who were stopping at Keeler. The Keeler tavern was passed by and Brown's Tavern as Mr. Coleman's hotel was known, became their regular stopping place. Business was prosperous with the tavern for a long time and then a man by the name of Chas. N. Poor added to the property and wealth of the village by building a blacksmith shop. He did a thriving business for a number of years and then sold out. The shop was later moved to the site of the shop now owned and operated by Blacksmith Ferguson.

Mr. Coleman did a good business for a number of years and then sold the combined tavern and store. It passed from one to another until the prosperous business built up by its founder went to ruin. The building was then sold to Sanky Phelps who moved it to what is now 111 Brown street, to be used as a barn.

John Brown once owned the tavern and made money in it in a way not usually followed in ordinary business. He conceived the idea of making money out of lead and conducted a successful U. S. mint until a few sharp men caught him at it and the business busted. John Brown went to Jackson for a few years and afterwards died.

From 1875 to 1890 the town could have properly been named "The Deserted Village," then Mr. Fritz came along, erected a new building and opened a department store. The village was named Fritzburg and to day there is not a more enterpersing city on the Territorial Highway

OF COURSE THEY KNOW MAHONEY'S SOUP

The Gem,
Decatur, Mich.
Oct. 26, 1942.

S/Sgt. Tom Brucks,
Gardner Field, Calif.,
328th Schl. Sq. Sp.

Dear Tom:

Thanks for the ad. The Irish are in there ladling—and it isn't Heinz and it isn't Campbell's — you've guessed it—MAHONEYS FAMOUS VEGETABLE SOUP with no priorities—and since that last edition of The Decatur Republican rolled off the press, they're swarming in from all corners in spite of thirty-five miles per hour and vanishing rubber.

Too bad you soldiers don't get around more. Mahoney's Soup was famous on the coast forty years ago and still going strong! Only you've got to know where to find it. If you see a place that looks like class—that's it—Mahoney's Famous Soup!

Say, Tom, when did you kiss this Blarney Stone? You have what it takes. Best to yourself, Bill and George.

Good luck, soldier. When there's a better soup on the market, T. F. will brew it. Keep 'em flying,

T. F. Mahoney.

AN OLD NEWSPAPER

C. W. Morgan brought the Republican a copy of the Republican of May 11, 1899. He is the husband of Hazel Keyes Morgan of Kalamazoo and found the paper when cleaning out the attic of Mrs. Ely Keyes' home on Pine street. They found some very old papers there. Ely Keyes came here from Colon and some of the papers had been saved from the days of his grandfather.

They found book entries where the grandfather had worked for 40 cents a day, and one of 6 days work, $2.47. Eggs were quoted at 6 cents a dozen and butter, 8 cents a pound. The elder Keyes sold a flock of 40 sheep for $62.

In the real estate transfers appears the sale of the George Keyes farm of 40 acres to Geo. W. Congdon for $2,000.00.

Jay Dodge sold his farm of 120 acres just west of the village to J. H. Teller for $3,600.

The death of Sarah Fate Botts, 43, was reported. She was survived by her husband and two sons. Her funeral was held in the Free Methodist church, Rev. C. Paige officiating, and the burial was in Lakeside cemetery.

The Once Thriving Village of Charleston

IT FLOURISHED IN THE FORTIES AND FIFTIES, BUT NOW ALL THAT IS LEFT OF IT IS THE CEMETERY.

(Through the kindness of Mrs. Chas. Ruple, the Republican is able to present here a brief history of the extinct village of Charleston which once threatened to outshine the village of Decatur. Mrs. Ruple was before her marriage Mary Ickes. She was a daughter of the late John Ickes and her ancestors were long time residents of this community.

Mrs. Ruple has a scrap book filled with interesting stories, items, poems and recipes. In the scrapbook is a story of Charleston dated at Dowagiac March 31, but the year is not given. It probably was a feature story written by a special reporter for a city paper.

There is at the present time no land mark to indicate that the village of Charleston ever existed. It may be that the Daughters of the Revolution of Dowagiac have the erection of a marker under consideration.)

DOWAGIAC, Mich., March 31.—(Special)—Cities rise and wane, and the forgotten city or village of Charleston, located in what is now the center of a farming section in the northern part of Cass county has disappeared with the rise of other and more substantial communities.

Charleston, in about 1845 to 1860, was a flourishing village of more than 300 inhabitants and a visit to the site of the village today would show interested chronographers only the remains of a few broken buildings and a cemetery. Near this burial ground a church and a thriving community located on the Kalamazoo-Niles stage coach line once gave much promise.

Time and the building of both railroads through other nearby communities sent Charleston, Mich., off the map. Old time maps show the village on the stage coach road but maps published after 1875 failed to carry it.

Musician Recalls Dances

John Johnson, veteran Marcellus musician, can remember when he rode out from Marcellus to play for dances at the old taproom dance hall located at Charleston.

In the summer of 1828 four pioneers, Elijah Goble, Samuel Rich, Jonathan Gard and George Toney, all settlers of Franklin county, Indiana, started north through the forests in search of an uncrowded and unhampered location for their families and a place for the furtherance of development that would satisfy their longing for new scenes.

They were all hunters and fishermen and feared little objection from the few Indians they expected to encounter.

One hot June day, when it was discovered that the camp, located several miles east of Dowagiac, was out of meat, Toney started out to replenish the depleted larder. He had not gone far from the camp when he sighted a deer and wounded it at the first shot from his muzzle-loading rifle. He followed the dying animal north until he suddenly broke through the forest into a beautiful prairie of some 200 acres.

Gard's Prairie

Delighted with his surroundings he dropped his gun and throwing both arms wide, shouted, "This is mine." This little break in the woods is now known as "Gard's prairie" and is inhabited by a few descendants of the original settlers.

Three miles to the northeast the explorers came upon another and larger prairie. Elijah Goble was in the lead of the party at that time, and to him is given the distincion of being the discoverer of the spot. This prairie became one of the most flourishing of Michigan farm lands in the years following the discovery, and is known today as Little Prairie Ronde.

Some time after the discovery, the hardy pioneers led by Goble who was but 23 at the time, took up homesteads of 160 acres each near the sections discovered by Toney and Goble. Elijah's claim was located on what is now Charleston, the forgotten city of Michigan.

Goble and his companions returned to Indiana for their families and later settled the near by land.

Taproom Popular

The Charleston hotel was built by Goble and he ran the hostelry for more than 20 years. The stage coach line from Kalamazoo and Detroit, south to Niles and Chicago ran through Charleston.

The Goble house was known along the stage line as a haven of gayety and homeliness. The taproom was popular in the territory and the homes and other stores which made the city were built nearby.

A small church and a burial ground were planned and built. The cemetery was surrounded by small evergreen trees. This fringe of trees still stands.

Other business places that were built and thrived in Charleston in the '30s, '40s and '50s were the Morris & Clifton store, the Clark Morris blacksmith shop, Daniel Fox's saloon, a cooper shop, a dry goods store handled by a Mr. Herrick, and a doctor's office.

First Physician

A Dr. Chatfield came from the east to settle at Charleston. An investigation of the stones in the Charleston graveyard this spring showed that Dr. Chatfield succumbed to one of the many cases of ague and fever that swept through the section and died on March 8, 1847.

A Dr. Hudson followed D. Chatfield as the town physician and remained at the town until he foresaw the death of the community and removed to Chicago in 1855.

The earliest death in the community recorded on a tombstone in the cemetery is that of John S. Goble, thought to be an infant son of the founder of the town, in October, 1836.

Elephants Walk In

Traveling shows frequently visited the little village, and at one time the great Van Amberg circus and menagerie were there. The long famous Forepaugh's circus stopped at Charleston and the elephants walked overland from Kalamazoo. Yankee Robinson, pioneer circus man, brought his show there and records indicate that the performances played to packed tents.

THE LAST DAYS OF CHARLESTON

A few months ago Dana Smith of Paw Paw sent the Republican pictures of the last two houses that formed a part of the extinct village of Charleston. A note of the gift was printed at the time and it interested the residents and former residents of that locality.

At our request Mrs. Guy Rutherford wrote the following account of the last days of Charleston:

I don't feel equal to writing about Charleston as I was a newcomer to this side of town, but will say when we moved onto the L. L. Morlan farm in 1919 there was a family by the name of Beach living on the north side of the road just east of the Charleston cemetery. One of the children is living now in Calvin township.

As to the pictures you have the one that there are two views of, was on the corner on the south side of the road nearly opposite the house occupied by the Beach family. I think it was occupied at one time by Frank Denise and family and was off the land now owned by Ezra Rutherford. He has named his farm in honor of the village, calling it Charleston Acres.

The third picture is of the once home of the Jacob Morlans. The late Jay Morlan and his first wife lived in it at one time. The house was located south of the barn on the Ezra Rutherford farm that is near the Harold Rutherford home. About 15 years ago it was occupied by a family by the name of Whitfield. I believe that was the last family to occupy the house.

Ezra Rutherford bought the farm and later tore down what was left of the building and thus Charleston died. Mrs. Guy C. Rutherford.

When we think of Charleston we think of the poem, "The Deserted Village," by Oliver Goldsmith. It is a long poem, but well worth a full reading. These few lines show the pathos and beauty of the whole:

"Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain,
Where wealth and plenty cheered the labouring swain,
Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering bloom delayed:
Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, where every sport could please:
How often have I loitered o'er thy green,
Where humble happiness endeared each scene!

* * * *

Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn."

The Lake of the Woods Camp

Back in 1900 this was the farm home of Mr. and Mrs. Milo Youells. It is now the location of the "Lake of the Woods" and "Greenwoods" Camps, ideally located on the shore of Lake of the Woods.

By Fred W. Green

At the request of the editor a visit was made to the Lake of the Woods Camp which entertains both boys and girls. The camp has been in operation nine years.

This camp was originally the farm home of Mr. and Mrs. Milo Youells. They conceived the idea of building a camp there and began the entertainment of summer visitors on a small scale.

But it was I. Louis Greenberg, with the able assistance of Mrs. Greenberg, who converted the property into the flourishing recreation project that it is today. It has taken a vast amount of hard work but success has crowned their efforts.

Shrubbery and trees were planted around the cottages and they are now showing the vision and careful planning of that more than ordinary man who laid out the camp.

Today it is a very attractive place. It is ideally located on the west shore of the lake and from the satisfied looks of the visitors it is certain they are pleased with their selection of a summer camp.

There are really two camps, one for the boys and one for girls, but they are both under the management of Mrs. Greenberg, who since the death of her husband has had full charge and responsibility for the undertaking.

It is interesting to note how the young people residing there employ their time. Every outdoor activity imaginable is provided for their enjoyment. A stable of riding horses is at their command, archery and tennis courts, croquet, rifle ranges, and of course, swimming, provide them the recreation they desire.

All of the activities are supervised by a councilor who is a competent instructor.

The Victory garden and miniature farm are worthy of special mention. Here the boys and girls learn to make garden and to do farming. I saw the boys and girls out loading hay as though they had been at it for years. They enjoyed it, made fun out of the work and at the same time were doing something constructive and useful in helping to feed the nation.

The seriousness of the work is impressed upon the guests. They are told in a way not to scare them that something out of the ordinary is going on in our country, that it needs their help and that even in raising a garden they are making of themselves useful citizens.

The meals served at the camp are also worthy of mention. They are simple and substantial. The bases are milk, fruit, meat and bread, with dainty salads and desserts. That is about what we eat at home. Can you imagine anything better?

Mrs. Greenberg was amused when I asked her how her guests are secured. Her answer was simply this, "Mr. Green, I don't know. One tells another, and they write for particulars. When the saturation point is reached, well, it is liable to bring disappointment to those who make inquiry after that."

This year the applications were more numerous than in past years. The parents are absorbed in war activities and are glad to send their children to Lake of the Woods Camp where they know they will be contented and well cared for.

Mrs. Greenberg informed me the help problem is a big one every year, but so far this year no annoyances have cropped out. All enjoy living at the camp and are glad to stay there until the first of September when the camp closes for the year.

The work is then over for all but Mrs. Greenberg. You all know what shutting up a house is when you go away. Well, try shutting up a camp and see the many problems that come up and must be solved.

Nature studies and health are studies of major importance in the camp, and little or no persuasion is needed to interest the campers in them.

The death of her husband was a hard blow to Mrs. Greenberg, but the estate demanded her undivided attention, and she plunged unhesitatingly into the hard work ahead and it proved, as hard work generally does, to be the best thing for her. Today she is the picture of health and reasonably certain of a bright future for Lake of the Woods Camp.

This further information about the Camp was compiled by Della Mullinex, reporter for daily papers,—

In 1934 Mr. and Mrs. Louis Greenberg bought the 54 acre farm which comprises the camp. Mrs. Greenberg, who manages it now, founded the Jewish Big Sister movement in Chicago.

The camp opened June 30 with an enrollment of 57 boys and 91 girls, ranging in ages from 5 to 16 years.

There are 28 cottages, besides separate dining halls, a hospital unit and recreation parlors.

The staff consists of 40 persons, including two doctors, Dr. P. S. Neuber of Chicago and his wife, who is also a doctor and nurse, special teachers and counselors, of which there is one to every 12 children. Each group has their own separate cottage.

Directors are: Philip Chapman, instructor at Northwestern University, and Miss Rosalind Joffe, physical educational instructor at Parker High school in Chicago.

Each year has found many improvements in the cottages, various halls and playgrounds.

79th Anniversary of First Baptist Church

By C. C. Evans

The 79th anniversary of the founding of the First Baptist church of Decatur, held August 30 was a grand success.

The service began at 3 o'clock with singing by the Chain Lake choir. The prayer was by Rev. C. H. Chappell of Chicago; scripture reading by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Slaughter of East Decatur.

The address of welcome was by Mrs. Fannie Allen and the response by Rev. J. K. Earley of Kalamazoo. The guest speaker was Rev. R. A. Shaw of Elkhart. The presentation of a reconditioned Bible given many years ago by Brother D. S. Brown, was made by his daughter, Mayme Jackson, and it was received by Deacon Robert Lennox.

Many friends were present from Chicago, Benton Harbor, Kalamazoo and adjoining towns. Mrs. Dorothy Brown Elliott gave a good talk and a good time was enjoyed by all present.

Other visitors and friends of the church were present from Battle Creek, Detroit, Dowagiac and Chicago.

I am adding a bit of reminiscence to this historical institution. When these old pioneers were hewing out timber to erect the church in the year of our Lord, 1863, the Battle of Gettysburg was in progress. So as the ax rang out in the Michigan forest the federal siege guns were belching forth fire at this great battle which was the turning point of the Civil War.

Incidents like this come and go and are finally forgotten, but the establishing of religious institutions such as the First Baptist Church of Decatur will live after bronze and marble have crumbled away.

The Education of the German Youth Under Hitler

By Mrs. Louis Loeser

Foreword

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Loeser arrived in Decatur total strangers the first of January, 1941. They were out looking for a farm and chanced to see the sign "For Sale" on the Berchaney farm at the foot of Fifield hill. At once it seemed to them it was their farm, and they were not long in making the purchase.

They have entered into the life of the community and show in many ways their appreciation of being in America and their desire to be good representative citizens.

Knowing that they are intimately acquainted with life in Germany and the purposes of its Fuehrer, we asked Mrs. Loeser for a story of life under Hitler. She very kindly complied with the request, and every American who reads what she has written in this paper should have a greater appreciation of his great good fortune in being born a citizen of the United States.

At our further request she wrote this brief account of their coming to the United States:—

I left Germany with my husband in August, 1938, and arrived in the U. S. A. in September, 1938, after we visited with relations in France and in England.

I was born in Stuttgart, close to the Swiss border and lived there all my life except for 3 years when I learned and worked on different farms in our vicinity.

I left with my husband because of Anti-Jewish persecution, and because our lives were not safe anymore, and we didn't have any possibility of earning a living.

We had in our mind since the time the question of an emigration arose, that to the U. S. A. would be the only country we wished to go. Luckily American relations provided us with the necessary affidavits.

Since this time our both parents, friends and relations are scattered all over the world, except for my brother who is living in Boston with his family.

We didn't see our parents since the time we left Germany. Luckily my parents are in Switzerland waiting anxiously for the war coming to an end, so that they can join us over here, and we all can live a happier and more normal life.

We ourselves don't have any close relations in Germany. We too hope that towards the end of next year we will be able to get our citizenship papers, and this indeed will be then one of our happiest days we have known for a long, long time.

We love our new home country and everything that was seems to be like a black dream, from which we wake up and find ourselves in a world every human being longs for. The things that happened to us can never be forgotten and there never can be a reconciliation with the people who destroyed the vrey roots of our family and everything we hold dear.

Our greatest wish is now, to be able to show the people here, that we are worth their confidence in giving us a new chance for a life that can be so wonderful if one just takes the chance one is given in a country like the U. S. A. We are thankful for that chance and therefore put our whole strength in our work, that it might help to win this war.

The Education of the German Youth Under Hitler

The following will be pretty hard to understand for everybody who loves freedom and all what goes with it. It is hard for me to understand that things like Hitler is preaching for, ever could be made so true, that it frightens every human being, especially now, since I learned the truth of a great country and its principles. It makes it a little easier because I have the knowledge and the faith, that life can be different, if we the people, want it so.

This is the greatest difference between the people of the United States and the people of Europe. It was even before Hitler or Mussolini ever were known. Naturally not as drastic as it is now. Nevertheless there never is another country that has a government: by the people, for the people and to the people. So whatever I tell you, this fact has to be considered.

The Hitler Youth

Nowadays you read so many articles about the German youth, or better known as the Hitler youth. Things you shudder about, things you can't believe or don't want to believe because they are so utterly against humanity. And still I lived through it, I know the things you hear are true, because they happened all around me, until I finally had the luck to come over here. Now I try to forget what was and I am eager to learn from this country, and I pray that some day the whole world acknowledges what wonderful rules and principles the people of the United States are living for.

You see over there when a baby is born, his or her life is already fully lined out and it has to live up to it. Just as much as it is the duty for each mother, if rich or poor, and no matter how young or how old, just so that they can have children, they have to have them. This is the first rule each woman has to live up to, if she wants to be a good citizen and the pride of her fatherland.

These mothers have all the privileges a government can give to its people. They have the knowledge that whatever happens to their husbands, if they have any, or to themselves, there always will be a welcome room for their babies. They get all the food and clothing they need, and they don't have to worry where the money comes from for their keep, and they know that the children get all the proper training the government asks for.

The Baby Belongs to Government

The baby really belongs to the parents only until it is big enough to go to "Kindergarten". This is the only time the parents can truly say: our baby belongs to us. After it starts to kindergarden, the government already takes slowly over, increasing it year by year. Since all the teachers and nurses have to go through a very strict and tough training and schooling, it affects the children as soon as they are old enough to understand some things and can be trained.

You see all colleges and everything that has to do with education are under government control, and therefore only the best Nazis are selected to be teachers. They have to prove through many things that they are truly Nazis and faithful followers of Hitler, and only such people are allowed to teach and educate the precious Hitler youth. Once the children are under the control of teachers the parents have practically no control over their children, except if they are by heart true Nazis. The teachers are always right, no matter how you think about it, the children always have to do what the teachers say, and if you tell them different, you face a concentration camp.

As children are, they might go to their teachers and say: My mother thinks different. A few days later a secret police man comes to your home and gives you a harsh warning and tells you that you have to leave the education up to the government, who knows what's best anyway. If it should happen again, they tell you that you aren't fit to raise the children, and therefore they are forced to take them to a better place, where they can be educated to be true German men and women. Well, this would be the last you would have seen of your children, if you weren't wise enough to keep your mouth shut. And that is what most parents do, because they would rather take up with everything, than lose their children.

After kindergarden they enter grade school at 6 years. They go to grade school for 4 years and enter then the secondary school that ends after 6 years with a diploma, that opens to most any profession except the ones you need college like for doctors, lawyers a. s. o. If one wants to go to college, he goes to high school for 3 more years and then can enter any college. During the time in college he or she has to give part of the vacation to serve on a farm.

It even went so far, that each boy or girl had to serve 1 year in the country on a farm before ever being able to get any job. And that applies to everybody. After that the boys have to serve 2 years in the army before ever being able to learn any kind of a job or profession. You can figure out yourself how old a German boy must be, before he ever can think of having a real job and earn his living independent and start a family.

The Fuehrer Knows Everything

But going back once more I want to show you how the government places her hand over the entire German youth. As I told you the children go to school with 6 years of age. That's when they get their first uniform. They belong indirectly to the Hitler youth, they get some training like marching and playing with toy guns, they learn already that they are much better than any other children and that when they grow up, there will be only Germans to rule the world, and therefore they have to be proud and live up to whatever the Fuehrer tells them to do. The Fuehrer knows everything and wants only the best for them, and they should never forget, that they are all his children as long as they are good and obey.

When they are 10 years old they enter formally the Hitler youth, where they get real training by now, like long marches in any kind of weather, with or without heavy packs. They learn to shoot and swim and all the different kind of exercises to harden and steel their bodies. They learn about the German race that is prior to any other race, and it just happens that they have to tolerate some other races. But those races like the Jews, Polish, Russians a. s. o. are not wanted and that the Fuehrer will get rid of them. That all the other people left have is to obey the Fuehrer, if they want to go on living with them.

Hitler Is Their God

They learn that there is only one religion, and that the Fuehrer is their God and they believe only in him, because he knows everything and a voice is talking to him once in a while that gives him a sign which way to go.

This religious question was one of the hardest things for Hitler. You see on the one side there is by name a Catholic and a Protestant church in Germany, but they can't use the old testament. Hitler denounces Jesus too, since he says he has Jewish parents. He can't believe in the 10 commandments otherwise all his ideas would be lies. So what is there really left? That is the time when you read about so many priests and nuns being in the concentration camps. These were courageous people, who tried to save their own people even if it cost them their own lives, just to tell them the truth. But it was in vain. They had to preach Hitler's way, if only to give their people a church to go to.

The children learn too that there are girls, and the girls that there are boys. And that it is their duty to be together, and that the Fuehrer wants more and more children, because the German race will spread and spread over the whole world. They learn that they should follow their natural instinct and be not afraid what might happen, because the Fuehrer never lets a faithful follower down.

The children don't learn anything about other countries and their way of living except to mention how ridiculous other people are, and how fortunate they themselves are to live in such a great nation and be able to be a part of it.

LETTERS

AN OLD FRIEND WRITES OF SEVERAL THINGS

We present here a letter from Jimmie Chamberlain, James now. He was a friend of our boyhood years, and as well a read citizen as ever made up the Democratic minority in Van Buren county. Many years ago Jimmie went away, and a few years ago James came back on a visit. That visit so revived his interest in the village of his youth that he subscribed to the Republican. A year or two later he had found so much satisfaction in recalling early Decatur days that he subscribed also for his brother Oliver who likewise had moved in early age to the distant shores of a cheerless creek that winds through South Dakota. This not too flattering description of his home in the west may get a rise out of Oliver, and that would please a lot of us.

James Chamberlain advertises on wood in Fort Worth, Texas. He early learned there is luck in keeping his fingers crossed and a hand on wood, and he has made of this knowledge a lucrative occupation.

Now Jimmie James (who wrestled as well out of school as he recited his lessons in school) we turn the meeting over to you,—

November 1, 1942.

Dear Arba,

I recall reading an article in the Republican in which you recalled some ideas and thoughts you had when convalescing from a severe attack of typhoid fever. I find myself in a similar condition, gradually recovering from six weeks in bed.

My writing of course will be bad and perhaps, illegible, but there are some things I wish to tell now and hope you can read them and give space in your paper for them.

The 'Old Grim Reaper' had 2 strikes on me. Then I fouled off 3 of his high fast ones. Then he put over a wide sweeping curve which I barely ticked, but I waited patiently and got a base on balls, and now hope with proper food, gentle exercise and restful sleep to get safely home.

I want to thank Walter Brown for the way he trusted brother Oliver and me by making our mint vats with no down payment and no security when we were in another state and he had only our word as security.

Also I wish to thank George L. Roberts, if he is still among the living, for making our distillery apparatus under similar conditions.

I wonder if Walter remembers when Jarious Halleck, Tom Mahoney, Oliver and I used to come to his Novelty Works and buy our ball bats from him. In a recent item of Walter's about the old grist mill on east Beers street he seems to have forgotten the name of one of the early owners, the Balcomb brothers, who sold to John Bickhart.

The son of one of the Balcomb brothers, Lawrence Balcomb, was a playmate as well as a school mate of mine. Also another member of the Lyon family which the paper did not mention was Bessie Lyon who was my teacher in the second primary. I picked gooseberries and currants for the Lyons when they lived on East Sherwood street in the house later owned by Isaac Dewey.

Our son Milo is somewhere in Hawaii where he has been for the past 6 months. He is a sergeant and in good health, but his letters are so closely censored that we do not know much about the situation there. He was first at Camp Wolters, then at Camp Joe Robinson, next at Angel Island just outside of Alcatraz in Frisco Bay.

The war has greatly affected my business by causing many firms to discontinue advertising and by taking my best men into the army for defense jobs. While sick in bed I was helpless to assist the men in carrying on the business and thereby lost several good contracts. One of these was for Montgomery Ward and Company.

Now I am in a similar position to that in which many others find themselves. If we are not given a sufficient amount of gasoline in the rationing of November 21 we will have to quit our business.

Of course I am willing to make any sacrifice that will help win the war. I realize that we must win the war and it can be done only by team work. In the event of having to quit business by reason of failure to get sufficient gasoline we will probably sell our property here, and in that event I have in mind but one place to go, and that is back to the old home town.

Decatur has done much for me, and I feel I should do something in my small way to pay that debt of gratitude. I have in the past turned down several offers for our property, but now with our son in the army, if our business should be taken away from us through gasoline rationing neither of us would have relatives to hold us in Fort Worth.

We are both past seventy and reconciled to making the change. So some of my old time friends may meet me at the Alumni banquet in 1943.

I read the poem, "Hell in Texas" in your paper. I lived in this "Hell" six years and in the name of justice must say that the Lord was very generous in giving the Devil that tract of land in the lower Rio Grande Valley, commonly known as the Magic Valley. It has a very fertile soil and an extremely pleasant, healthful climate.

I know it gets hot down there, but during the six years I lived there I never heard of man nor beast being overcome by the heat. Because of the pleasant south east gulf breeze we always slept under cover.

The worst drawback to the country when we lived there was the large number of crooks which always infest a newly settled country.

When we moved into the valley in 1914 there was no town of Weslaco. It was founded the following year. I was chairman of the first school board in Weslaco and we built a fine high school building as well as other buildings for the lower grades. Weslaco is now a thriving city of about ten thousand inhabitants and nearly all of the crooks have been eliminated.

So I believe any one visiting the Magic Valley will agree with me that the Lord saw his mistake in giving it to his Satanic majesty and has reclaimed it for his own domains.

I promised to write a comparison of the Decatur of the eighties with the Decatur of today, but on careful consideration have concluded that I am not fit to do it.

I cannot say anything detrimental to the Decatur of the eighties, and I have been in Decatur so little in recent years that I feel about as competent to pass judgment on it as was the young man who entered a lawyer's office to study law. When he went home after the first day and was asked how he liked the law he replied, "It isn't what it is cracked up to be, I am sorry I learned it."

One thing more, perhaps you remember the money order that I reported stolen. The fact is while I was playing dominoes in a public place a drunken man evidently took my packages instead of his own. On going out on the street he was arrested and taken to the police station.

The packages he had were taken over by the police for the night and given back to him in the morning, but he failed to examine them for over a year. Then upon doing so he discovered the money order and returned it to the domino parlor and the manager returned it to me. I am in turn sending it to you to give to the post master at Decatur.

Very truly yours.
James Chamberlain.

AN ANSWER

Decatur Republican,

I have just read Mr. Gale's comment in his "corner." It was perfectly natural for Mr. Gale to ask the government man if the government would take the shot guns for home defense. It was necessary also for the man to evade an answer.

The poster in the post office means just what it says: "The enemy is listening," in the hardware store, in the biggest town and the littlest one; listening in the church and in the onion field and the answer to Mr. Gale's question is just what the enemy wants to know. Why tell him?

A CAMP CONSECRATED TO GOD

(Dr. Blodgett amplifies and corrects the news story published in the Republican of April 23. He has launched a fine project for this community and we are very glad to have this further word from him explaining it. The progress he makes will be watched with interest.)

Dear Mr. Moulton:

I certainly appreciate the fine article and compliment you gave me in the April 23rd edition of The Decatur Republican. I also appreciate the kindness of Mr. Charles Ritter in endeavoring to aid you in giving me a correct write-up. It is easy for one reporting, after an interview, in all sincerity to portray the truth, to have some errors enter into that report through misunderstanding, and therefore incorrect conclusions.

Such has been the case in the article you so kindly printed. And I thought you would like to hear from me as to correct facts.

I dedicated my life to the service of Jesus Christ many years ago. I studied for the Christian Ministry and was graduated from Union Theological College in June, 1929. Before that and during the years I was in the theological college I was engaged in camp work.

My camp work began at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, as a kitchen helper at Eleanor Camp, in 1915. I was two years at Eleanor Camp (not consecutive years), one year at the Y. M. C. A. Camp, and two years at Olivet Camp, both camps at Lake Geneva. My work at Eleanor camp was in the kitchen; at Olivet, in the kitchen the first season, and in the camp store as store keeper the second season. At the Y. M. C. A. Camp I was in the camp book store as clerk.

In 1922 I went to Camp Gray, Saugatuck, where I was employed as manager of the camp store, and as assistant to the manager of the camp one season. I was also the camp photographer for all camp literature. I was there for five seasons. The camp capacity was 800 guests.

In 1927 I was employed as camp secretary at Tower Hill Camp, Sawyer, Michigan. This was my first season employed in camp work.

As I completed my course of study at Union Theological College I was granted Licensure to preach, by the Congregational Board in Chicago. In my last year at college, I was employed as Director of Young People's Work at the Howard Community Church in Chicago. An experience there caused me to decide to become a doctor. Therefore very shortly after graduation from the theological college I entered the Chicago College of Naprapathy, from which I was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Naprapathy, in 1935. My intention was to combine the ministry and Naprapathy, to minister to the soul and the body. Naprapathy, Osteopathy and Chiropractic all manipulate the spinal column as a part of their method. The three are somewhat similar, and yet differ with each other in what each considers very essential characteristics.

I was active in the service of humanity as a Naprapath until I moved to Christie Lake in September of 1940. I am not engaged in Naprapathic work here in Michigan. I came here for one definite purpose. Years ago, when I was in the camp work, I said "someday I will have a camp of my own"; and that is why I am here at Christie Lake—to see the realization of that hope.

I am beginning in a very small way. But the complete dream is a triple camp: namely a boys' camp with guest capacity of 100 boys; a girls' camp with guest capacity of 100 girls; and a family camp (for families, individuals, mixed or segregated groups, and for all ages), with guest capacity of 200, not counting the housekeeping cottages, of which I hope in the complete camp to have at least forty. I know about 3000 people in Chicago and environs, so that I have no fear about getting the campers. And I am fully qualified in experience. My only handicap is finance. As the camp can grow financially, even so shall the camp grow in guest capacity.

Christie Lake Camp is consecrated to the Lord God, the profit from the camp, after it gets under way is to go into the Lord's work for the salvation of souls and for the Christian training of the Children of the Lord Jesus Christ. As far as the worldly possession of the camp is concerned I will be the owner, but as far as my relation to God is concerned, God is the owner and I am only His Custodian. I plan to pay myself a salary just like any other camp employee, that the profits may go into the Lord's work.

This, then, is my consecration and my dedication.

Very sincerely and thankfully yours,
Howard S. Blodgett, D. N.

FROM DAYS OF OLD

DR. ROLLIN L. THORP
Denver, Colorado.
May 4, 1942.

Friend Arbie:

Inclosed please find check for $3.00. Hope I will not be bothered with you until November 1943 but hope, in the meantime, that I may have the chance to drop in and "talk at you" for a while. Have had lots of time to visit, in the last two years but am now so that I can walk with just a cane and hope that in a few weeks more that I will be able to discard even that.

I read all the Republicans that I can find time to and save the others for some rainy day when I can't come to the shop. Sometimes when I open your paper, here in the office, and the patients, some of them, see that it is a Republican paper, they smile. I wish that we had been under a Republican Administation, during the last nine years at least, but while we are in it the present incumbent is our President and it is his administration that we have to abide by.

Yours in the faith,
R. L. Thorp.

That young man out in Denver, Colo., who used to give us cookies when he went to school here back in the seventies was the writer of the above letter. He lived then in the brick house on the border line between Little Prairie Ronde and Nich-olsville, and was one of Prof. Upton's "foreign' pupils in the old Decatur high school, and as the poet said, "Was it long ago or yesterday?"

At any rate boys like ourself need not think we are growing old for Dr. Thorp was in the high school when we began school, and now, after breaking his hip and probably one of the Ten Commandments, he is preparing to throw his cane away and we guess will join the fat men's ball club for the season of 1942.

Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney, of Chicago, a D. H. S. contemporary with Dr. Thorp, is apparently playing that thrilling but hazardous old game, 'follow me,' with him. Dr. Mahoney is recovering from the effects of a broken leg, followed by a broken arm. We wonder if they could not be induced to form an alliance with Dr. Tom Lyon of Raton, New Mexico, who is only a year or two their senior, for a grand reunion in Decatur this summer. If Dr. Lyon needs to break anything to be eligible to membership he might break the ice and propose this celebration. As the mascot of the organization we will endeavor to furnish the meeting place and eating place for the veterans. When shall we set the date?

MEMORIES OF A CHILDHOOD HOME

From Rev. LeRoy L. Dewey

Sturgis, Michigan,
December 10, 1942.

My dear Arba,

The news of the burning of our old farm home and my birthplace as recorded in this week's issue of your splendid paper came to me as a severe and saddening shock.

It was in no sense a pretentious house but around it clustered many happy memories of our joyous early home life. There I was born. That was no great event of course. In fact, I guess it was evidently not a great event even in the home circle for, in father's diary, there is the simple, unemotional and unenthusiastic statement "boy born to-day." But anyway I am glad I was born and I am not at all ashamed to have been born in a humble place such as that was. It was a shrine,—a shrine to no one else, of course, but a simple shrine to me, where I always went every time I have visited Decatur, and there recalled again the times that were, and the simple things that made life so full and so happy in my early boyhood days.

I well remember a Sunday of my boyhood when some man who was driving by, seeing smoke coming from the roof, rushed into the door and shouted "your house is on fire." We all jumped from the table where we were eating our Sunday dinner and out to see about it. My sister Vedah grabbed the bird cage and hurried out the door. She was going to save the bird anyway. A spark had lodged in the bell frame atop the wood shed and the frame was ablaze but father soon had it out, so we saved not only the bird in the gilded cage but the house as well.

It was there in my early childhood that I seemed to get my first inspiration to be a preacher, for I can remember preaching to my sisters out there in that, what was then glorious yard west and north of the house.

I may have made a mistake in being a preacher but evidently the idea was embryonic in my brain at rather an early age out on the old farm which I have ofttimes wished I owned.

Are we getting old when we like to think of the glorious days of yesteryear? Well perhaps, but anyway memory is a great and happy blessing. So, as my memory reaches back to those early years of my life, to the sheep washing and sheep shearing days, the threshing days, the hog butchering days, the school days with the daily lunches prepared by Mother's loving hands, the skating, the sledding, the truly "white Christmases" and the "sleigh bells in the snow" and all, without telephone or electricity or gas or automobile or radio or much of anything that modernity dictates as necessities, I am really deeply saddened at the passing of the plain and very simple center of all of that happy life some fifty and more years ago.

I was delighted to have Clare Barron and Camilla Potts, as I knew them in our school days together, in our service one Sunday last fall. It was a real reunion and a happy event. I wish some more of the Decatur friends would drift over this way as Jay and Maude Lyle did also one Sunday last summer. But I suppose gas and tire rationing will prohibit that for a while, at least.

We pray that this terrible war may soon cease and that real peace may be established in the earth, and as a permanent world possession.

Our son George is S/Sgt. in the Air Force Gunnery School at Las Vegas, Nevada, where he has been ever since his induction a year ago last July. He received his Master's degree in Journalism the June before his induction and is now in the Public Relations Office, editor of the Camp paper, "The Horned Toad," and also script writer for their weekly Camp broadcasts. He is a busy young man but likes it.

Well, forgive me for this lengthy reminiscence and treatise.

Merry Christmas to you.

Sincerely, LeRoy.

I should have said in connection with my son that it was my delightful privilege to marry him to a beautiful Iowa girl last May and they are happily settled in an apartment in Las Vegas.

I am enclosing a check for my next years continuation of your unsurpassed weekly Republican. L. L.

FORMER TOWNSPEOPLE IN CALIFORNIA

Mrs. Anita Youells Gale gave us pleasant memories of old times and friends in the privilege of reading her Christmas letter from Miss Marjorie Browning.

Those of the younger generation of Decatur people know the Brownings only as they have heard of them in the history of Decatur. They must miss the personal acquaintance of one of the truly fine and genteel families who once were among the leaders of our community.

The Browning home of fifty years and more ago was the spacious and imposing residence that is now the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Brigham and their tenant, Mrs. D. J. Van Curen. The once popular Browning drug and book store is now the Weaver recreation parlor.

With Mrs Gale's permission we are printing here extracts from Marjorie's letter which we know it will be a pleasure to all of her friends to read:

Dearest Anita,

Your nice letter of last April and the big package of papers were a real joy. The papers gave me many items of news I was glad to have. I passed on the Republicans you sent me to Bertha Baker Akin, who lives here and to Otto and Sara Van Hise who live in Burbank, the city next to Glendale, and whom I see semi-occasionally. Each of these three enjoyed them greatly. All of us thank you.

But as for me your letter was about "worth its weight in gold," so much do I prize our friendship. You have always given me a friendship that was a joy in daily or frequent contacts, good to live with, and also that had the permanent abiding quality which could stand through years of separation at a stretch, and infrequent contact, and yet retain its affection and real interest. Such a friendship comes seldom in life, and I count myself not worthy of your giving it, but glad to hug it to my heart.

Mrs. Scripps, (with whom she lives and whose health is very poor) has periods of being better in energy, and in those times we have heard some very interesting lectures last summer and this fall through her woman's club meetings to which she may take me as a paid guest, and through the American Association of University Women of which we both have been members for many years past.

It is possible for organizations in this Los Angeles locality to get the nation's finest program talent in every line,—speakers, musicians, artists and entertainers. I so often wish you had contact with this last organization, the A. A. U. W., for you would be eligible to it.

Bertha Baker Akin is a dear woman, and I enjoy her. She and her husband, whom she married when she was teaching in the state of Washington, have lived here in Glendale 8 years. Bertha is a lovely home maker. They have 3 daughters, attractive, smart and well brought up. Lois, Jean and Marjorie. Lois is about 27 and married, Jean married last January at 22, Marjorie is 15 and in the high school.

Jack, Bertha's husband, is a fine chap, and has done reasonably well in business as manager of large food stores for chain firms such as A. and P. They have a nice home in a very good residence section of Glendale.

Otto and Sara Van Hise live on a small one acre place just outside of Burbank where they grow a garden, have a few fruit trees and Sara raises rabbits and chickens for market. Otto clerks in a large paint store in Burbank. Their daughter, Glenna Mae has grown from frailty into a vigorous woman of about 24. She is married and has a dear baby girl of 6 months.

Sara and Otto had hard luck through the depression and suffered financially, but they have kept a fine spirit, brought up two nice children, both married, and have worked hard.

Sara has been a grand wife and help meet to Otto, and Glenna Mae's health is due to her mother's intelligent and devoted care. Sara has been blessed with excellent health.

Marjorie.

(Bertha Baker Akin, Otto Van Hise and his wife, Sarah Dodge Van Hise, are former residents of Decatur. We are glad to send the Republican to Marjorie the coming year as a Christmas gift from Mrs. Gale.)

RECALLING EARLY DAYS

(Mr. and Mrs. Robert Canning, after many years, will again keep in touch with Decatur through the Republican. It is a great pleasure to receive and print these interesting reminiscences from Mrs. Canning and we hope she will feel free to write again. We had a pleasant visit with Mr. Canning last summer and found him to be a remarkably well preserved man for his years.)

Pontiac, Mich.
March 16, 1942.

Mr. Arba Moulton,
Decatur, Mich.
Dear Mr. Moulton,

Inclosed find money order for $1.50 for a year's subscription to the Decatur Republican.

You will likely remember my husband being in your office, while on a short visit to Decatur last August.

His brother, Will Canning, is a subscriber to your paper and he has sent us an occasional copy, which we both enjoyed reading very much. So we have decided to send and get it for ourselves. If the $1.50 does not cover mailing charges, let us know and we will remit what ever is due.

My husband, Robert S. Canning says a great many changes have taken place since he first went to Decatur in 1866, at the age of 8 years.

He went north, to Cadillac, shortly after the Haynes brothers and Harry Hodges went, where he married and made his home until 1906. We then went west and took up a homestead on the Little North Fork of the Coeur d' Alene river, in Northern Idaho. We spent fourteen years there engaged in cattle raising, lumbering and general ranching.

Our son, Carroll Robert, was born there on the ranch, and went through his grammar school, graduating at the age of 12 years. Rather than send him away from home, we sold the ranch in Idaho and moved to Auburn, Washington, near a very desirable school, where he took his high school work, graduating in 1926. Since that time he has worked and travelled for different companies, which has taken him into many states. At the present time he is working for a Chicago firm, which manufactures testers for Army tanks, airplanes and automobiles. This company transferred him from Newark, N. J., to the Pacific coast with headquarters at Los Angeles.

After being at Auburn, Washington, for eight years, we sold out and came back to Pontiac, as my mother who was getting old and feeble needed me near her.

After spending twenty-three years in the west we learned to love its wide open spaces and friendly people and much prefer the western climate to that of Michigan, though there will always be a place in our hearts for dear old Michigan, too.

My husband remembers when there was only one road across the swamp and later they built the road across from Decatur to Fifield hill. He also remembers well where your grandfather Moulton lived. When his parents arrived in Decatur in 1866, there were only three brick buildings in the town and they bought their first cook stove of Thomas and Hawks.

There were six children in the Canning family of whom my husband is the oldest and William the youngest. The only other surviving member is Mary Youells of Decatur.

Last July we took a trip over to Penn Yan and Bluff Point, N. Y., to visit my husband's birthplace. We found the same house in which he and four other brothers and sisters were born. It is still in good repair and occupied by some fine people who invited us in and answered all the questions we had to ask and then took our pictures standing on the front porch.

At Penn Yan we went into the court house to see if he could get his birth certificate. The clerk informed us that births were not recorded at that early date, but he looked in the 1865 census and found his name recorded as being 7 years old. He made a certificate to that effect, and sealed with the County seal, which he said would answer every purpose of a birth certificate. He found one own cousin living there who was just a few days older than he.

I was born and raised up near Cadillac, and of course after marrying, I visited my husband's people at Decatur occasionally. On one of our trips to Decatur they needed a teacher at the Lee school, in Hamilton, and Owen Marks came to see me and asked me to take the school for that term, which I did. I never enjoyed teaching in any place any more—if as much—as I did there. Emery Foster and a Mr. Jurgensen were the other two members of the board.

They all were anxious for me to take the school for the next year, with a raise in salary, but I had to refuse as my home was at Cadillac and I was needed there. But I became attached to Decatur and that is why I enjoy reading the Republican so very much.

Leland Marks, Lena Wiles, Lura Conklin, Inez Hancock, the Upfield girls, Marie Sutfin and Leon Lee were a few of my many pupils. Once in a while I see the name of one of them in your paper. O yes, I must not forget to mention little Paul Graham. He was one of my tiny pupils. I loved them all.

We are looking forward to the weekly visits of the Republican with a great deal of pleasure as it will keep us in touch with the old home town and old friends and acquaintances. With the best of wishes, we are

Sincerely,
Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Canning,
595 Gonig st., Pontiac, Mich.

GOLDEN DAYS IN DECATUR

Every member of the Republican's large and growing family of readers holds a special interest for its editor, and it is a real pleasure when there appears in our daily mail a letter from any one of them. This paper thrives by the grace of its readers, and the column of letters is in a small way a weekly home coming for those who at one time in their lives called Decatur or the territory of which it is the center, their home.

If there is any one class of readers who holds a favored place in our esteem it is the old, old timers, the home town boys and girls of our earliest recollection who were the life of the community in the days of hoops and tiles, white vests and dragging skirts which the ladies so daintily lifted to keep them from sweeping the dust from the sidewalks.

The gay young folks of Decatur in the sixties, seventies, eighties and nineties played hard and worked hard. Was there ever such a crowd and such times, either before or since?

The picket fences, the board sidewalks, the cows grazing by the road side, the deep wells that served also as refrigerators in the hot summer time, the dirt roads, the dust in the air and the smoothly worn paths where the kids played commy keeps in the spring time! O boy, what memories!

Here are just a few of those old, old timers who are living their youthful days over again by reading the Republican,—

Mrs. Nellie Rich Betaque, South Bend; Arthur L. Shaw, Mt. Ranier, Md.; Mrs. Libbie Durkee Smith, Tacoma, Wash.; L. G. Stewart, Cincinnati, Ohio; Dr. R. L. Thorp, Denver, Colo.; Charles E. Warner, Niles; Albert S. Abbott, Detroit; Mrs. Mary Pritchard Denise, Lansing; Alden Knight, Detroit; Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney, Chicago; Mrs. Percie Nash Seymour of Lawrence; and Dr. T. B. Lyon of Raton, New Mexico, and our new subscriber, Robert Canning of Pontiac.

Their letters are always welcome, and if any are omitted from this comment it is their duty to register a protest and thus be properly instated, and also to keep the column sparkling with their golden recollections. These comments were started as an introduction to the interesting letter from Dr. Tom Lyon that follows. One occasionally hears an introduction to a speech that is longer than the speech itself and the audience terminates it with groans and whistles. So we will finally close by remarking that Dr. Lyon, and the fine family of which he was a member, lived in those early days in the old square house that stood on east Sherwood street where Heuston Elliott and family now reside. After the Lyons moved away the old house was for many years the home of Isaac S. Dewey and family.

Many readers will recall the letter from Dr. Lyon, a part of which was printed in this column last December.

Raton, New Mexico,
March 20, 1942.

Dear Arba,—

I have been trying to find some explanation for the "don't publish" note I stuck into my last letter several weeks ago, but have decided to just let it go the way you fixed it up.

Am sending a year's subscription for the Republican, as it has become a real pleasure to receive it. Every issue recalls some old time memories that were forgotten in the passing years of my very busy life. The controversy about the cannon recalls the years in the 70's when there was a brass cannon on the green where the flag pole stood, and on public occasions Pat Hand fired it off. Pat worked in the tannery down across the track and lived up east of our home in what was then called Canada.

One day while Pat was ramming the powder and fillings home the old thing went off, the ramrod tore part of Pat's hand off and Dr. Baker had to fix him up. I have often wondered what was the fate of that old brass cannon.

One of my great pleasures in reading the Republican is the high moral standing of its columns, the absence of patent medicine ads and other trifling stuff.

Might I make a little correction of your note of December 25 last and say that I started working in the Hinkley stave factory when I was 11 years old, going to school winters and passing staves and shaking with ague during the spring and summer. My work continued to progress until I learned most of the different jobs about the factory in both the stave and heading branches, and when the Hinkleys started a branch at Hartford I went over there and did a full man's job at 15 years of age.

A further correction: There were 11 children in the Lyon family, not all staying in Decatur, but I have seen 8 lying in the large front room at one time shaking with ague which was prevalent in those days. I would like to interview the Elliotts and ask them if they found any old hoop skirts up in the attic where my four sisters discarded them when they were worn out. Lot's more I remember, but enough for this time. Tom Lyon.

A CHANCE FOR IMPROVEMENT

Decatur, March 31, 1942.

Dear Sir,—

You asked me to write, so here goes.

First: Can an American born citizen, whose Americanism goes back for generations, be naturalized so as to get a job? Why can he not get a job without a birth certificate when it is no fault of his own that he does not have it, the ones responsible not registering him at birth?

All a foreigner has to do is to be naturalized. That is quicker and cheaper and makes him more certain of a job. An honest to God American can't get a job without paying for it and waiting.

For instance, a man in my town with a family of 7 children and on relief has a chance at $40 a week job in Chicago. He has been trying six months to get his birth certificate from Indiana where he was born. He is met with red tape and waiting and an expense of $25 to $35, and no money to pay it.

Another case is a woman working in Kalamazoo for a company going into war production. She is having so much trouble to get her birth certificate that she is going to quit her job. There are lots of cases like these. Why not let Americans too be naturalized?

I know another man who got a $90 a week job about a year ago because he was able to borrow $75 to pay down for it. The price was $125, $75 down and a certain amount a week out of his pay for the remaining $50. This went to the gangsters who controlled the Union. Another man as good could not get a job, because being an old man of 40 and over the age limit, he could not pay the price.

Second: I see Mrs. President has put over another of her pet play things. It seems she gets everything she goes out to get, regardless of congress, and now she has set out to conscript our women and girls. What are the men fighting for? I thought it was for their homes, and their women are their homes. If both men and women are scattered what is there left? As Walter Winchell says, "Why don't some one stop her?"

Last but not least: One evening I watched 2 soldiers in uniform. They stood in the cold and rain 45 minutes before they could thumb a ride. Evidently they left Fort Custer Saturday afternoon to go home and were due back by Monday morning. These boys always line the roads before a troop movement at the Fort. They had made 50 miles by 9 o'clock and still were not home. They were trying to beg rides to get home for over Sunday, but the nice cars all sped by. Finally an old Model T picked them up.

I have watched this hard luck thumbing for over a year. Once in a while a real man or woman takes a chance that they are not wolves in Uncle Sam's clothing. They are good enough to fight for the duds who won't give them a ride. Why is not something done about that?

Their uniforms should give them passes on any train or bus, or the government should give them a pass home and back whenever they can go. It's a pity to see a soldier forced to beg a ride.

And please tell Lord Beaverbrook we don't need him here. Tell him we did it before and we will do it again.

Respectfully,
A Republican Reader.

REMINISCENCES

Mrs. Grace Chevalier Rawson was a daughter of John and Kate Morla Chevalier who were among the earliest settlers of this community. Chevalier hill was originally named for them. In later years when Mr. Fifield bought the Chevalier farm the hill became known also as Fifield hill.

Grace was born in the old farm house at the foot of this hill 76 years ago. She grew up there and when the western fever broke out here in the early eighties the family moved to Nebraska never to return as residents.

John Chevalier, a man of character and iron nerve, stopped in Decatur about 35 years ago on his way to an eastern city to attend a national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic of which he was a member. He was then about 80 years old and broken in health, but he had made up his mind to attend that reunion and not even the restraining hand of old Father Time could hold him back. He made the trip and returned to his Nebraska home, but not long after the word came back that he had passed away.

Mrs. Rawson, who resides with her sister Effie in Minneapolis, came back a few years ago and keeps up with her relatives and friends here through correspondence.

The following letter from her was written to Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Dailey:

July 13, 1942.

Dear Bess and Bruce,—

Thanks for your card and letter at my birthday time. I was getting anxious about you as you were in a "blackout" so long. Sorry to hear Bruce is not so well. We just can't realize what it means until we lose our health. While I am not so long on good sense or fortune I still am fortunate to be healthy. Of course 76 brings a few aches and pains and a grouch or so, but nothing worth complaining about.

At this time 3 years ago I was sifting about getting ready to go to Decatur. Have just received a card telling that the Morlan reunion is the 26th of July at Cable lake.. I think there are only 3 of the first cousins left to carry on. The Van Hise family never attend and the Richard girls seldom. I hear they are in very poor health. All told there are only 13 of the second generation left and Effie is the youngest. Oh, I forgot Harold Van Hise. He is now 51 but I haven't seen him since he was 2 years old. I think he lives in Northern Michigan.

Thanks for telling me about Hugh Rich. I haven't seen him since '93. Old schoolmates are very scarce now.

Am glad I sent Jack Goble a birthday card. It was rather a comic one, and Lide said it cheered him up a lot for a little while. Had a letter from Clara W. telling of his death.

Am glad you sent Gertie Morlan's as well as Fannie Judie's obituary. I didn't hear from Jennie on my birthday either, but I had 24 cards and each envelope contained a letter or long message and I was very happy over them. The Ever Ready Club sent a joint card of 7 names which was a very pleasant surprise.

I wrote Emma Green on her birthday June 20. Kate sent me word she is poorly with heart trouble, and they tell me Kate is miserable also.

It was 92 degrees yesterday, but it rained last night and is cool again this morning, down to 68. Everything is growing fast now, but corn is very small for the middle of July.

We are all well and busy as ever. Have had oceans of flowers and still have roses and a few annuals. Hope you will write soon. With love and best wishes, Grace.

A PLEASANT TRIP TO CHAMPAIGN

27½ East Main St.,
Champaign, Ill.,
May 18, 1942.

Dear Mr. Moulton,—

I'm saying hello to you and all my Decatur friends up there. As I've been somewhat delayed in my writing about my trip from Decatur May 7th to Champaign. I've been very busy. Am pleased to say we're located now at least for a while.

I certainly enjoyed my trip. Never enjoyed one any better. As the train stopped for 15 minutes at Michigan City big Lake Michigan and the scenery and adventures were very thrilling.

The most inspiring thing was those swarms of sea-gulls flying high above the water and diving down after fishes. Then the train got to Chicago at 4 o'clock.

We laid over in Grand Central there for 1½ hours and a very exciting incident occurred there while we were waiting. We then caught a modern new Diesel electric which got us in Champaign at 9 o'clock. We had very good luck. It was only a few blocks to Ford hotel where we stayed until morning.

As I said before this trip was planned by me astrologically and I'm glad to tell you all it sure worked out, as we'd only been here four days when Mr. Brewer got a job at the Meadow Gold ice cream plant a few blocks from where we are now, which if he proves satisfactoritly, will be a permanent one of which I'm very proud, and so much for this about my removal.

Will say, Mr. Moulton, I'll try to send in some war news later as I'm very busy now. Will soon have work myself. We've had a rain each day lately since I've been here and saw a little snow Friday. Everything is prosperous here, plenty of work and each time I leave Illinois I return, as there's something magnetic about it that draws me back.

Here's wishing you and all my friends the best of everything. Will say hello to Mr. Nelson and hope he's O. K. Sincerely,

Mrs. H. M. Brewer.

P. S.—I'm enclosing 5 cents for which please send me a copy of the paper. Send to 27½ East Main St., Champaign, Ill., c/o Mrs. Dewhurst.

ANOTHER DECATUR BOY MAKES GOOD

To the Republican,—

In the land of fun, Decatur's gift to the world is of course Edgar Bergen. But in these perilous times jokes seem silly things and of little value.

What about "The King's Business"? Decatur has three outstanding men and women proclaiming the gospel in hard places. The first who comes to my mind is our brother in the Lord, Leo Lyle. He is no stranger in our midst as he comes back to Decatur from time to time, and has often spoken in various assemblies. Leo has for many years been laboring among the mountaineers in Virginia. The Lord has blessed his ministry there and a good sized work has been established. He has spent much time working in the memory verse work among school children and in the colored prison camps.

He and his family are residing in Paw Paw until such time as the Lord sends in the money for them to move into their new field. A new door has been opened by the Lord, for them, into the state of Alabama. This new work will be exclusively among the colored people and especially among the children.

Much prayer will be needed for this family as they go into this new field. Christians pray too that their physical, financial and spiritual needs may all be met. Pray too that the hearts of these people may be receptive to the greatest of all messages—John 3:16: "That God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Two other Decatur people are laboring in hard places: Frances Paul Dye and Gladys Deal. The former works among the Jews of Denver, and the latter is laboring in the Kentucky mountains with Brother and Sister Meland under their commander-and-chief, Jesus Christ.

What about your heart, is it as dark as those in the above mentioned regions? What have you done with the Christ?

"Behold, now is the accepted time, behold now is the day of salvation." 2 Cor. 6:2.

PLEASANT MEMORIES

This is an interesting time to receive a letter from Bessie Howland, for the reason that it is commencement time, and it takes us back to that great event in our lives when we were graduated from the grand old Decatur high school.

The class of '89 had for its motto, "Not Wise but Lovers of Wisdom." You will know by it that we were a modest class, and because of our importance will tell you that we were three boys and three girls, or more properly speaking, three men and three women.

We were Hubert O'Dell, Bessie Howland, Minnie Hawks, Albert Gantz, Arba Moulton and Jennie Simpson. Jennie, who became Mrs. Will Lyle, was the youngest of the class and the first to pass away. The others are still living and we wish they might all be here to attend the Alumni reunion Saturday evening.

The members of this class took their entire four years in the high school to Professor Pierce, and all of us have agreed that he was just about the best Professor who ever undertook to teach a "young idea how to shoot." He was often impelled to remind this particular member that if he ever found a problem in arithmetic that he could not solve it was because he did not know some simple rule he should have learned in the grades.

Prof. Pierce went from Decatur to Jackson and resided in that city until he passed away some 20 years or more ago. We were informed just last week by the Acton sisters that Mrs. Pierce is still living, that she resides with her daughter, Mrs. Jessie Pierce Rogers and husband, and is past 94 years of age.

After graduation Bessie Howland took up the work of a trained nurse, became well known as an army nurse and is now in retirement in the National Military Home, as her letter states. She has many relatives and friends here who will enjoy reading her letter and we hope she will not wait a year before writing again.

May 23, 1942.

Dear Arba,

I started to write this letter on the same day enclosed check for another year's subscription to Republican was made, but was interrupted before letter was finished, so now will try again. So glad you sent the paper regardless of me being somewhat in arrears, as I would very much miss even one copy.

I greatly enjoy the letters published, both from Decatur oldtimers and from the boys in the service. They are all very interesting, and even tho I do not know any of them (the boys in the service) I do feel they are all my young friends.

The published letters must be greatly appreciated by the boys as they serve a means of contact among those scattered far and wide throughout the armed forces and who may not meet until the war is over and they are home again.

Even tho we are engaged in another great war and there are many young soldiers quartered on the grounds of this facility, life for me moves along much "as usual."

There have been two or three black outs here and we are informed by the daily press that, from tonight, there will be dimouts all along the coast and extending inland several miles. We are located four miles from the ocean.

"This Week" seems almost like a personal chat with you, Arba. It is always filled with much friendliness and optimism. From its tone I judge that you are well and that life in general is satisfactory to you.

Shall be looking forward to the next arrival day of the Republican.

Sincerely your friend,
Bessie M. Howland.

ENGLISH OUTLOOK MORE HOPEFUL

Mrs. George Kemp received last week the letter printed here. It is from her brother, Harry Bull, a school teacher in Lowestoft, England. His letters have been printed before in this paper and they have been highly interesting descriptions of life in England while her existence is threatened by this World's Worst War.

10 Maldstone Road,
Lowestoft, England.
April 23rd, 1942.

Dear Lizzie and George,

It does not seem 3 weeks since I last wrote you from Hillstown. The time passes very rapidly nowadays.

Ethel and I had a pleasant time together at Easter. * * * Aunt Lucy died just before Easter at the ripe age of 95. She was certainly wonderful for she lived alone in the same house near Carlton station and did her own work.

Thank you for your letter (undated) received ten days ago. It was delightful to hear from you after so long a period. Some letters you write undoubtedly do not arrive. I wonder if you get all of mine.

So Mae is to be married in June. We are very sorry that it is impossible to send her a present, but she has our very best wishes for a happy married life. We shall always be delighted to hear from her. How far is Detroit from you?

You certainly made our mouths water when you mentioned bananas and oranges. We see oranges sometimes, but they are largely reserved for children, while bananas have not been seen for 2 years.

The last orange I had I shared with an evacuee in Peterborough station in January, 1941. But we are not at all badly hit for food, and we have very much to be thankful for. We are not short in any way.

I notice that next week you will be rationed for sugar, and have the same amount, ½ pound per person per week, as we have. We manage nicely, but the tea is not made quite as sweet as in pre-war times, although saccharin tablets are available if needed.

It has been quieter and much more peaceful here lately and we enjoy the longer hours of daylight. Owing to "double" summer time it is not quite dark at half past ten.

The spring flowers are now fully in bloom, and many gardens look very pretty with daffodils, primroses, and violets. Narcissi and tulips will soon make their appearance.

People are using their gardens in many cases for growing lettuces, onions, carrots, turnips, peas, beans and cabbages. Farmers have been very busy in their fields recently and we are hoping for bumper crops later in the year.

We are getting on at school as well as we can under the existing circumstances. Our school is a large one with a staff of 16 teachers, and the

Now and Then About the Same

An old landmark gone. Frank White sold his barbershop building to Neal King for $25. Neal tore it down Monday and will make it over into a barn. The building was built by the late Thomas Brownbridge in the early sixties. He built it for a meat market and lived overhead. Ed. Carney was his chief assistant. After the death of Mr. Brownbridge the building was owned in succeeding times by Mrs. Wheaton, M. S. Carney and Austin E. Dwight and finally was sold to Frank White.

(Frank White built his new shop on the same location. This is where Frank Brewer does his barbering. That has always been a place to give terror to weak knees. In those early days the Chadwick brothers conducted a general store with drygoods in the forefront in the building now occupied by Gale's hardware. There was no limit to what the Chadwicks and Brownbridges and others of their crowd would do. They were all fancy dressers and one day one of the Chadwicks came out in a new silk tile. He couldn't get down the street with it. In the scuffle the hat fell off the owner's head.

Thirty Years Ago in Dowagiac

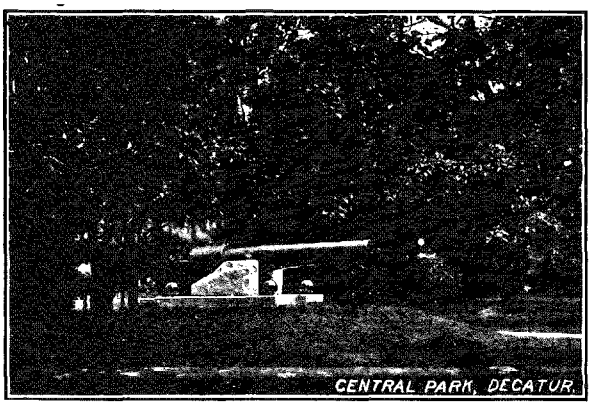
(This story was written by Hank Teeter [Charles Stewart] of Hamilton township and printed in the Dowagiac Daily News. Newell Phelps brought the clipping to the Republican. It concerns some well remembered residents of south Hamilton.)

30 Years Ago

L. B. Parmater, after making his brother, S. S., an extended visit departed Saturday for Vinton, Iowa. Mr. Parmater and his brother are old soldier boys, being 78 and 81 respectively. Cream street also has another old soldier boy, Solomon Stewart, who is 76. They are all boys of '61. Few stop to think that the boys of '61 were boys indeed and some wonder at the longevity of the pension roll. Just let us give you a few figures taken from the records at Washington which will be interesting to many News readers. A total of 2,278,588 were enlisted on the Union side in the Civil war and all but 118,000 were less than 21 years old, 307,000 were 18, 613,000 were 17. Boys were they not? 105,000 were from 14 to 15, and 30 were 13 while 225 were 12 and 38 lads were children so to speak. Still the records go down. There were 25 babies, little drummer boys, 10 years old, whose names if alive are still on the penson roll.

The war ended 46 years ago. If the average soldier was 20 at enlistment and 25 at the close of the rebellion he is only 71 years old now and his wife may be much younger. It is plain the pension roll is probably good for many years yet and we are mighty glad of it, for it's money going where it should go. Hurrah for the boys of '61.

Hank.



THE VILLAGE CANNON

Herewith is the reply to our letter asking if the government advised scrapping the village cannon in Railroad park—

WAR DEPARTMENT

The Adjutant General's Office
Washington
October 7, 1942.

Mr. Arba N. Moulton, Publisher,
The Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Michigan.
Dear Sir:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of October 2nd, relative to the salvage of a cannon in the village park of Decatur.

It is suggested that the cannon be turned over to the Commanding Officer, Fort Custer, Michigan. If it is not possible to do this, it can be sold to a dealer in scrap metals and the proceeds donated to the Government, or applied to the purchase of War Bonds. This would serve the doubly desirable purpose of making the material avaliable of use and helping to provide the funds which can be applied to further the war effort.

The patriotic motive which prompted this inquiry is greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,
J. A. Uhl,
Major General,
The Adjutant General.

According to this Associated Press dispatch from Lansing scrapping of such relics meets opposition:—

The scrapping of old cannon and other metal relics of the past was labeled the work of "publicity-seekers" today by George N. Fuller, secretary of the Michigan Historical commission.

Protesting against the destruction of what he described as irreplaceable relics, he asserted that in many cases they were being junked only to gain publicity for the war salvage campaign.

"The time has not yet come to destroy our relics of the past," Fuller asserted. "If it comes to the time when there simply is no other scrap iron available, then I would be the last one to object, but as long as there are millions of tons of scrap lying on farms in backyards there is no justification for the destruction of our cultural and historical relics.

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

It seems to us that as the years go by the name of Abraham Lincoln grows in greatness. We see more and more clearly that the underlying purpose of his life was to exemplify the principle which he so clearly and simply defined in his second inaugural address: "With malice toward none; with charity for all." It comes close to expressing in another way the Golden Rule.

Lincoln lived to see the Civil War through and peace declared and before the work of reconstruction began he was cruelly murdered. The murderer was known and answered for the crime with his life, as did several others implicated but the entire facts concerning the plotting to bring about his death were never entirely revealed.

The story printed here was taken from the March issue of Hobbies Magazine:

A NEW CHAPTER ON LINCOLN

(By King Hostick)

On July 26, 1947, a new chapter on the life of Abraham Lincoln will be unfolded. At that time the Emancipator will speak to a new generation of American people through the medium of his personal papers that were bequeathed to the Government of the United States and deposited for safekeeping with the Library of Congress, in Washington, D.C., in 1926, by the will of Robert Todd Lincoln, the President's son. Historians on that red-letter day will be allowed to view the papers that for these many years have silently withheld their closely guarded secrets.

The collection, comprising more than 10,000 letters from and to the War President, original drafts of his state papers, and contemporary newspaper clippings, was delivered by the President's son, Robert T. Lincoln, to the Library 5 years before his death in 1926. By a strange agreement executed between the Library and the younger Lincoln, the papers were to remain under lock and seal to be unseen for at least 21 years from the day of Robert's death.

Today they are safely lodged in four massive vaults to remain undisturbed until the 21-year time limit decree has passed. After that time and at the discretion of the Congressional Library, they may be viewed by historians and Lincoln biographers.

The death of Lincoln's son occurred July 26, 1926, thus automatically withholding these priceless documents [illegible] until July 26, 1947. It [illegible] was fully intended that the [illegible] following him was to do [illegible] in continuing something [illegible] the life of his famous father, about whom there have been more volumes written than any other single American.

Today, 77 years later, Lincoln's death is still a matter of controversy. Around the several futile attempts made against Lincoln's life appears a veil of mystery which may be cast aside with the opening of the locked papers. Lincoln's biographers are not fully certain of their convictions when facts pertaining to his death have been weighed. The sealed papers may reveal evidence that Lincoln had information relative to assassination attempts and plots against his life on which today's historians know nothing.

It is also known that several members of Abraham Lincoln's Cabinet were insanely jealous of the President, and it has been predicted by certain biographers that the impounded papers will bring forth secrets in the form of written evidence of treason on the part of a particular member of the Cabinet. According to one author it was because of this evidence Robert felt it best for all concerned that his father's papers be burned.

It is not too much absurd to believe that Lincoln may have had graphic facts of a subversive faction working within his own trusted group of advisers. Were such a thing true, it is not difficult to reason to believe that the ultimate liquidation of such a group would have been the very death of Abraham Lincoln.

So in July, 1947, the benign, human influence of Abraham Lincoln known to the people of [illegible] generations past, will again be felt by this generation, and many of the [illegible] things in connection with the life and death of this illustrious American, [illegible] his trying days in the White House may be buried forever.

Let us consider for a moment the strange circumstances which prompted Robert T. Lincoln to withdraw, literally, these valuable documents from a burning fire to which he had decided that they must be consigned, and instead deposit them with the stipulation that no person could see them for nearly a quarter of a century.

According to Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, who is credited with having saved the collection from certain destruction, he had just returned from Europe in August, 1927 when urged by a mutual acquaintance, Horace G. Young, to see his friend Robert Lincoln at once.

On being rushed into Roberts' library, Butler noticed an old-fashioned trunk standing near the bookcases, and he asked Robert if he intended to do some travelling. The son of the famous American answered that the trunk contained some papers of his father and that he thought it best that they be burned. After considerable remonstration, the educator convinced the younger Lincoln that the papers, because of their historic significance, belonged not only to the people of America but also to the people of the entire world; and, therefore must not be destroyed.

Before leaving Robert's home on that day, Butler extracted a promise that the manuscripts would not be burned but would be deposited in the Library of Congress for safe-keeping where they today rest and await the day their secrets will be released to the world.

What information was contained in those papers that prompted Robert T. Lincoln to want to burn them? Will they shed a new light on the colossal figure of the Emancipator?

Assuming that the papers contained startling information which ultra-conservative Robert decided must not be divulged, at least until he had been dead for a number of years, let us imagine what facts may be sealed within those vaults.

Possibly new documentary evidence on the several attempts at assassination with which Lincoln was confronted during his terms in the White House will be exposed.

In the files of the White House an envelope was found after Lincoln's death, bearing the ominous word "assassination" written across the top in the President's well-known hand. Into this envelope the Chief Executive had carefully filed letters threatening his life.

The fact has been established that Lincoln fully accepted the probability of death at the hands of an assassin. Lincoln realized that many people in certain sections of the country regarded him as no less than a tyrant. Futile attempts had already been made against his life and he knew one of these attempts might easily materialized into a grim reality.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

Harriett and Alonzo Benn.

The magic spell of Christmas eve
  Will soon be here again,
In every home where children dwell,
  In city, hamlet, glen;
And grown-ups unemotional,
  Or those most staid, austere,
Should warm the cockles of their hearts
  Dispensing Christmas cheer.

Cold hearts are like a fireplace bare
  Of [illegible]
[illegible]
  And play[illegible]
And that they ever hoped and prayed
  For Santa to appear,
With prancing reindeer, and a sleigh
  Chock full of Christmas cheer.

A teddy-bear, electric train,
  A doll, a drum, a book,
And stockings filled and neatly hung
  About the inglenook
Will make the childish hearts o'erflow
  With happiness sublime,
For Christmas should bring peace and joy
  To homes in every clime.

Let's heap the fireplace with huge logs,
  Let's fill our hearts with cheer
By making happy some poor waif
  Or kiddies we hold dear;
Forgetting not our old time friends
  With cheer and words of praise.
And make the coming Christmas seem Like those of childhood days.

We were working for a collection agency on the fourth floor of the Ashland block, Chicago, in the spring of '93 when 'Gentleman Jim Corbett' came in on some business with one of the attorneys. Somebody whispered, "There goes Corbett," and the big room full of book-keepers and clerks became alive with repressed excitement.

When he went out a hundred or more pairs of eyes were upon him and curious people had gathered along the hallway to the elevator. As one of the curious we have not forgotten his appearance. He was portly and pompous, and immaculately dressed. His black velvet collared overcoat, white silk scarf, silk tile hat and gloves on his hands stand out in our memory.

Corbett did not look up or smile, but kept on his way to the elevator, stepped into it and disappeared without apparently noticing that any other person was within a mile of him.

Corbett was a great man, of course, he had to be accepted as the greatest man in the world, for he had knocked out John L. Sullivan. But none of us liked him. We all admired Sullivan. He was still our hero, and we hoped to see him 'come back.' It just didn't seem to the boys of that time as though any man on earth could lick John L. Sullivan.

Corbett was not popular, he was stuck up and proud. Sullivan was the mighty slugger, the big, good natured, generous hearted, happy-go-lucky Irishman whom everybody liked.

It was the first time that a man in his thirties was considered an old man. Sullivan was 34 and it was regretfully acknowledged that he had had his day, that he was too old to fight. Corbett was eight years his junior, and after that September night in '92 he was rated the cleverest boxer the world had hitherto known, or perhaps will ever know.

Sullivan was the first world champion, establishing the title in 1882 when he met Paddy Ryan in a bare knuckle fight for $5,000 a side. The word "knockout" was coined to describe that fight.

Sullivan's greatest fight was with Jake Kilrain at Richburg, Mississippi, July 8, 1889. Sullivan won it in 75 rounds.

Reading in the announcement of plays at the Cozy that "Gentleman Jim" is to be shown here soon prompted these reminiscences. The Chicago papers say it is a colorful and thrilling movie.

Mae Tinee in the Tribune says:

"'Gentleman Jim' essays to be a picture biography of the suave, and dapper Corbett, and Erroll Flynn in the title role presents a flashy and sympathetic characterization which is convincing and entertaining . . . But [illegible] quered, as he presented the symbolic championship belt that had been his for so long to Corbett, the victor, on the night of September 1, 1892, after the bout in New Orleans.

"A celebration party for Corbett is being held in a big hotel. . . . Champagne corks are popping and everybody is having a high old time. . . . The exuberant, boastful Corbett is here, there and everywhere — the biggest guy in the world [for the moment] in his own and his friends' estimation. . . .

"A great, lonely figure suddenly looms in a doorway, hesitates, and comes forward. . . . Silence falls on the room. . . . John L. Sullivan walks over to where Corbett, suddenly serious, awaits him and holds out the belt, with a few honest words of tribute for his recent adversary's prowess and a good wish for his future. Corbett responds quickly and in kind. Sullivan, stiffly erect, departs—like a man walking in a daze. . . . It's little he has said or done—but you're fumbling for your handkerchief. You have seen a brave warrior go down—'head bloody but unbowed.' . . . And in your heart you fiercely honor a MAN!"

Something Warm: A Knitting Song for Great Grandmothers.

Written by Laura E. Richards, 92 years old, and printed in the 'Trade Winds' column of the Saturday Review of Literature. You will know at once from the poem that she is a wonderful old lady, seeking still to be of service to her fellowmen:—"Serene I sit, and knit, and knit, Something warm for you."

Soldiers all and Sailors
Marines and "Eagles" too,
Here I sit,
And knit, and knit
Something warm for you.

I cannot march, I cannot shoot,
I never learned to fly,
But give me wool and needles,
And all my best I'll try.

To daughters, nieces, granddaughters,
The sterner tasks I leave,
I cannot, cannot turn a heel,
Nor cope with neck or sleeve.

Straight across and back again
Is all that I can do.
But yet 'twill form
Something warm,
Gallant boys, for you.

I never saw a submarine,
Nor yet a deadly bomb;
I'm usually sound asleep
Before the black-outs come.

I cannot hear the siren,
Nor yet the fire alarm;
You see there's really nothing
Can do me any harm.

So, soldiers all and sailors,
Marines and "Eagles" too,
Serene I sit,
And knit, and knit,
Something warm for you.

It was 11:15 p. m. last week Wednesday. We were sitting in a warm room writing out some letters from the boys in the service, when that dreaded alarm of fire sounded out above the storm.

The sound of the Chief's auto siren followed and firemen from different parts of the village sent their cars through drifting snow to the fire station.

There is always an uneasy feeling in the mind of some individuals at the alarm of fire, until its location is learned and then the uneasiness turns to regret for the unfortunate ones.

This uneasiness is lessened somewhat by the confidence imposed in our voluntary fire department of which Decatur has one of the best.

The loyalty of our firemen to their home town can hardly be expressed in words. They receive no salary. They do not always receive a thank you. But whenever that siren is sounded, be it day or night, in fair weather or storm, they drop their work or arise from a comfortable bed to rush into a fight with the elements that may hold them to hard dangerous work and severe exposure for hours.

All praise to the home town volunteer firemen and when we, their fellow citizens, can see a way to express to them our appreciation for their services, let us never hold back from doing it. It may be our home or our business that they will next be called upon to save, and we may rest assured that to save it they will put forth their best effort.

Emeline Childs died June 25, 1907, at the age of 80. That was 35 years ago. Her maiden name was White and her maternal grandmother was Anna Hull, daughter of Commodore Isaac Hull.

Mrs. Childs possessed something of the forceful character of her illustrious great grandfather. He was a cabin boy at 14 and rose to the command of a ship in the West Indian trade. In 1798 he entered the newly established American Navy as a lieutenant. He was appointed to the frigate Constitution which he commanded as captain from 1806.

Hull was an expert seaman and in 1812 his skill enabled him to escape from an English squadron after being pursued three days and nights. The same year he captured the British frigate Guerriere after a battle of 30 minutes.

The Guerriere was so badly damaged that she had to be burned, while Hull's frigate escaped with such slight damage as to gain for her the name of "Old Ironsides." Hull received a medal from congress and swords of honor.

Mrs. Childs, the great granddaughter of the great naval hero, came with her young husband to this new country of which our village was the center in 1854 when Decatur was but six years old, and she lived here until her death.

The Republican of June 27, 1907, contains a sketch of her life from which is taken the following:—

Mr. Childs was a carriage and wagon maker and had a shop on west Delaware street which became later the Theodore Harlan property and now is the site upon which the handsome residence of Marion E. Chadwick is located. (This is the present home of Mrs. Jennie Borst.)

In 1857 the family moved into the house which has been Mrs. Child's home to the time of her death, and Mr. Childs died in the same house in 1860, before the upright was completed.

In those early days Mrs. Childs suffered hardships which only a brave and successful woman could surmount. Left a widow with four small children and no property from which she could obtain an income, she was compelled to meet conditions which would discourage one less determined.

Mrs. Childs worked at anything she could get to do and kept her family together until they grew up and could do for themselves. She did dressmaking and fancy needle work, painted signs for the merchants and pictures for the home and made beautiful artificial flowers.

She puttied all the glass into the windows of the Methodist church when it was built, and there were but few nights in those early years that her lamp was not burning until midnight.

To her there was no place like the old home in Decatur. She found a warm welcome with her children but was not contented until she was back to the little house between the churches and there she lived a quiet and peaceful life to its close.

There are so many interesting things to write about that one need never want for something to do to keep himself busy, and the way one thing leads on to another it becomes a natural conclusion that life is one never ending continuous story.

From coming across the above account of the death of one of Decatur's pioneer residents we are led on to write about one of the most famous vessels of the United States Navy, the Constitution, commanded by Commodore Isaac Hull, her great grandfather.

In the battle with the Guerriere, the history states, the English vessel was left a total wreck and 79 of her crew were lost, to 14 of the American crew.

The Guerriere was sinking and could not be towed into port. She was therefore blown up. Hull sailed into Boston with his prisoners, to such an ovation as few men have ever earned in so short a time. In less than 25 minutes of actual fighting he had lifted the despised American Navy and nation to an equality with the proudest in the world; and drew from Great Britain such an explosion of rage and humiliation as she has never known before or since.

The Constitution saw much active service and won other notable victories after brilliant fighting.

Finally, in 1830 she was reported unseaworthy and condemned to be broken up, but Oliver Wendell Holmes published in the Boston Advertiser his thrilling poem, "Old Ironsides," and the public clamor excited by it saved the noble vessel.

She was rebuilt and again put into service in 1833. In 1877 she was again rebuilt and took her last trip across the Atlantic the next year. In 1897 she was roofed in at the Boston Navy Yard and was used as a barrack ship until 1925. She was restored by popular subscription and in 1931 visited several ports on the Atlantic seaboard.

Most Republican readers are familiar with the poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, but as they may not have read it of late years we are printing it here:

OLD IRONSIDES

(September 14, 1830.)

Ay, tear her shattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky;
Beneath it rung the battle shout,
And burst the cannon's roar;—
The meteor of the ocean air
Shall sweep the clouds no more.

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,

When winds were hurrying o'er the flood,
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread,
Or know the conquered knee;—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

Oh, better that her shattered hulk
Should sink beneath the waves;
Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
And there should be her grave;
Nail to the mast her holy flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the god of storms,
The lightning and the gale!

Because of this poem, written in 1830, we were able to see and traverse the deck of the Constitution two years ago last summer.

Kelly, former assistant cashier of the American National Bank of Kalamazoo, who was called into active service with a commission as major Dec. 27, 1940, has been commissioned lieutenant colonel in the quartermaster corps, and assigned as quartermaster of the 11th armored division. His division is now stationed at Camp Polk, La.

Col. Kelly entered military service when he was 17, enlisting Nov. 19, 1917, in the air corps. He received training at Kelly Field, Tex., and also at Ellington and Gerstner fields. At the close of World War I he entered the banking business.

His continuing interest in military affairs led to active participation when the officers reserve corps was established in the early twenties. His steady work won him advancement through the grades from his entering commission, in the quartermaster corps, that of second lieutenant.

He has taken his summer vacations since 1926 for active duty with the regular army, his last such tour of duty having been with the 338th Infantry, 85th division.

Further Information About Indians Reveals Treachery of Shavehead

---

Vandalia, Michigan,
April 8, 1942.

Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Michigan.

Dear Arbie:—

Pursuant to our visit a couple of weeks ago and the topic of "Shavehead," which we discussed, I have checked on different histories of Cass and St. Joseph counties in Michigan, and of St. Joseph and Elkhart counties in Indiana, and there seems to be but very little authentic information in any of them relative to his band. It appears he was never regarded as an appointed Chief, but rather as a leader or the renegade head of a miscellaneous group of ill savored savages that roamed the eastern part of Cass county, western St. Joseph county and adjacent territory in Northern Indiana in the early part of the 19th century.

It was not until 1825 that Cass county began to be settled by white people coming in from the east, west and south, for prior to this time, Michigan had been regarded as worthless for agricultural purposes, it being a vast expanse of swamps, sand-dunes and timber.

Three Bands of Indians

When these settlers arrived they found this section inhabited by three bands of the Pottowattomie tribe comprising in all, from 500 to 1000, according to the different histories. In the west and Berrien was the Pokagon band or family. In the north east on Little Prairie Ronde and extending to the Schoolcraft Prairie was Weesaw's band, and in the south east was Chief Pokamin and his band, also Shavehead and his band of 75 to 100.

The Pottowattomies were considered very friendly to the white settlers, except Shavehead and his small band. He was an ugly, ornery cuss, one of the most notorious characters among the Indians of this section, and many anecdotes and traditions have been handed down to the generations. He was a sullen, treacherous, vindictive savage, the meanest Indian of them all, according to almost universal testimony.

His appearance was in accordance with his evil nature. He had naturally a vicious and cruel look which was set off by a peculiar device—that of shaving nearly all the hair from his head. Only a lock on the top and a strip down the back was left.

A Treacherous Indian

Shavehead never ceased to regard the white man as an enemy and an intruder upon the Western soil. He boasted of, and it is very probable that he enacted a bloody role in the Fort Dearborn massacre and took an active part in all the hostilities against the settlers and warring tribes of Indians from other sections in which his tribe was engaged.

He maintained his hatred for the whites, in particular, when all the rest of the Pottowattomies were living among them in peace. His feeling may perhaps be accounted for by the fact he never signed any treaties and consequently received no annuities. He was always suspected of evil designs.

The Hon. George Meachum is authority for the statement that during the Sauk war scare Gen. Joseph Brown ordered Chief Pokagon to "take care of Shavehead," meaning that he should be watched or guarded so that he could not join the enemy, should they penetrate the country.

Shavehead and his comparatively small band lived for the most part in the vicinity of Shavehead Lake and adjacent prairie to the east, which likewise bears his name and around what is now Mottville, for it is there where settlers had to cross the St. Joseph river. He exacted as exorbitant tolls from them as he could, until, it is said one settler pounced upon him and all but killed the old Chief. He committed many petty depredations and was very insolent whenever and wherever he dared to be.

Shavehead's Death

Concerning the death of troublesome old Shavehead, there has always been some mystery. There are several stories but I will give two that agree in essentials at least. Both belong in the shadowy borderland of history where it emerges in the broad, uncertain domain of tradition.

One is in connection with an old frontiersman who lived near Shavehead Prairie by hunting and trapping. He was supposed to have been the only white man Shavehead really cared for and they were great friends of long standing.

It seems that they were at some gathering or pow wow and Shavehead, "well oiled with fire water," became talkative, ugly and wild. He complained that "deer gettum scarce. White man gettum—me gettum white man." Shavehead and his white friend later departed for home and that was the last ever seen of Shave-head.

The other story, and generally considered more authentic, was in connection with one Job Wright, hermit of Diamond Lake Island. Wright was one of the very few who escaped the Fort Dearborn Massacre in 1812. Wright's wife and children were killed there.

Wright and Shavehead were avowed enemies. Wright's cabin was burned and Shavehead was suspected of doing it by practically all the white settlers.

In September, 1840 there was a gathering of Indians and whites at what is Stone lake at the edge of Cassopolis. Shavehead was there, drunk and troublesome. He boasted of his bravery and made many threats, mentioning the Fort Dearborn Massacre and the scalps he obtained there, and stating there was one more scalp he was going to get. Wright was heard to say, "Yes, it is him. We fought by the wagons. He burned my cabin."

Wright was seen later in the day, loading his rifle and was also seen following the trail Shavehead took when he departed, though it was in the direction of Wright's cabin.

Shavehead was never seen after that day and it appears no one ever investigated, for he was universally disliked by Indians and whites, alike.

Apparently I was mistaken about Shavehead being buried near White Pigeon, for in this, my recent search, I find no mention of his death other than I have written.

This is no story of mine, Arbie, save piecing together from notes I took from the various histories aforementioned, but maybe you can use some of it in connection with other stories of Shavehead that may come to your desk, should you care to.

Thanking you, I remain,

Sincerely,

Roy C. Beardslee.

Miss Frances Toof, now engaged in orchestra work in Grand Rapids, did not come home for the past week end, but instead entertained her friend Miss Naida Foster of Detroit, at her Grand Rapids room.

Peeka, The Potawatamie

By Harry Garrett

Shavehead

Shavehead was tramping noiselessly through the soft, light snow along the shore of Diamond Lake. He was on the track of a wild turkey, and his well trained eye told him that the bird was not far away. Suddenly there was a flapping of wings, and, looking up, he saw it gracefully sail into a tree. A little way from the tree lay a large log, if he could get behind this, he would have a good shot. Unstrapping his snowshoes, dodging carefully from tree to tree, he at last reached the log, and was about to fire, when the turkey, with a loud gobble, spread its wings and flew far out into the forest. With a grunt of disgust Shavehead was about to arise when something else caught his eye.

Out in the lake, a few rods from the shore lay a little island of about eighty acres. This island was covered with forest. On the edge of the woods, close to the shore of the island, directly opposite of where Shavehead lay, was the hut of Old Jim, the Diamond lake hermit. There he lived all alone, five miles from the nearest white family. It was reported among the Indians that he had money hid somewhere, still they had never seen it. They knew that every month he would go to St. Joe with a pack of furs for which he would receive a good sum of money. From this they reasoned he must have it concealed somewhere about the island.

Old Jim

As Shavehead was about to come out from behind the log, buckle on his snowshoes and tramp on, he saw Old Jim come out of his hut and look carefully about him. There was something mysterious in his actions, so Shavehead lay still. Satisfied no one was around Old Jim took up an ax and went up to a large sycamore tree a little way out in the forest. Then he struck the tree a few blows close down by its roots, and, after prying a little, about two square feet of the side of the tree fell out. Reaching in he drew out two iron kettles, set them on the ground, and then put back the square good as before. But as he set one of the kettles down, something slid off the top and lay glittering on the ground. A ray of the setting sun fell upon it and it shone with a golden lustre. Gold, said Shavehead to himself, and his Indian eye gleamed animously. After Old Jim had entered his hut, Shavehead arose from the log, fastened on his snowshoes, and tramped far out into the forest. There he built a fire and lay down beside it to await the morning, when he would return to the Indian village.

Pokagon

Devils Lake is about one mile long and a quarter of a mile wide. Near its western end lay three small islands. Opposite these islands on the shore of the lake, was the Potawatamie village. This was the largest and most important of their villages in the southern part of Michigan, for it was the home of the great Potawatamie chief, Pokagon. Pokagon was getting old, though yet he could tramp many a mile without fatigue. He was loved by all his tribe. Though brave and strong, he ruled his people by love, not fear. He allowed the missionaries from the east to build their little church a few miles to the south of Devil's Lake, then he and his beautiful daughter Peeka were among the first converts. Since that time the mighty chief and his daughter could be seen every Sunday morning at the church. Peeka was a typical Potawatamie. At the age of nineteen she could run as swift, shoot as straight, or paddle a canoe as good as any one in the village. Her voice was soft and musical. She was kind to everyone. Around her lips a smile was always hovering.

Wanee

One night Peeka sat alone in her wigwam, humming a little song the missionaries had taught her. The flap parted and Wanee strode in. Wanee, though the youngest, was the greatest warrior of the tribe. He stood next to Pokagon in importance. He was loving and kind. No one could bring in more game than he; no one could paddle a canoe any swifter; no one could endure more hardships. For this he was looked up to and respected. Wanee's especial friend was Shavehead. They could nearly always be seen together, although Shavehead was the opposite in character. He was only a little behind Wanee in those qualities that make an Indian great. He was rash and impetuous. He was respected through fear. He hesitated at nothing which would be the means of obtaining his ends. Wanee could see these things less plainly than others of the tribe, for he and Shavehead had been friends since their childhood.

"How," said Wanee, as he entered Peeka's wigwam.

"How," returned Peeka.

Love

Then Wanee crossed over and sat down on the bearskin beside her. The fire at the doorway blazed up and threw a red glow over the interior. The bronze features of Peeka trembled. Her eyes shown like stars. She sat beside the warrior she loved. For a few moments they sat in the dull red glow in silence. She felt the clasp of his great brown hand about hers. She thought of the awful power at its command. It could strangle a young wolf with greatest of ease. Now its touch was soft and gentle. Thus for a few moments these children of nature conversed in that silent language, then Peeka spoke:

"Wanee, when does Shavehead return?"

"In the morning," answered Wanee.

"You and Shavehead are the best of friends," went on Peeka, " but you must watch him, for I'm afraid he will harm you some time."

"Nonsense, Peeka, what makes you think that?"

"He knows that you are the greatest warrior in the tribe," replied Peeka. "He knows he is next. He is becoming jealous. He would stop at nothing to obtain that first place. But he is becoming jealous of you in another way. He loves me!"

Wanee started. Could it be that Shavehead did love Peeka? He never had thought it. Still he trusted his friend, he felt no harm. "But does he know that you do not love him," he at length replied.

"No I have never told him, fearing to arouse his anger. But I must do something soon, it can't go on much longer."

The fire was dying low. They heard the footsteps of Pokagon, so Wanee arose to go. At the door he met the chief.

"How," said Pokagon.

"How," returned Wanee, passed on, and soon was slumbering in his wigwam.

Mystery

Shortly after sunrise next morning Shavehead came into camp. He went about more overbearing than ever.

Near one of the islands is a place the Indians call Devil's Hole. There is a mystery about this place. A few years before a squaw was crossing over to this island on the ice, and when nearly there, she was seen to go down, and has never been seen since. The next winter a deer was crossing the ice and disappeared in the same place. The Indians began to look upon it in superstitious awe.

The afternoon of Shavehead's return he and Wanee were out fishing. Just before dark they saw a little girl making straight towards Devil's Hole. They called, and waved their hands, but all in vain, she neither saw nor heard them. On she sped until all at once she gave a cry, and sank before their eyes.

For a week after this incident the camp was quiet. Then one day Pokagon and Wanee went on a hunting trip. Shavehead remained in camp. After they had gone he went to the wigwam of Peeka. She was alone. He strode noisily in and grunted a greeting.

What a contrast, thought Peeka, to Wanee, who came in soft and still, whose voice was low and kind, and whose touch was light and caressing. After a brief silence Shavehead spoke.

"Peeka, I love you, I think I have told you that before. To-day I ask you to be my wife."

This took Peeka unawares. But her mind worked fast. She did not want to tell him that she did not love him. She did not want to tell him that she was promised to Wanee, for she feared for Wanee's life.

"Shavehead," she finally answered, "when you can come into my wigwam and pour into my lap more gold than any warrior in the village, then, perhaps, I'll be your wife."

"Will you? Then you're mine," he answered and left her.

"Never," she said after he had gone, and her black eyes snapped.

Treachery

One night about a week later, when all the village was wrapped in slumber, Shavehead arose, buckled on his snowshoes, threw his gun over his shoulder, and departed toward the southeast. After about three hours' journey he found himself again on the shore of Diamond Lake. Before him was the hut of Old Jim. Near it was the coveted gold. He crossed over to the island and pounded on the door of the hut.

"Who's there?" shouted Old Jim.

Shavehead gave a shove and the door fell in. A bright moon was shining, and he saw Old Jim sitting up in bed on the opposite side of the room. He threw his gun to his shoulder, a deafening crash rang out upon the still night air, and when the smoke cleared away, Old Jim lay upon the floor with a bullet in his head. Shavehead then went to the sycamore tree, took out the gold, and was soon striding towards home. By the time the rest were astir in the Indian village, he was in his wigwam with the gold safely buried.

The winter wore slowly on. Spring was near at hand. Shavehead and Wanee decided to have one more hunt that winter. The next week they would start, and would not return for many moons.

At last the night before their departure arrived. Peeka had been with Wanee all day, and had cautioned him again and again to beware of Shavehead. She was sitting all alone in her wigwam, when suddenly the flap was lifted and Shavehead strode in. Going directly over to where she sat, he emptied a hand full of gold in her lap.

"Now my reward," he said.

For a moment Peeka could not speak. She never thought for a moment that he could obtain the gold. She decided to tell him all.

"Shavehead, I can never marry you. I do not love you."

"No, but you love Wanee," Shavehead thundered.

"Yes," replied Peeka. "Here, take your gold," and she threw it on the bearskin at his feet.

Shavehead gathered it up and departed.

Wanee and Shavehead had been hunting nearly two weeks. They were on the banks of the St. Joe. It was growing dark and time to camp, but they could find no suitable place. Finally they decided to cross. Wanee took the paddle and Shavehead sat in the stern. When they had reached the center of the river, Shavehead reached down at his feet and picked up his tomahawk. He drew back his arm, and then with all his mighty strength, it flew from his hand. His aim had been true. Striking Wanee in the head, it went crashing through the skull, and buried itself deep in the brain. With never a cry he threw up his hands and fell into the dark waters. In a moment all was quiet. The peaceful waters of the St. Joe rolled over the body of Wanee.

Shavehead hunted a few days alone, then returned to Devils Lake. There he told how Wanee, after killing a deer, and loading it into a boat, had tried to cross the river, but when about half way across, was capsized and drowned.

All believed this except one broken hearted maiden, and that was Peeka. Not for one moment did she doubt but that Shavehead was the cause of Wanee's death.

Revenge

A week rolled by and again Shavehead stood in the wigwam alone with Peeka. But before he could say a word, Peeka arose and stood before him. She drew herself to her full height; her proud head was thrown back; her eyes flashed in anger. Her long brown arm was pointed directly at Shavehead, who stood cowering before this haughty Princess of the Woods. At length she spoke.

"I know why you came here. I know what you want. But you may as well go out into yonder forest and talk to the senseless oak. Never shall I become the wife of Shavehead. You it was who murdered the hermit or Diamond Lake that you might throw his gold at my feet; you it was who closed in death the eyes of my lost Wanee. Go, and never address Peeka again."

For once Shavehead was defeated. Before him stood Peeka motionless as a statue. He fell under the power of her eyes, and obeyed them. Without uttering a word he wheeled and went out.

The next Sunday Pokagon and Peeka went to the little church as usual. No smile played round her lips now. Her face was sad and thoughtful. She sang the simple songs as never before. They lingered a long time after the sermon before they returned to the village.

That night just at sunset, someone saw a figure out on the lake, going straight toward Devil's Hole. The alarm was spread, but too late, she was on its very brink. It was Peeka. She kept saying over and over a little prayer she had been taught. She knew she was very near, she shut her eyes. All at once she felt herself going down. She felt the cold water about her. It seemed an age, but at last it closed over her and she knew no more.

There was one who stood on the shore who could not bear to see the sight. Shavehead had turned his back.

Presbyterian Church Celebrates 90th Anniversary

(History of the Presbyterian church—condensed from a history written by John F. Brigham, and printed in the Republican on February 1 and 8, 1940.)

The First Presbyterian church of Decatur was organized by the Rev. Marcus Harrison on February 1, 1852, and consisted of the following members, Mrs. Lydia House Harrison, Mrs. Eli Rich, and Joseph McClintock. At the time Joseph McClintoch was elected and ordained a ruling elder.

Early in 1855 the Rev. M. Harrison, a missionary under the American Home Mission Society, was obliged to resign because of ill health, and he was followed by the Rev. Samuel Fleming.

Work on the first house of worship erected in Decatur was started under the direction of Mr. Harrison, and brought to completion during the pastorate of Mr. Fleming. The building, costing about $1,000, was dedicated on September 18, 1856.

This first building was used for services until 1868, when it became necessary to make plans for a larger church. The building was sold to Jack Tuttle who moved it over onto St Mary's street where it was used for a time as an Universalist church, and later sold to the Catholics and used by them as a church for many years.

The second building was erected by the Presbyterians in 1869 and dedicated on September 1 of that year, at tthe cost of $7,000.

Encouraged by the success of the Ladies' bazaar in December, 1887, those who had long desired repairs and redecoration of the church came forward. Over four hundred dollars was obtained by subscription. The audience room was shortened, rooms with sliding doors added above and below, and a new entrance, vestibule and stair case installed. The Ladies' Society decorated the whole interior and covered the entire auditorium with new carpet at a total of over $250.00.

About the year 1903 a new Estey pipe organ was purchased and installed at the approximate cost of $1,100.

In 1917 the second building was destroyed by fire, with most of the contents. The pulpit, some of the pews, a piano, and several articles of small furniture were saved, but the rest, including the organ, went up in smoke.

A new building was soon started, and was dedicated on May 4, 1919. This building, erected at the cost of $30,000, is now the [illegible] of the Presbyterian [illegible] lot of the [illegible] and [illegible] over 85 [illegible] of God [illegible] one place in the [illegible]

Tall Dutch Boys Star On Decatur's Unbeaten Team

School Has Scored 928 Points This Season; Ended Schedule Friday By Defeating Watervliet 46 to 20.

By JERRY HAGAN
in Kalamazoo Gazette

This town is all excited about its high school basketball team. And it has reason to be.

Decatur has won 17 straight games this year and already has scored 928 points while the opposition has collected only 286. The season ended Friday night when Watervliet, a Little Eight conference team, fell before the locals by a score of 46 to 20. Decatur is looking ahead now to the district and regional tournaments.

Coach Ken Higgins is the power behind Decatur's strong team. Ken is a little fellow with a bundle of energy. But his team isn't little. Six of the first seven players are tall Dutch boys. Slager is six feet four. The Klinkers cousins both are six feet two and Overley is another six footer. Three more squad members are only one inch under six feet in stature.

Decatur has scoring power—an average of 55 points per game. But Decatur does all right on defense, too, holding the opposition to an average of 16 points per game this year.

The only thing about Decatur's team that rubs the wrong way: The squad is so strong that the games haven't been interesting. In 17 contests, only one was the least bit close. That was against the Dowagiac Chieftains of the Big Seven Class B conference. Decatur won that game, 28 to 21. Since, Decatur has scored 60 points a game and has been over 70 twice, including a 71-11 victory over Paw Paw which earlier in the season had held Decatur to 42 points.

Decatur's 1940-1941 season record was almost as good but an overconfident team was upset in the district tournament competition. Decatur has waited a year to make up for that mistake. Right now, W. Klinkers and Nash both have knee injuries. But they expect to be back in stride again by the time of the tournaments.

This season's record:

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF THE PLEDGE TO THE FLAG

The Governors of many states and the Mayors of many cities issued proclamations urging the schools, patriotic societies and citizens generally to suitably observe the Golden Anniversary of the Pledge to the Flag under the sponsorship of the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, of which Mrs. William H. Pouch, New York City, is President General, and under the supervision of Miss Elizabeth Malott Barnes, Washington, D. C., National Chairman, and Mrs. Alonzo Newton Benn, Chicago, General National Vice Chairman Committee on Correct Use of the Flag, who were splendidly assisted by State Regents and other officers and members.

Of the many, many public observances throughout the length and breadth of the United States, that held Sunday, October 18, 1942, in Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, D. C., will undoubtedly longer be remembered due to having been addressed by Dr. William Tyler Page, President General of The United States Flag Association, minority clerk emeritus of the House, author of "The American's Creed" and long recognized as an outstanding authority on Congress.

As a lad Dr. Page served as a page in the House in 1881 and continued unbroken service in the House from that far off time until his sudden death Monday night, October 19, 1942, the second night following his Golden Anniversary address, at the age of 74, at his home in Friendship Heights, Maryland.

Inasmuch as Dr. Page's address may well be considered authoritative, it is given here in full for future historians to make use of, consisting as it does of his last public utterances.

The History of the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag

(Address by Dr. William Tyler Page, President General of the United States Flag Association, given upon the commemoration of the Golden Anniversary of the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag under the auspices of the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution at Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, D. C., October 18, 1942.)

Our country is now engaged in a war to preserve the liberties of which the Flag of the United States is the glorious symbol. It is particularly appropriate, therefore, that we observe the 50th—the golden—anniversary of the Pledge of Allegiance to our National Emblem, and the Daughters of the American Revolution are to be highly commended for bringing this momentous anniversary to the attention of the American people, at the same time calling upon all to reaffirm our pledge to Old Glory.

Looking back 50 years, to 1892 when the Pledge was given to our Nation, we find the United States at peace—we find Americans engrossed in a period of prosperity and big business. Even as in war there is need for stirring patriotic fervour, so in those peaceful days educators, patriotic leaders and a few men in the public eye sensed a definite need for a revival of the spirit of American patriotism. The opinion existed that if the adults of the time were calloused and difficult to arouse, the hope for the future lay in the youthful oncoming generation.

In line with this thinking, Mr. James B. Upham, junior partner of The Youth's Companion, a well-known magazine of the day, saw a great opportunity to inculcate love of Country on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America—October 12, 1892, when the Chicago Columbian Exposition would be dedicated. He knew this would attract the attention of the entire Nation. Why not make the outstanding feature the National Public School Celebration of Columbus Day—a day which would mark a re-consecration to patriotism . . . a day when school children in every Community throughout the Nation would pledge allegiance to the Flag?

Mr. Upham gained the confidence of the officials of the Exposition in this extensive plan; enlisted the co-operation of the United States Commissioner of Education and obtained the consent of The Youth's Companion to place its machinery and resources behind it.

To aid him in securing the hearty cooperation of the entire educational personnel of the Country, the newspapers and other organized influences, Mr. Francis Bellamy, a recently appointed member on the staff of the magazine, was selected; and as an initial step he presented the plan to the State Superintendents of Education, in annual meeting in Brooklyn, New York, February 17, 1892. The idea received their approval and a committee of five was appointed to start the project and provide an official program of exercises for use in all localities. Mr. Bellamy was chosen chairman of the committee, and in this capacity enlisted the support of educators, Congressmen, Senators and Grover Cleveland, who at that time was planning to run again for the Presidency. He gained an interview with President Harrison, who promised to endorse the movement. Mr. Bellamy went even further. Through his efforts, a joint resolution was passed by Congress, enabling the President to issue a proclamation making October 21 (which corresponds to October 12 of Columbus' Old Style calendar) a National holiday with suitable exercises in the schools. A part of the proclamation read, "Let the National Flag float over every schoolhouse in the country, and the exercises be such as shall impress upon our youth the patriotic duties of citizenship."

When it came time to prepare the official program, it was recognized that its most important feature was to be the raising of the Flag, with a salute to the Flag recited by the pupils in unison. But the current salute, written by Colonel T. Balch of New York, was not considered forceful enough. It ran, "I give my head and my heart to God and my Country— one Country, one Language, one Flag." Therefore, Mr. Bellamy wrote a new salute. (Parenthetically, it may be mentioned that much evidence has been offered to prove that Mr. Upham wrote the pledge with the aid of a little rounding out by members of The Youth's Companion staff, but, in 1939 a committee of historians appointed by The United States Flag Association, gave the credit to Mr. Bellamy after thorough and exhaustive research.)

The Pledge was just twenty-three words—"I pledge allegiance to my Flag and to the Republic for which it stands; one Nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Of the 13,000,000 pupils then in schools, it was estimated that three-fourths of them stood at salute before their school-house Flags and repeated this Pledge of Allegiance on October 21, 1892—The National Public School Celebration of Columbus Day.

The original wording of the Pledge was used until June 14-15, 1923, when representatives of the principal patriotic, fraternal, civic and educational organizations assembled at the National Flag Code Conference in this City, substituted "the Flag of the United States' for "my Flag", on the ground that some foreign-born children might have in mind the flag of their native land when they said "my Flag."

At the Second National Flag Code Conference, held in Washington, D. C., June 14, 1924, still further change was made in the wording of the Pledge. For the sake of greater definition, the words "of America" were added after "the Flag of the United States," so that the Pledge then read as it stands today. At this Conference gestures were prescribed, and the instructions issued were reproduced from that time on in Flag Code publications issued by the Army, the Navy, patriotic societies and others. These instructions were, in full—

"In pledging allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, the approved practice in schools, which is suitable also for civilian adults, is as follows:

Standing with the right hand over the heart, all repeat together the following pledge:

'I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the Unted States of America and to the Republic for which it stands, one Nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.'

At the words 'to the Flag', the right hand is extended, palm upward, toward the Flag and this position is held until the end, when the hand, after the words, 'justce for all', drops to the side.

"However, civilian adults will always show full respect to the Flag, when the pledge is being given, by merely standing at attention, men removing the headdress. Persons in uniform render the right hand salute."

This year the Pledge of Allegiance and its accompanying gestures, as prescribed at the Second National Flag Conference, received Government sanction, for on June 16, the Flag Code was adopted in its entirety by the Congress of the United States. The Resolution introduced by the Honorable Sam Hobbs of Alabama, at the instance of the American Legion, together with amendments suggested by The United States Flag Association, indorsed by the Daughters of the American Revolution, was approved June 22. The Pledge of Allegiance appears in Section 7.

The evolution of the Pledge takes us back to 1892 when it was first read and received popular acceptance. It brings us to 1942—exactly 50 years later—the year of its Golden Anniversary—when it received official recognition by the Government of the United States.

Looking toward the future, may the Pledge of Allegiance always be in the hearts of Americans an expression of devotion to the Flag and faith in the ideals and institutions it represents. May it stir in the souls of all Americans the sentiment expressed in these memorable words of our great patriot, Daniel Webster:

"When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once Glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood. Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto, no such miserable interrogatory as "What is all this worth?' Nor those other words of delusion and folly, 'Liberty first and Union afterwards;' but everywhere spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart, 'Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable'."

Norman E. Webster, jr., of New York City is one of the Decatur young men of the seventies and eighties who stand out for the good record they have made. He is one of the Country's best known public accountants, and is at the head of the firm of Webster, Horne and Blanchard, 50 Broadway.

Mr. Webster was a visitor to Decatur a few weeks ago. He had been to a national convention of certified public accountants in Chicago and stopped here between trains on his return trip.

On his return to New York he mailed the Republican a check for a year's subscription and we hope the old home paper will increase his interest in the time he lived here to the extent that he will become an occasional contributor.

He writes, "I left Decatur in April, 1887, over 55 years ago, and my parents remained there less than two years more. Amanda and Rose Debolt, Harley Welcher and his sister, Gladys Lincoln and you are perhaps the only ones I know there. If you can locate a loose copy of the Van Buren County Gazetteer by Hill and Leavens I should like to get it."

Has any reader of the Republican a copy of this book that he will be willing to part with?

WILL LIVE WITH SON...

Paw Paw, October 22, 1942.

Decatur Republican.

Dears sirs,

Some years ago Abner Moon handed me the following item which I thought would be of interest to Decatur people. As I understand it Mr. Moon used to publish a paper at Marcellus and at one time in Dowagiac.

Big Tree In Volinia

In the fall of 1874 J. S. Draper purchased a farm in Volinia township on which was a large walnut tree, which measured ten feet across the stumps and the rings numbered more than four hundred. The tree scaled more than 12,000 board feet and the logs were so large they had to be split into sections for hauling. The tree was sold for $12.00 per M on the stump. It cost $10.00 to cut the tree and $75.00 to get it hauled to Decatur.

Yours truly,

Dana Smith.

Retired MC Engineer Dies

George Francis Howland, 73, retired Michigan Central railroad engineer and a veteran of 48 years service with the railroad, died Wednesday morning, September 8, at his home, 1015 Homewild Avenue, Jackson, after a short illness.

Mr. Howland entered the employ of the Michigan Central Oct. 16, 1891, retiring Sept. 30, 1939.

Old Idea Meets Modern Need

Carrying her son, Billy, in a papoose basket made by a Paw Paw Indian woman, Mrs. Roy Cronkhite, 824 Franklin street, has her arms free to fill her shopping basket in an Oakwood grocery

Revives Original American Idea, Using Papoose Basket For Child

(Mrs. Cronkhite was formerly Anna Congdon, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Congdon of Decatur. Her husband works for the Parchment Company and she has another son, Walter ten years old. The story was printed in the Kalamazoo Gazette of March 5.)

They can ration gasoline, tires, bicycles and even baby carriages and Mrs. Roy Cronkhite, 824 Franklin street, Kalamazoo, can still take her seven-months-old son, Billy, across town to do her shopping with the greatest unconcern.

With an Indian papoose basket, she has revived an original American custom for carrying the young that she insists surpasses carriage pushing or the arm carrying method.

Nor does William John object. Yoked snugly to [illegible] on the back of his mother shopping trips now are the big moments of his very young life.

The basket was fashioned by a Paw Paw Indian woman, Mrs. Sarah Sturgeon, from the memories she had of her grandmother weaving papoose baskets generations ago. While she and her son make their living weaving baskets, this is the first order of this kind they have had. Her son cut the willow strips and did the staining that gives the carrier its pattern while she did the weaving.

The Indian woman's artistry is well known in Oakwood where her baskets of various types are sold in a grocery store.

Ideas for the papoose basket were not inspired by rationing but an incident that happened at Mackinaw City several seasons ago. Mrs. Cronkhite and her friend, Mrs. Frank Beattie, who were vacationing there were sitting on a porch of their cabin near an Indian settlement and overheard some children arguing whether Mrs. Cronkhite who is dark and has long, black hair, was a real Indian. The incident was remembered by Mrs. Beattie who ordered the papoose basket as a special gift for Billy.

The basket solves a number of problems, says the mother. With its substantial base it will rest on the floor of a store or on a bus where she could not take a stroller or baby carriage on a bus. Even though the baby weighs 26 pounds and the basket is built sturdily, Mrs. Cronkhite feels this is an easy way to carry this much weight without becoming tired. It leaves her arms free to fill her shopping basket and to carry her parcels home.

The Indian woman must have fashioned the basket for comfort for Billy will stay happy for hours in his new carrier and sometimes even goes to sleep as Indian children often did when they were carried on their mothers' backs.

M. Haney Leases Copley Building

Marlin Haney has leased the Copley building for 3 years with the privilege of buying it, and has converted it into a produce depot. This building is located on the southeast corner of Main and St. Mary's streets.

Away back in the sixties the big 3 story Duncombe House stood there. This building was moved two blocks south to the Sherwood street corner and during the moving the landlord continued business as usual. The guests would sit in the doorway or in the windows of their rooms and watch the panorama of business on the street as they slowly moved along.

The moving took place some time during the seventies. In 1869, according to the directory of that year, the hotel was located on the St. Mary's street corner. H. Galloway was the proprietor, and the Duncombe House barn was on the north side of St. Mary's street 3 doors west of Phelps (Main) street.

The Duncombe House advertisement in the directory of '69 reads,—"This House is conveniently located to the business center of the town, and has spacious sample rooms and well ventilated sleeping apartments. It has been newly furnished throughout, and presents to the traveling public the best accommodations of any House in town.

"Free hack to and from the cars and baggage carried free. Charges moderate. Persons stopping at this House can rely on gentlemanly and courteous treatment. Good stables and billiard rooms connected with the House.

"Stages leave this House daily for South Haven, Lawrence, Breedsville, Bangor and Hartford; tri-weekly for Keeler, Millburgh, Benton Harbor and St. Joseph."

After the Hotel moved south this was a vacant corner for a number of years and then the Sweet Brothers, Willard and Gilbert, built a roller skating rink there. It flourished during the eighties, and what fun the young people had there. The times created professional trick skaters and racers and they would pack the big building with spectators. They were the days of the elegant eighties of which even now it is pleasant to read.

Cleaning the attic. Does anyone ever clean an attic without sitting down and looking over old letters and looking at dozens of things that remind us of people and places? Each spring I do the same thing. I realize many things are useless but I dust them off and put them back in their place.

Yesterday my sister was here and we went up to the attic and among the things we looked at was an old log cabin quilt. We remembered dresses we had, and some of our mother's, and some bright colored calico with horse shoes in which was a waist our little brother Sidney wore. And one dress I loved which my mother made had red roses in. "Do you remember the red dress with oak leaves, which Mary Burger gave me?" said my sister. "Mother made it with a polonaise. I thought it was so pretty."

THE LOG CABIN QUILT

As I gaze at this quilt of the log cabin pattern,
The dresses we wore I can see once again;
This rose colored lawn was for wee dimpled Anna,
And this gingham strip was an apron all plain.

The cool dainty muslin was grandmother's wrapper,
The seersucker waist Lulu wore a long time;
The dotted percale was a quaint Mother Hubbard—
At first it was auntie's and then it was mine.

This blue checkered gingham, how well I remember
A sunbonnet pattern for Anna and me;
The neck-cape, the ties, and the wide ruffled sunshade,
The full gathered crown most distinctly I see.

And here's my red calico, gay as a gypsy,
Carefully plaited and trimmed with white braid;
That orchid flowered crepe was my mother's kimono,
The very first garment that Bess ever made.

As I gaze at this quilt of the log cabin pattern,
Fashioned and stitched in the days long ago;
Again the loved faces smile out of the shadows,
The firelight is soft, and the kettle sings low.

"It isn't the things you did, my dear,
It's the things you haven't done
That gives you a bit of a heartache
At the setting of the sun."

The letter of Ralph J. McGowan reminded me of this verse. He has taken time to say a word of appreciation. I am so glad he found an uplift of thought in the little verse I sent.

I, too, enjoy the Republican. Everything in it is good. I am especially interested in "Early Pioneers of Van Buren county." My grandfather Lewis was one of them. He was born in New York State in 1817 and came to Michigan as a young man. He married Nancy Althouse, whose mother is buried in Colburn cemetery near Lawrence.

What a lovely tribute Alonzo Newton Benn pays his wife in the poem, "Because Of You." Many of us feel that way but could not put it into beautiful words as he has.

Dr. Jones of Detroit whom we called our Column Chaplain, gave us the following poem, but did not know the author. I am sure everyone will love it as I do.

"Should you go first and I remain
To walk the road alone,
I'll live in memory's garden, dear,
With happy days we've known,
In spring I'll wait for roses red,
When fades the lilac blue;
In early fall when brown leaves fall
I'll catch a glimpse of you.

"Should you go first and I remain
For battles to be fought,
Each thing you've touched along the way
Will be a hallowed spot.
I'll hear your voice, I'll see your smile,
Though blindly I may grope;
The memory of your helping hand
Will buoy me on with hope.

"Should you go first and I remain,
One thing I'd have you do;
Walk slowly down the path of death,
For soon I'll follow you.
I'll want to know each step you take
That I may walk the same,
For some day down that lonely road
You'll hear me call your name."

Some of my friends have asked me to write about juvenille delinquency. I admit that I rather not; like the sundial I prefer to record only the sunny hours, and I would like to think all children are good. Most of the children I know are, or seem to be, but the papers especially of late seem to be full of the misdemeanors of children.

How important it is that these citizens of tomorrow be trained right. I wonder sometimes if mothers would think it is old fashioned to hear a little good night prayer.

Floyd Starr of the Starr Commonwealth says there is no such thing as a bad boy, and insists that he himself be punished for wrong doings of his boys, thus showing them that he feels he has not given them the right advice. I heard a lecture one time about children and he said the time to start training them is the day they are born. A six weeks old baby can rule the household, especially if there is a grandmother in the family, the lecturer said.

As I reread what I have written, it seems I have placed all the blame on the parents. I am not trying to place the blame anywhere, for I do not profess to know, but I do know something is wrong somewhere.

I just now talked to an elderly man, a stranger to me. He was admiring the sedum we have planted by the rocks in our front yard. "Now if children don't come along and destroy it like they have so many things along the street. When I was young I was taught to let other people's property alone." What he said seemed to fit in with what I am trying to write about.

Maybe parents have failed to impress children with another old-fashioned admonition—to respect other people's property. Maybe it would do us good, and our children too if we would read the following verses from the pen of Charles Kingsley:

A FAREWELL

My fairest child, I have no song to give you;
No lark could pipe to skies so dull and gray;
Yet, ere we part, one lesson I can leave you
For every day.
Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever,
Do noble things, not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever
One grand, sweet song.

BASIL HARRISON'S GRANDDAUGHTER

July 22, 1943.

Last Saturday I called on Mrs. Emma Longwell, a granddaughter of Basil Harrison, and hope I can give half as good an account of my visit as it deserves and that it will please Mr. Moulton.

I found her doing some washing which, she said, could wait, and so she took me to her sitting room where pictures of some of her renowned relatives are hung on the walls. By the side of Basil Harrison's picture is an enlarged picture of him, there is one of Sellick and Nancy Longwell, also an enlarged picture. They are grandparents of Mrs. Longwell's husband.

The little lace cap Nancy wears is most becoming. We talked for a time about dates and ancestors, which I tried to remember but all the time I was thinking about Mrs. Longwell's bright blue eyes and how good her memory is.

She told me she was born in 1861 on the farm where her grandfather first settled in 1827 and that it is still owned by one of the Harrison family. I think she said Clair Harrison. In 1859 she was married to Loren Longwell and they started housekeeping on the farm where she now lives. In all the years she said she had never been away from the place more than six months altogether, and that reminded me of something a friend said to me recently,—"Change is a cheap sedative but it takes character to stay in one place and carry on."

Two sons were born to them: Delos Sellick, who still lives with her, and Owen Harrison, who was killed in an automobile accident in 1930.

I was thinking of the unfinished washing and also of my husband waiting in the car, and as I arose to go I remarked that it was a large house for her to care for, and in the last few minutes I was there I think I saw more of the real Emma Longwell, and possibly something of the characteristics of her sturdy grandfather, than in all our previous talk.

"You need not hurry," she said. "I am glad to talk with you, and I feel glad to think I have lived here so many years and know all the people around here, and when my years are done I know there will be a happy reunion of loved ones.

As for my work, I milk 5 cows, feed 10 calves, keep 200 chickens, rent out ten boats for Sugar Loaf lake and care for a cottage at the lake."

I wonder if I shall ever dare say, "I haven't time to do this or that."

On our way home we stopped at the site of her birth place, and I read again the inscription on the boulder—

"Basil Harrison, first permanent settler, arrived in Kalamazoo county November 5, 1827, and was guided to this site by Pottawattami, Chief Saganaw and braves. He traveled through trackless wilderness with loaded wagons drawn by horses and one yoke of oxen. Was commissioned by Gov. Cass, 'Associate Judge of County Court.' Immortalized by Cooper as 'Bee Hunter,' in Oak Openings. Died 1874. A centenarian. Placed by Lucinda Hinsdale Stone Chapter, 1928."

Early pioneers of Van Buren county are coming near home. In chapter 14 it speaks of Clark Pierce. His home was about a mile south of our place. His son Irving had his home there too. His daughter, Myrtle, who is now Mrs. Hammond of Hartford, taught my Sunday school class in Jericho school house, and I went to school with Ella who is now Mrs. Willis and her brother Clifton. I think they both live in West Bangor.

Clark Pierce's second wife was Mrs. Benton; she had a son living and a pretty little daughter Maude. Irving is dead but Maude is still a pretty woman and lives in Flagstaff, Arizona. I now and then hear from her.

And about the tanery on Black River, built by Hannahs in 1847. Black river was the western boundary of my father's farm, and many times I have been among the ruins of that old tannery. We moved there in 1881, and there were several old houses around there, some about falling to pieces.

I found this in an article by Chas. A. Weissert: "Westward within a few miles of South Haven were Geneva Mills, and a tiny settlement on the river where Marvin Hannas in 1847 established a saw mill and tannery. Hannas tried to call the place 'Hunter,' but his workmen dubbed it Jericho, a puzzling name which still clings to the neighborhood."

I found this also in Mr. Weissert's article: "It is related that a pious pioneer from The Netherlands bought a yoke of oxen educated in the lumber woods and that while plowing he had difficulty in guiding them with the customary "gee" and "haw" he had heard his neighbor use. He finally stopped a man passing his farm and explained the difficulty, whereupon the stranger shouted at the docile beasts and then turned loose a torrent of profanity. Communication with the animals was immediately established and they obeyed. The good Hollander, greatly pleased, and failing to understand the shocking tirade, enthusiastically exclaimed to his son,

"Gerritt, schrijf dat neer!"

("Gerritt, write that down.")

Buttermilk pop! Who knows about that delectable dish? I suppose the recipe was handed down to our family by some Dutch ancestor on my father's side of the family.

About this time each year my thoughts are of a place in Waverly township, where on a frosty November morning my father bundled up the four children and took them over to Grandma Johnson's, who lived near the Carr cemetery. "Be good children," said my mother, "and grandma will make buttermilk pop for your dinner." My father's young brother "Bub," was sent muleback to Paw Paw for a doctor.

I suppose my brother Alex wore his new knitted stockings, as my mother sat up until near midnight the night before to finish them.

All this I have heard them tell, for it was on that day I arrived. My father used to say a home was not complete without a baby and some playful kittens. By the way I think the doctor who was sent for that day was Dr. Charles S. Maynard.

I was only two years old when we left Waverly, so Geneva township is home to me. It is said that the place we spend the first ten years of our life will always be home to us.

My brother Fred was about nine when we left there, and last September we had the pleasure of driving with him through this place.

For several miles there were incidents which he remembered. At the school house he remembered how he spelled a word correctly and went ahead of a little girl, and she cried until the teacher let her stand at the head again, and of course here and there he had had a fight with some boy, and here he went home cross lots so the boy's big brother wouldn't get him. And here lived Hungerfords and Shaws, and Crapows and many others, he remembered them all, and some of the houses were gone, but he remembered the location.

Oh, yes, buttermilk pop again. I think my mother fried bread in butter and poured the milk over it and cooked it slowly until it was sort of a jellied mixture; we put sugar on it when we ate it. To tell the truth I have never been able to make it look or taste just as hers did. Does anyone know how to make it?

I disagree with our Editor, and now I may lose my job of writing. Be that as it may, I like the name of Paw Paw and think it prettier and more appropriate than LaFayette, and just consider all the ink we have saved in not having to write that long name.

The origin of words have always interested me, and in my scrap-book I have a clipping from the Detroit News written by Albert Stoll, Jr., in which he says, "Does the paw paw tree grow in Michigan? This is a query from one of our readers. It does and is a native tree of long standing. I believe that the city of Paw Paw, judicial seat of Van Buren county, was so named because of the many paw paws found in the vicinity by the pioneers. While many look on the paw paw, with its semi-tropical foliage and fruit, as a tree of more southern range, it is listed as being native to this state in most botanies. At present it is far from being common and no doubt eventually will disappear from Michigan."

I do hope it never becomes extinct. I am sure we would all miss its beautiful yellow foliage in the fall as much as we would the bright red of the sumac. On a hillside where each of these are found would be a place where—

"A poet here might find a theme,
An artist see a color scheme."

Mr. Stoll also said: "The flowers of the paw paw are about one inch wide and are green at first, turning reddish later. The fertile buds later develop a stubby banana-like fruit from three to five inches long, which, when fully matured, is dark brown. The soft pulp is filled with seeds and the fruit is edible, although not generally gathered for table use. One must acquire a taste for the paw paw before enjoying its wild flavor."

Although I have gathered paw paw apples as we called them I never acquired a taste for them. There is a considerable growth of paw paws on Black river just north of Johnstown schoolhouse. Should it ever become extinct there will always be the city of Paw Paw to remind one of the paw paw trees.

MASONIC LODGE ELECTS OFFICERS

The regular meeting of Decatur Lodge No. 99, F. and A. M., was held on Thursday evening. The annual election of officers was held and the following officers were elected to serve through 1943:

W. M.—Lynn Stickney
S. W.—Therald Oatman
J. W. Marvin McWilliams
Treas.—Elwood Scott
Sec.—Rolland Haefner.
S. D.—Frank Barber
J. D.—Chas. Dino
Tyler—A. J. Clark
Chaplain—Dr. Bope.

With the exception of the newly elected Worshipful Master, the Junior Warden, Marvin McWilliams, and Tyler Clark, all of the above officers are Past Masters. This means that Lynn Stickney will have all the advice and help his office may need from those who have preceded him in that capacity, and is something unusual.

Following the election, the above officers were duly installed. Decatur lodge has an active membership of over one hundred members, including five local men who have been honored by life memberships. From this membership are five who are in the U. S. service and one with the government FBI.

Masonic lodges are actively participating in the establishing of Masonic centers in various military posts throughout the nation, for the use of the men in service. These are recreational centers and are maintained by the Masonic organization, a project in which the Decatur lodge participates.

The next regular meeting of Decatur lodge will be held Thursday evening, January 7, 1943.

Our 47th State

Raton, New Mexico.
January 7, 1943.

Dear Friend Arba:

So many have written so muc about other states of our gloriou union that as the only Decatur res dent of New Mexico it becomes my du ty to give some data regarding it.

New Mexico was the 47th state t be admitted into the union. In size is the 4th largest; in population it i the 3rd smallest.

Santa Fe, its capital, is the olde state capital and the only one tha has no railroad connection. One o the largest railroad systems i named for it, but does not enter th city by 21 miles. In the northwester corner is the meeting of four diffe ent states, the only one in the U. S.

The state was first settled in th 15th century by Spanish coming i from Mexico and now is composed the major population with Texans t ing next.

New Mexico has over two millio Indians, largely of the Navajo tribe living in the northwestern part of th state. Pueblos live along the R Grande valley.

The climate is governed large by the altitude, which is from 2500 14,000 in the highest mountains. Raton, with 6,500 feet the altitude about like Decatur, only we alway have cold nights. The isothermic lin runs through Raton and Muskego Mich.

Physically the state is largly gra ing. 2,000,000 acres of state owne land is devoted to it. A million white faced steers go to market every yea and about the same number of sheep

The southwest corner has a vast o deposit. The southwest has a great d posit of copper. The mountains around Raton, coal, coal, coal. Th The northwestern is a wonderful fru section.

Later diggings in the central pa of the state have proved that mo lived here five thousand years ag but who they were has not been r vealed, and this is only part of th vast resources the state has. For i stance, the potash deposits in the sout eastern part of the state are of u known quality. One mine puts o 1,000 tons a day. See last week's Sa urday Evening Post.

The Rio Grande river runs clo across the state, rising in the Roc mountains of Colorado and furnis ing irrigation for thousands of acres

The Pecos river rises in the nort ern part of the state and runs in southeasterly direction and waters ar drains all that region. The rivers i the western part of the state flow int the Pacific.

Have you heard of Naiti Phillip the oil man? He got rich in the c game. Came out here and bought ha a million acres in this county (Co fax), erected a $250,000 residenc with all the beautiful surrounding and turned this with a 14-story offic building in Tulsa, Oklahoma, over t the Boy Scouts of America for a play ground and handed them a check fo $200,000 to start out with.

I am enclosing check for this year' subscription as I do not want to b dropped. Will try to [illegible] some o the questions Walter Brown has propounded. That beautiful lady men tioned in the suicide article I think answered that question herself.

The tannery was there as long as I can remember and Pat Hans was the tanner. He lived east of our house and had a daughter Annie who was a companion of my sister Anne and they were school girls together.

Yes, Dowd had a grocery and tool in a partner by the name of Clark—Clark and Dowd. Delia Dowd was a student in the same class as myself.

I wonder if Walter remembers the brewery out beyond the cemetery? My mother used to send me out there after yeast when she did not make salt rising bread for the tribe o young Lyons, 10 or more of us.

The letter from Lucy Upton wit publication of petition for equal su frage recalls to mind so many ol time scenes that I keep reading an enjoying the Decatur of the 70's tha I was once a part of. Prof. Upton wa a great friend of mine and helped m when I needed help.

And this recalls the White Ribbon movement when the faithful wen from one saloon to another and held religious services in them, and we go prohibition in the town and county and all the saloons closed but one Tom Conway up beyond Pete Par donet's harness shop. We young folks called there and found out Tom was getting his beer off the night train. A man met that train with a wheel bar row and we met the man on a back street and dumped out his beer. How ever that did not stop Tom. He went on with his filthy outfit, so we collected some of the older fellows Dell Kurtz, my brother George an others collected bricks, iron pipes an smashed in the front of the saloo and destroyed the bar and that ende the Tom Conway's saloon. I don' know, but suspect that Walter Brow was one of that gang. Tom Lyon.

P. S.—I don't know if you can rea this writing but as an excuse will sa that I fell and injured my hand. M usual penmanship is bad enough.

Tom.

MEMORIES OF CIVIL WAR DAYS

(This is a letter from Arthur Shaw, one of the oldest living former residents of Decatur. His boyhood home was in the Shaw district which was named for his father. It is a great pleasure to hear from him, and especially to note at the close of his letter that he will write again.)

Mt. Ranier, Maryland,
February 20, 1943.

Arba N. Moulton,
Publisher of Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Mich.

Dear Friend Arba:

I just received a copy of the Decatur Republican and I enjoy reading it more than any paper sent me. I am glad to note what Sister Glennie wrote to you.

Already I have read "The Education of the German Youth Under Hitler," "Our Boys in the Service," "Decatur P. T. A. Welcomes New Citizens," etc., etc. I'll enclose $2 for subscription to the Decatur Republican for 1943. On April 30, 1857, I was born on the John A. Shaw farm, 4½ miles southeast of Decatur. I remember that my father went to Decatur one day expecting to have to enlist in the Civil war. I remember watching with my two older brothers to see our father come home with soldier clothes. But when he came he was not dressed in soldier clothes. He was told that a man with his size family should not be asked to enlist in the army.

Mother and children were glad he did not have to enlist. A young man and neighbor to us who refused to enlist, was drafted and had to pay $300 to get another man to go in his place.

I remember I had two uncles who lost their lives in the Civil War. I remember our whole family going to the Belle school in Porter township to a meeting the Sunday after Lincoln's assassination. A few expressed themselves glad that Lincoln had been gotten out of the way. The minister stepped off the platform and went to help other men stop that kind of talk. The women massed themselves together and got between the two groups of men who wanted to fight. There was no church service.

After that the teachers in the Belle school and the Shaw school had their pupils commit a memory gem that I have not forgotten. We memorized the following:

"Revenge is a cruel sword,
It has neither hilt nor guard.
Would thou wield this brand of the Lord?
Is thy grasp then firm and hard?

But the firmer the grasp of the blade
The deeper the wound in thy hand is made.
And when the blade from thy hand has flown
Instead of finding it bathed in the heart of a foe
Thou wilt find it sheathed in thine own."

On November 10, 1863, Lincoln spoke at the dedication of the National cemetery at Gettysburg. Lincoln wrote his three minute speech on an envelope. It is one of the [illegible] gems in the English language.

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live.

It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here.

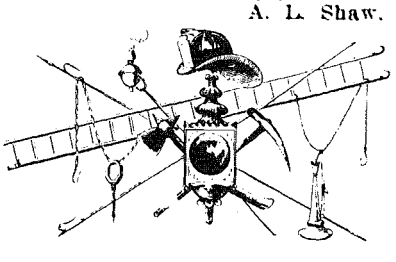
It is for us the living rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion, that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

The Gettysburg Address by Abraham Lincoln consisted of 10 sentences, 267 words and was delivered in less than three minutes.

Edward Everett, who has been Governor of Massachusetts, U.S. Senator, Secretary of State, Minister of Great Britain, and President of Harvard College, spoke for 2 hours.

Arba, I regret that I am compelled to stop right here, but I'll write you again soon. Gratefully yours,

A. L. Shaw.



LOOKING BACKWARD

TAKEN FROM THE FILES OF THE REPUBLICAN

57 Years Ago In Decatur. From the Files of the Republican of December 26, 1885.

THE MAD FLAMES PLAY HAVOC IN DECATUR

Six Business Houses Swept Away. The Old Wooden Row at Last Succumbs to the Devouring Element.

We doubt if there are a dozen people now living in this village who can remember Decatur at it was in 1885. John Shaad and the writer are two of them. Are there any others?

It is quite probable that John Shaad is the oldest continuous resident of the village. He was 3 months old when, in the summer of '65, John Shaad sr. packed his family and stock of boots and shoes on a democrat wagon and drove across the country from Three Rivers to establish a home and business in Decatur. The elder Shaad saw great promise of future prosperity in store for this lively settlement, which had been incorporated as a village but four years before.

Perhaps Decatur did not grow to become the city of his dreams, but the senior Shaad stayed by it to the end of his days and it paid him good returns for his time and energy.

The Shaad family had been here 20 years, and were classed among the old settlers, when the cry of fire awakened them from their slumbers on that wild Sunday night in December.

That the present day reader may visualize the scene of the fire, will state that the Coleman building, in which was located Lee's drug store, stood where Buys' clothing store is now located. The Schuster drygoods store, that stood out like a lone sentinel on the morning of December 27, 1885, is the present Kroger store.

The fire was stopped at the Shaad building where ended the wooden row. This is where the Grace Weeks Photo and Gift Shop is now located.

John Shaad jr., still in good health and spirits, walks about the village at times and enjoys recalling the scenes of his youth. One day recently he walked out to the home of Grove Ickes near the Red Bridge. Grove is an invalid and it gives him pleasure to be able to greet his old time friends.

Grove and John had a good visit and Grove gave John the story of the fire which follows. It was among the keep sakes of the late Henry High, an honored veteran of the Civil War who introduced the threshing machine to the cradling farmers of Little Prairie Ronde and adjacent territory.

But we had better begin the story:

At about 11 o'clock Sunday night the dreadful cry of fire rang out through our slumbering village and the ever ready people sprang from their beds to find one of the most disastrous fires which has visited Decatur in many years just beginning its destructive work. The building owned by the Coleman estate and occupied by D. W. Lee, druggist, and E. G. Johnson, shoemaker, was the starting point and there is still much difference of opinion among those first at the scene as to which of these places the fire started in. The flames spread very rapidly and nothing whatever was saved from Lee's drug store and only two benches with their tools and a sewing machine were saved from Johnson's shop. Lee was quite well insured while Johnson carried none.

The next was the building owned by Charles Duncombe and occupied by S. Kurtz as a restaurant and small stock of notions. A great many of his goods were saved in a more or less injured condition, but his loss is probably the most severe of the lot as he had no insurance, is unable to stand much loss and lived in the upper rooms where much was destroyed including about $50 cash which was hidden in a bed.

In an adjoining room of this building was S. Mielke's tailer shop from which most of the contents were removed, but with no insurance to help reepair what was lost.

A. B. Knights' saloon was the next building in the row and was one of the best in the lot. Nothing was saved from his place and on a loss of something like $1,500 on building and goods there was but $350 insurance on stock.

Geo. Riley's restaurant and Geo. Hopkins' barber shop were in the next building owned by some lady not a resident here. All of Hopkins' outfit was removed as was much of Riley's, but an attempt to tear the building down prevented the saving of considerable. He was not insured and will lose something like $300.

The building used by Geo. Arnold as a meat market and owned by his brother Edward was destroyed, but the greater part of the utensils of the market were saved, including the meat and Mr. Arnold's books.

Dr. Keables' building was the last of those consumed and was pretty well demolished by an attempt to tear it away also. In this was Frank Gibbs' pool tables and his loss is but little with no insurance.

All these buildings were of wood and most of them two stories high but not very substantial or valuable, and therefore the loss to the town will not prove a very serious one, especially if new and substantial bricks are erected in their stead. But those of the occupants who did not keep insured on account of the high rates charged for such hazardous risks are deserving of sympathy in their unfortunate circumstances. The fire lasted only about an hour and the little wind which prevailed was fortunately in a very favorable direction--to the southeast. Much good work was done by the fire company and citizens generally, but it seemed that the expectations of the people so often expressed in years past that "the whole row will go some day," was to be fully realized and in less than an hour everything between the store occupied by Charles Schuster on the north and John Shaad's old store on the south was in ruins. These two buildings were of brick veneer and stood the test well, and it is to be hoped that none but brick structures will be erected on the vacant lots, that we may not in future live in dread of just such a conflagration as was witnessed Sunday night.

NOTES OF THE FIRE

The origin of the fire is unknown.

The large plate glass fronts of Shaad's and Roberts & Stewart's stores were completely ruined by being cracked from the heat.

A strange co-incidence is this—the three large fires occurring in Decatur in the past twenty years have all been upon Sunday nights.

Charlie Cole, who was on his way to Paw Paw and over half way there, saw the fire and drove back in time to lend a helping hand.

Seeing the light in this direction Sig Desenberg and a friend took a livery team and drove from Lawton, arriving here about 1 o'clock.

In anticipation of the fire spreading M. P. Merwin's house around on Delaware street, was completely gutted and his goods considerably damaged.

J. L. Harrison, with his usual caution, took all the mail from the post-office boxes and placed it in pouches, in order that it might be easily removed in case of need.

A telegram was sent to Niles and their excellent fire company was just ready to pull out with an engine and hose cart when notified that the flames were under control.

The south wall of the Red Star store became so hot that the wood frame inside burned for several hours and broke out anew at seven o'clock in the morning, but was soon extinguished.

S. R. Slocum, A. B. Morse, Dr. Hooper and several others living on the western terminus of Delaware avenue, were not aware of what had happened until they came down town next morning.

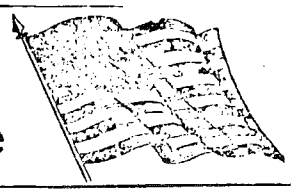
The Tase House caught fire two or three times, R. Nutt's [illegible] house once, S. J. Rawson's [illegible] shops at the stave factory twice and several other places in that direction were endangered from flying embers.

Fred Beach, first assistant foreman of the Hook and Ladder Co., rooms at Mrs. A. D. Scott's, on Sherwood street, and came down Monday morning to open the Arnold market when he found nothing but the foundation walls remaining.

No definite arrangements have as yet been made for re-building, but it is quite certain that the sound of the saw and hammer will be heard before many days, as there is great demand for store room and this must soon be supplied. Dr. Keables will erect a substantial brick unless he disposes of his lot, for which he has already had several customers, and some parties who were not located in that row are negotiating with a view to erecting brick buildings. In fact none but brick should be built, inasmuch as they do not cost very much more than of wood, and are so much better and safer when completed.

(Andy Johnson was then editor of the Republican and wrote this story.)

Our Boys in the Service



A WORD FROM HOME

9 a.m., Sat. morning after Xmas.

It's raining hard and is still so dark out we can scarcely see the garage, and cars need their bright lights. There is still about six inches of snow left.

We spent Christmas day at home but at night we went out to Lloyd Dillenbeck's to show some of our movies to Mrs. Dillenbeck of our trip to Roth's and Evelyn's last September and of our deer hunting trip last year and this year. My hunting season wasn't so good this year. No ducks, no pheasants, no deer. On our way home from Dillenbeck's we stopped at Dine's; and boys, what do you think! Dine actually carried some water to his customers and picked up a few dirty dishes. May be if this war lasts long enough we will yet see Dine working. Dine says he wishes the war was over. So do all of us but not for the same reason Dine does!

Frank hasn't bothered Max and Jim much lately. He's been busy gathering in the quarters. Once in a while Jim gets hold of Frank's tie and draws it up good and tight, and a time or two he has had to use a pair of shears to get the tie off. Frank is getting short of ties now that those girls don't come around selling them any more. Oscar comes in once in a while. He generally goes out faster than he comes in.

We won't have very many farm tools or much hardware this year to sell. Our war job is to keep the tools on the farms producing. We have rearranged our repair bins so we can keep a better assortment of parts. We have some new Service Equipment and Jim's and Max's jobs will be to "keep them rolling." I am going to try to keep the government regulations and questionnaires emptied out of the waste basket and keep the repair parts coming in. Food is going to be as important as guns in this war.

There is one thing you boys in service must not do nor let any one else and that is to think that the boys of your age who are home on the farms are not just as patriotic as you are. Their job in this war is just as big as yours. Their job is not 40 hours a week. Their uniforms are pairs of overalls and an old blue shirt. Their shoes have cow stable polish on them. They keep the fork handle shining. Their bugle sounds in the morning just as early as yours. There are no smokes, gifts nor U.S.O. They will have no government bonus, no pensions, no brass bands nor bars.

As our food surplus dwindles and we feed the starving world all of us will have a cheer in our hearts for these "Soldiers at Home," that some of us are pointing our finger at now.

Jim Dillenbeck sends me a Christmas card and on it he wrote, "I hope to be with you next year in deer hunt. camp."

"That's my hope, too, Jim, and the hope for all the rest of you in service. If I could shake hands with each of you all over the world I would wish you the best of luck and here's hoping that my wish brings you back to your family and friends.

Raymond Gale.

A WORD FROM HOME

'Twas the day before Christmas and all through this town
The natives were scurrying to find gifts to go aroun'.
Our barbers were clipping a year's growth of hair . . .
The gals a choosin' the gown they should wear.

The children no longer slip off to their bed,
But hike o'er to Dine's for a "coke" instead.
This matter of settling for a long winter's nap
Has gone with new tires, right off the map!

Out on the highway one hears quite a clatter,
And curiosity moves you to see what's the matter,
You'll likely behold Frank Athey and cart
Hauling gifts from the dump for a New Year's start.

Tho the moon still shines on two feet of snow
We'll soon use reindeer for the power to go!
Yet when we can't travel it won't be so bad,
For we'll listen to tales of Beek as a lad.

And those he unravels, with gesture and trick,
Proves he was a feller plumb full of ol' Nick.
More rapid than choosy, each yarn brings a grin
And usually winds up with some native "roped in,"

Now Curtiss! Now Moulton! Now LaBarge, or Dine . . .
It's Gale's crazy trio or Abie Levine!
To the ribbing of Buys and his avoirdupois,
Or love-lorn advice to the rest of the boys,

As long as there's life and room for a smile . . .
Bill's in there pitching (?) all of the while!
So on down the street to Ye Olde Coffee Shoppe
Where hungrier folks are accustomed to stop.

And John fills them up in just a short while
With a Democrat lecture served Southern style,
As I pause on the corner and a turning aroun'

There's a lot that is missing in this little town.

For I see the corner where Mosier held sway,
Now a star's in a window while he is away.
John Nutt has a flag in his window too,
With a field of white and two stars of blue!

At the bank where there's bonds for me and for you
There is a snapshot of Allan petting a kangaroo,
The kangaroo reminds in a symbolic way
Of far away places these boys are today. . .

Though the holiday season brings you nearer it seems,
And your return is surely our fondest of dreams,
We at home intend to fulfill our role
That you may more quickly attain your goal.

For we're a-missing Tom Brucks and his hearty laugh,
The Klinkers, and Vlieks, and Gerrit DeGraaff;
There's Capt. Roth Morris with a Flight Command,
Plus a wife and child on the other hand!

Our memory holds you as plain as you please,
From the Adams in A's to the Zerbies in Z's.
So over the seas or wherever you are,
Your friends are following your shining star.

We send you this message, yes all of of us do,
A message sincere, steadfast, and and true. . . .
"We're so proud of you fellows, God grant you all cheer,
On this hopeful dawn of another New Year!"

—Ever best wishes and with certain apologies,
Rolland Haefner.

DECATUR
Is It As it Was?
Chapter II

Our congenial Mayor, Charles Haefner, drifts slowly down Main Street, willing to advise you. Streets are all modernized, mostly black-topped; also street names on every corner. Road direct to Lake of the Woods pier (wonder where the Rod and Gun Club has gone.) The water works has new pump equipment. The whole is policed and ready for a quick black-out.

Charlie Ritter, ex-mayor and now Chief Deputy U. S. Marshal at the War Production Dept., Keeler may claim part of the credit for some of the above mayoralty accomplishments. (Has anyone seen a special white handled gun?)

Main street secretary, Attorney Grosvenor ready to take credit for all the Council's (what Council?) thoughtful work.

Jarious Hallock, the original land mark of Decatur and the only village water works superintendent still functioning in the old capacity.

Charlie Frye, another unforgetable land mark directing traffic at the public school.

Bob Davis of Michigan Gas and Electric Company, formerly scout master at Vandalia, now boosting Decatur.

Swihart, the politician and still doing the last rights.

Lou Taylor, the man who does the work with the new truck on our streets.

And after the old jalopies refuse to run, they bring them to Cecil Mahoney who starts them off like new.

Bessie at the library who chooses the books you should read but wonders why they don't make prompt returns.

Barker the barber, dreaming of oil wells and prosperity.

Ezra Planck of M. C. R. R. fame and Village Council knowledge with nothing to do but function as freight, baggage and ticket agent.

Schmidt, the jovial express agent with time out as part time village fireman.

Guy Curtiss, Decatur Elevator Company and friend of the farmer is so busy, he just can't get all of his bond coupons clipped or take on extra work, but can take time to tell questionable stories. With Dale holding out in the feed department.

Jim Hirst and Son wondering where all the lumber has gone. Jim watching activity at Lake of the Woods and Eagle Lake, hoping Chicago residents will take to Decatur for cover-up.

Carl Wickett with a corner on the country meat supply, but admitting sending five to ten cars of stock a week to Chicago and Buffalo. Also with Fred McWilliams rationing feed and coal.

The Schuur family and Peter Koops of celery fame, quietly cornering all of the celery this year.

The Becker company, muckland growers and sellers—and how! Still erecting warehouses for their celery, onions, etc. Increasing the population with brother Mexican and Southern help, all under the control of our pep enthusiast, Ben Weinman of Lions Club fame.

Archie McWilliams, gas station, taking a chance on how they drop and changing hundred dollar bills for our Keeler residents.

Cole Motor Sales, the change artists when it comes to getting yourself another car.

Bert Kidman, the original horse shoe artist and manufacturer of home design farm implements.

Dave Friedman, the new Osteopath, and Percy Harris the gas man holding down the corner location of Doctor Baker fame.

Frank Dodge, principal and dictator of not only the public schools, but rationing registrants at the Village school.

B-25 Bomber Flies Low Over Decatur

A mighty airplane flew low over the main street of the village while most of the inhabitants were dining last Friday noon. It came from the south, made a loop and returned in the same direction. It flew so low that it almost clipped the top brick off the Poor block and the roar of the engine was so loud that people in the stores ducked to save themselves from possible decapitation.

"Must be the enemy is on us," said one. "Bet it's Carl Squier, or maybe Roth Morris," said another. "Maybe some pilot is lost," said still another.

A few minutes later a telephone call explained it all. The call came from Mrs. Churchill of Volinia. She asked if we saw a plane flying low over the village and our reply was that we certainly heard it. Then she explained.

Her son, Lieut. Winston Churchill of a North Carolina field had flown a B-25 bomber to South Bend last Thursday, left his plane there and had driven to the home of his parents to spend the night. Friday morning he returned to his plane but said on his return to his Southern field he would fly over the farm and Decatur. Sure enough he did and we are glad to know that the pilot of the flying bomber was a Decatur boy sending a greeting to his home town.

By Frances Margaret Fox

(A recent caller was Mrs. Guy McGowan of Lawrence township, she who once was Clara Goble of Decatur. She brought the Republican this story of Old Glory which she had clipped from a magazine and carefully backed on heavy paper for better preservation. Some ten years or more ago she read it at an entertainment at the Corwin school and now it finds another avenue of publicity through the Republican. From this printing it should find its way to many scrapbooks to be handed down to generations yet to come. Such a good story of the Stars and Stripes should never be lost to the American people. "Old Glory" must always fly above them. If it should dip and fail to rise again earth's brightest star would fall and that which makes life worth living would disappear.)

We are now so used to speaking of our American flag as "Old Glory" that we might believe that Betsy Ross herself suggested the name when she made the first flag for our nation that long-ago time in Philadelphia. The original "Old Glory," however, was made and christened in Salem, Massachusetts, away back in 1824, and is now in a glass case of its own in our National Museum at Washington. To President Harding was given the honor of presenting the flag to our country.

Those who made the flag, and the wonderful boy who named it, have long since left this world, but their flag is owned and tenderly cherished by Uncle Sam, and the story that is its heritage must never be forgotten.

Brave sea-faring men lived in Salem in the long ago, and it was natural for the boys of Old Salem to become mariners. One of these boys was William Driver. He not only went to sea when he was a mere lad, but he was soon a famous sailor. This boy was twenty-one years old on Mar. 17, 1824. His family had reason to be proud of him because, on this birthday, he became a master mariner. This was the highest rank possible in the profession he had chosen, and never before, so far as known, had so young a man reached the topmost place as master mariner at the age of twenty-one.

No wonder the family and friends celebrated William Driver's birthday with a party in the year 1824 at Salem. Probably the fortunate boy had been given birthday parties all his life, but never before had such a wonderful surprise been prepared for him. He must have known that his mother and his girl friends were making a gift for him. They worked in secret for weeks at something they didn't let him see. Their faces must have wreathed in smiles whenever they passed him at his own front door, or sat to chat with him in his mother's old-fashioned parlor while waiting to be admitted to the mysterious work-room where the great surprise required more patient stitches.

At last came the joyful occasion when William Driver's friends were invited in to help celebrate his twenty-first birthday, and the doors of the secret room were opened wide.

When William Driver walked into the room he was amazed by the beautiful gift his mother and the girls of Salem had made for him. Before his astonished eyes was a big, beautiful new American flag, the flag he loved with all his patriotic heart. The flag is made of red, white, and blue bunting, and must have been one of the most perfect flags ever flown in Salem. Of course, it is worn almost threadbare now, and is carefully mounted on a strong backing of cotton or linen material, as all old flags are mounted for preservation, but the loving stitches are still perfect. These stitches are so even and exact, it scarcely seems possible that they were made by hand.

No wonder that the boy of Salem couldn't speak for a minute when he first beheld his birthday gift. When he did speak, when he reverently took the folds of this beautiful flag in his hands, he exclaimed, "Old Glory!" and thus gave the Stars and Stripes a perfect name forever.

The Driver family and their friends were quick to appreciate the new title, and the American flag has been "Old Glory" ever since that joyful day in Salem.

When Captain Driver sailed away on his first voyage as commander of his ship, his flag went with him, and for many long years it sailed the seas and floated in the breezes of every foreign port visited by the voyagers of Uncle Sam. "Old Glory" from Salem made at least two trips straight around the world and saw many thrilling adventures.

When Captain Driver returned from the sea and went to live at Nashville, Tennessee, he took his flag with him; and how he must have loved "Old Glory." Only on great occasions was the treasured flag displayed after it left the high seas. When Lincoln was elected President of the United States was a great occasion, and then out sailed "Old Glory" on the breezes: but when Tennessee seceded from the Union, "Old Glory" was hidden away. We are told that the beloved old flag was sewed inside a quilt for safety.

Three days after Washington's birthday, though, in 1863, when Union soldiers took possession of Nashville, "Old Glory" again appeared and floated serenely from the State House dome.

They tell us that it was Captain Driver's daughter who gave the priceless flag to the National Museum that we may all share in the possession and triumphs of our original "Old Glory."

A Pioneer Sketch of Dr. George Bartholomew

By Mrs. Erastus Osborn

(This sketch of Dr. Bartholomew was written for the Republican by the late Mrs. Osborn some 30 years ago. The doctor was the father of E. W. Bartholomew, who with his wife, the former Lydia Harris, is enjoying the summer among his old time friends of Decatur, Hamilton and Keeler. We are indebted to him for this copy and the privilege of reprinting the sketch.)

Among the settlers who arrived in Keeler township in the late forties I think there is no more note-worthy figure than Dr. George Bartholomew.

He was born in Jefferson county, New York, in 1821, made all the advancement possible in the district schools and began teaching after he was 18. At the age of 20 he began the study of medicine with a small town doctor.

A number of different schools, different doctor's offices and courses of lectures, interspersed with district school teaching, occupied the next five years. During this time also he married Miss Minerva Kieth, in all ways a most admirable woman.

He graduated from Willoughby college in Vermont and in 1846 came with his bride to Keeler, Michigan, and began the independent practice of his profession. Before he finished his studies he had practiced under the supervision of Professor Trowbridge of Watertown, New York. This is a strong contrast to the present day requirement. When the young man now steps from the high school to the university, with the expectaion of taking the medical course, he has still eight or nine years of work before he can begin practice for himself.

It is to be supposed that these young men learn many things Dr. Bartholomew did not know but it is a fact that only a few of them will bring to their practice the wonderful perception that was his by nature.

Dr. Andrews of Paw Paw, who, in the fifties and sixties was the leading medical authority in this section, used to say that he would give anything possible for the keen insight possessed by Dr. Bartholomew. Many years later Dr. Rose, so well known and esteemed in all this section, said of him—"He is an educated gentleman and a capable physician."

I think his first practice was mostly on foot through the woods, and I have heard of his being lost and unable to reach the patient whom he started to visit. After two years of woods life he changed to Paw Paw, where he remained three years. He then located in Decatur, built the third house in the village and opened a drug store.

In the early fifties, moved by the spirit of adventure or the hope of gain, he sailed to Central America, then misrepresented as the Promised Land. History says he went by appointment from the Panama R. R. Co., but I am very certain he went before receiving the appointment.

A Visit in '61

I well remember the first time I saw him, in 1861. My father, Ralph Lascelle, had removed from New York to Michigan, and bought land adjoining that of my brother-in-law, Mr. Eli Adams. He also attached his house to Mr. Adams' house, where Newell Phelps later lived, so they were very near neighbors.

Mrs. Bartholomew was a cousin to Mr. Adams, and one day when the Bartholomews came there to visit, my parents and myself were invited to meet them. The younger of the two boys they brought with them was a babe, and the other, it seems to me, was about six years old.

The first time he came into the room his father said, "Where's your penny?" The boy began to search his pockets, but failed to find it. "Now," said the Doctor, "What are you going to do, away from home and no money? Go out and look where you have been and see if you can find it." After the boy had gone out he said, "I am beginning right now to train that boy that he must never be away from home without money in his pocket. I hope he will never suffer as I have, from being among strangers with no money."

I do not think the Doctor ever dissipated in any way, but knew he was considered improvident, not a good financier, but he outgrew that failing.

In that visit Dr. Bartholomew told me of his arrival in Panama about 1853, I think, at the city of Aspinwell. He was in the line of laborers who had gone with the expectation of high wages on the railroad then being built to save the trip around Cape Horn in order to reach the Pacific ocean and California.

A man stood on the dock with a book and pencil checking off each one as he stepped from the long plank. He asked the same question to all, "Your name, your occupation," and told each one in accordance with his answers where to go, often scarcely looking up. Dr. Bartholomew gave the man his name, and in answer to the second question said, "Physician." Then the man looked up. His occupation was one to develop his gift of observation of character, and his one look at the Doctor no doubt told him he had found a man. He said, "Step right over there till I finish this checkup, I want to talk with you."

After asking the Doctor a few general questions he said, "We are on the verge of a panic. Dysentery has broken out among the men. There are many deaths, our hospital is full. Do you think you can do anything to stem the tide and restore confidence to these laborers?"

The Doctor said he could try, and the superintendent or whatever he was took him to a man in the hospital who was supposed to be dying and certainly looked like it. The Doctor asked for brandy, which was quickly provided, and sat down by the cot and began to feed it to the man. He rallied and sunk away again, and when it seemed as if he was really going the Doctor would increase the dose. Finally he brought him back from what was certainly almost death. It was after this success, no doubt followed by others, that he received the appointment of surgeon for the Panama R.R. Co., and was given charge of the hospital.

He remained on the Isthmus until the railroad was completed, and came home broken in health, but with a fund of experience as well as a convenient amount of money. In partnership with his brother he bought a tract of wild land in Berrien county at the "Bend of the River," and made it what was then the largest fruit farm in Berrien township. The change of climate and working in the soil restored his health, so that he was able to resume his practice, which he did in the village of Keeler, where he remained until his death.

Mr. Adams once asked the Doctor why he did not continue in partnership with his brother, and he replied promptly and characteristically, "Because Egbert was not willing to do all the work." Although plain spoken and often blunt he had a personality that commanded respect and inspired confidence.

Another of our almost self-made physicians and also one of unusual discernment, was Dr. Shirer, who lived many years on the Territorial road in Hamilton. By some of the better dressed and possibly better read doctors he was treated with disdain, either real or affected, though they lacked the quick insight that was his gift. His practice was large and he lost comparatively few cases, and over a wide extent of country he was held in grateful esteem .

HARRY LURKINS

Twenty-seven years ago, Harry admits, county agricultural extension work involved pioneering, but principally along lines of production of crops and livestock. Now, he says, such service has expanded like that of a drugstore into multiple duties of priorities, crop controls, price ceilings, manpower and war production.

Except for weekends, the Lurkins operate at a distance a farm in Van Buren county. That farm contributes to Berrien county agriculture since County Agent Lurkins maintains a policy of never advising farmers to do what he has not done or would not do on his own farm.

Since 1916 Berrien county has progressed steadily into more and more fruit and vegetable production, estimated at an average increase of 3 per cent per year. From the north end of the county, fruit production has swept down through the Berrien Springs fruit area to make the county leader in the state in fruit.

Changes have come, many of them participated in by the county agent. Peach production once was primarily the Elbertas, the Kalamazoo, the Gold Drop and the Prolific varieties. Now peaches bear the newer names of Halehaven, South Haven, Kalhaven, Amber Gem, Fertile Hale, the Rochester and the Oriole. Some of the best of these have come from Michigan State College agricultural experiment station efforts.

Russets and Tolman sweet apples have been left behind. The apple crop now features the McIntosh, Rhode Island Greening, Jonathan, Red Delicious and the Stayman Winesap.

A quarter-century ago a "mosquito fleet" carried much of the fruit crop across Lake Michigan to Chicago, Kenosha, Racine and Milwaukee on western shores. Railroads took the balance. Now, or at least in recent years when travel was normal, trucks carry 95 per cent of the produce out of the Benton Harbor market and the Berrien county area.

So many questioners hail Lurkins when he visits the Benton Harbor fruit market, the county agent often finds he covers only 100 feet of the huge place in an hour. On the street, in numerous meetings, telephone calls received even when most persons would be eating meals, the county agent is answering questions.

New methods which have come into the county, partly through the extension service, include developments in sprays and sprayers. Trashy cultivation, card notices on when to spray and why, weather and emergency notices are of long standing within the county.

A belief in the value of educating youth is involved in something new in extension work in Berrien county. This winter 108 district schools in the county will use school bulletin boards to display current information on modern farming and soil conservation. Tear sheets from newspaper farm pages will be posted, with other

The Decatur Fire Department

The Decatur Fire Department is doing a nice act in keeping in touch with its members in the service. The letters the boys write in reply show that the efforts are appreciated.

The receipt of the three letters printed in this paper recalls to mind that we have said but little about the Decatur firemen lately when there is always something good about them that can be said.

They are fighters, every one of them, and such good fighters that they keep fires away from this community before they get started. It is worthy of comment that very few fires have occurred in this community this year. We say this with fingers crossed, for fires may break out any where and at any time.

We would like the readers to meet again the members of the Decatur fire department. There are 26 active members ready to answer a call at the sounding of the alarm. For a purely voluntary department this is a fine representation.

There are 9 who were active members when the call came to them to leave home and friends and jobs and associations and go away to war. Then there are 13 who for various reasons have been voted onto an honorary list.

The officers are E. E. Woolfe, chief; Leo Southworth, asst. chief; Max Graham, secretary and treasurer; Maynard Southworth, captain; Fred McWilliams, Lieut.

TWO OF VAN BUREN COUNTY'S BEST RURAL SCHOOL TEACHERS

By Bessie Fuhrman

To Our Rural Schools:

One of the best characteristics of our democratic way of life is its public rural school system—a means of greatest importance in the preparation for good citizenship and high morality. And since the rural schools of our nation play so large a part as they do in our patriotic endeavor to carry forward the traditions of our country, we must recognize the fact that the district school teachers make up a vast army, mostly WAAC's if you pelase, but with none of the notariety of the latter, blessed though they be.

Without that army of women school teachers our people could hardly live or progress, let alone fight a war of any magnitude, for practically all our farmers, as well as many of our professionals and tradesmen would lack the educational foundation necessary for their work and higher training. We are vaguely aware of these facts and hardly realize that progress has been made in the district and rural schools, as in every other place of our national life.

It may be that we are not appreciative of just how far we have come in respect to public rural school teaching. But what could help us to more fully comprehend the progress of the rural school than a view in perspective of some of our schools of the past and present? And who are better qualified to present such vista of educational progress than some or our rural teachers of both past and present?

In keeping with this idea, it seems to me that two of our best Van Buren county teachers of the 80's and 90's could start the ball rolling to good advantage and then let others follow up with papers of a similar nature on the later times of our rural schools.

Two of our best country teachers of the 80's and 90's were Mrs. Blanche Mollitt Prullinger and Mrs. Ella Howard Maxwell. Both were school girls as well as school teachers in the Bray brooks school of Lawrence township, although both taught other schools within this county. Consequently, their knowledge of Michigan rural schools, particularly those of their own county, should prove a treasure store of interesting facts and sidelights on rural schools, of three generations ago. Glimpses of their experiences as teachers, their equipment and lack of modern equipment, their devices for helping their pupils to like school, and learn to study; their entertainments and observances of various holidays, would make interesting stories for the old and young of today.

Young teachers, who are now experiencing their first attempts to train little children and bigger boys and girls may glean helpful suggestions from the experiences of teachers who had to learn to teach by teaching instead of by modern normal college methods and critics.

SIXTY YEARS

Mr. and Mrs. William Wright of Volinia Celebrate Their Diamond Wedding

Marriage Licenses

Issued by the county clerk of Cass county: William Wright, 23, Volinia township, Cass county, and Clara Warner, 21, same.

Perhaps they did not need a license from the county clerk to get married 60 years ago, but the above would be the official record required had the marriage taken place within the last two generations.

However, the marriage of Will Wright and Clara Warner, and the vows they made,—"Until death do us part," were as binding and have been kept as sacredly as have any which have been made since, and few marriages have lasted as long.

It was on the thirty-first of October, 1883, that these two lively young people of our adjoining township drove up to the home of Rev. Robert E. Queel at the north limit of School street and were by him united in the holy bond of matrimony. Mr. Queel was pastor of the then prosperous Universalist church and one of the grand old men of Decatur.

They took a wedding trip on the train to Kalamazoo and Will put his horse and buggy up at the livery barn. He said he knew that crowd of Volinia young people would be waiting at the station to have some fun with them when they returned on the accommodation, so they fooled them by coming on the train that reached Decatur at two o'clock in the morning. They escaped the crowd that time, but the 'fun' was only delayed.

That wedding day was sixty years ago and last Sunday the grand anniversary, their diamond wedding, was celebrated.

During all of these years they have resided in Volinia township and for forty-two years in the pleasant home where they now reside.

The notice that they would welcome their friends from two to five o'clock in the afternoon was all that was needed to bring them out. Fifty or more were there, old time friends, many of them well into their eighties, all of them happy to greet and congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Wright, who have given a fine illustration of how to grow old and stay young.

Their cousin, Charles E. Warner, of Niles, wrote a poem for the occasion which several referred to as one of his best, and upon promise to return it Mrs. Wright let us take it to publish here:

Sixtieth Wedding Anniversary
William N. Wright-Clara M. Warner
1883-1943

SIXTY YEARS

Sixty years is a long, long time
To travel life's road together;
There's many a hill you've had to climb,
And have faced some stormy weather.
There were times you had to shift your gears,
And travel a little slow—
But even the best of engineers
Have trials to undergo.
There's some who find the road too rough—
Too many hills to climb—
And quit when the going gets too rough,
And their path has some grit and grime.

The test is not on the even road,
Where life is a cheerful song,
It comes when they both must fear the load—
When all their plans go wrong.
It is times when they have an overload
That tells of what stuff they're made—
It is easy to travel an even road,
But it's hard to make a grade.
You've made the grade for sixty years,
And we pray in unison:
"Don't quit this Vale of Smiles and and Tears
'Til you've made it sixty-one."

And then we'll pray for sixtytwo,
And sixty-three and four—
And that you then will not be through,
But more, and More, and MORE.

Chas. E. Warner.

Six Wolves Seen in Hamilton Woods

The wolves of Hamilton are out again. The first sight of them was about two weeks ago. They chased Charlie Bolles' dog out of the woods and right up to his house. Charlie went into the woods to see what had scared the dog and met two of the wolves. He got a good sight of them, and is sure they are wolves.

The next heard of them was last week Wednesday morning when Norman Goodrich found two dead sheep on the Will Young farm.

Thursday George Goodrich discovered one dead sheep and another badly mangled on his farm. The next day two others were found, one of them by Doyle Wilder. Frank Hazzard, Francis Nichols and Doyle were called to the farm to investigate the case and on Saturday afternoon went over the ground again.

Monday morning about 8 o'clock Ward Cady's helper distinctly saw 3 wolves and Bobbie Kidd saw 3 while plowing.

About ten men from the sheriff and police departments were sent out. They formed a posse and a half dozen farmers joined them. They went over the territory to try to locate them but abandoned the search in the afternoon.

Tuesday morning at 8 o'clock the officers and farmers met at the Weeks farm. There were 25 or more in the party and they took along a fox hound owned in Hartford. They combed the woods till 2:30 in the afternoon.

Some of the boys heard things in going through the brush but nobody saw any animal that looked like a wolf. Indications are that they became scared and left the wood, probably for the Hare swamp.

The men were unable to locate their den but are sure it is there. It is a big swampy woodland, nearly half of it under water. The moquitoes were something terrible, Doyle said, and the men had anything but an easy time of it. The officer says it would be advisable for the farmers in that vicinihy to keep a watch out for animals that have the appearance of wolves and if seen to notify the sheriff's department immediately.

61 Years In Decatur

In the year 1882, sixty one years ago the thirteenth of August, J. P. Jurgensen left his native home near Flansburg, Germany, to make his home in America. He arrived at Hamburg August 14. The next morning he left by boat for Havre, France. That was a full day's trip.

On the morning of August 16 he left Havre on a Hamburg-American line steamer for New York, and was 11 days on the ocean. The steamer arrived at the port in New York on the 28th and Mr. Jurgensen's 27th birthday was August 31.

He stayed in New York only long enough to take the next train for Detroit. There he worked four months, and came on to Decatur the first of January, 1883.

He could talk three languages, but English was not one of them, so he found it difficult to obtain work in the city. He was told of an advertisement in a Detroit paper that men were wanted to cut timber at Decatur, and he came here for that work.

The advertiser was Neils Peterson who had bought a large tract of land just west of this village which is now the Iodent farm. He worked for Mr. Peterson ten years during which time they cleared over 500 acres of heavy timber land.

Then Mr. Jurgensen bought the Lombard farm, which is now owned by his daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Dine. The farm was owned then by the Lombard daughters, Mrs. Marvin Hinkley and Mrs. Satie Schmit, and the sale was made by Marvin Hinkley.

79th Anniversary of First Baptist Church

By C. C. Evans

The 79th anniversary of the founding of the First Baptist church of Decatur, held August 30 was a grand success.

The service began at 3 o'clock with singing by the Chain Lake choir. The prayer was by Rev. C. H. Chappell of Chicago; scripture reading by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Slaughter of East Decatur.

The address of welcome was by Mrs. Fannie Allen and the response by Rev. J. K. Earley of Kalamazoo. The guest speaker was Rev. R. A. Shaw of Elkhart. The presentation of a reconditioned Bible given many years ago by Brother D. S. Brown, was made by his daughter, Mayme Jackson, and it was received by Deacon Robert Lennox.

Many friends were present from Chicago, Benton Harbor, Kalamazoo and adjoining towns. Mrs. Dorothy Brown Elliott gave a good talk and a good time was enjoyed by all present.

Other visitors and friends of the church were present from Battle Creek, Detroit, Dowagiac and Chicago.

I am adding a bit of reminiscence to this historical institution. When these old pioneers were hewing out timber to erect the church in the year of our Lord, 1863, the Battle of Gettysburg was in progress. So as the ax rang out in the Michigan forest the federal siege guns were belching forth fire at this great battle which was the turning point of the Civil War.

Incidents like this come and go and are finally forgotten, but the establishing of religious institutions such as the First Baptist Church of Decatur will live after bronze and marble have crumbled away.

REPLY TO THE GHOST OF NANCY HANKS

I remember your son
Whose bony hands
In prairie sands
And came to town
In his Sunday suit
Wearing Tom's hat
And shirt to boot.
He got a job
In a grocer's store
Weighin' out beans
And sweepin' the floor.
Then he bought leather boots
For his awkward feet
And practiced law
In the county seat.
He studied hard
(Almost every night)
Till the pages blurred
Beneath the candle light.
You'd have smiled
In your pioneer way
To see him readin'
About Henry Clay
And hear him talk
In a low-pitched tone
To a bed and a table
In a room, all alone
When he'd think of you
Before goin' to sleep,
He'd pray the Lord
Your soul to keep.
And he'd see your face
When the rains'd drip
Through the quiet hours
Of a flatboat trip.
"Did he have fun?"
Yes, in his youth
And he'd often laugh
In a way uncouth;
But in later years
When his road was steep
He kept his laughter
Way down deep.
"Did he grow tall?"
A good six feet.
With a roomy chest
Where a stout heart beat;
With hairy hands
To grip a plow
And a blacksmith's fists
That c'd stun a cow.
"Did he get on?"—
If what you mean
Is a white frame house
In a yard of green,
Or money to buy
A bottomland farm
Or store-bought clothes
To keep him warm,
Or the extra horse
So he could ride
Along country roads
With his village bride—
Well—
Gettin' on like that Wasn't his way.
He didn't gauge success
By the bales of hay,
Or the cords of wood
A man can buy,
Or the acres he owns
In wheat or rye.
He didn't care
For wealth in gold
But for wealth in love
That a heart could hold.
Your son Abe
Was of different clay.
He'd forget to ask
His rightful pay
As a lawyer should
When he wins a case
And the right prevails
Against the base.
He made his way
By a different road
And his shoulders carried
A heavy load
While cannon belched
And generals led
Gaunt gray troops
Of marching dead,
While fear-crazed boys
Slogged through mud
And cannisters were
Flecked with blood,
While Sherman rode
Through a southern street
And a drummer died
In a field of wheat.
Yes, Abe got on,
Though few can tell
How he ever lived through
The war's black hell
And he died at last
In a President's bed
While the nation mourned
Its departed dead.

So, if you're the ghost
Of Nancy Hanks,
You'll find Abe there
Where armor clanks
And you'll see his face
If you care to look
For his eyes will smile
With a God-like look.

SAINT PETER AT THE GATE

By Joseph Bert Smiley.

Saint Peter stood guard by the golden gate
With a solemn mien and an air sedate,
When up to the top of the golden stair
A man and a woman, ascending there,
Applied for admission. They came and stood
Before Saint Peter, so great and good,
In hope the City of Peace to win,—
And asked Saint Peter to let them in.

The woman was tall, and lank, and thin,
With a scraggly beardlet upon her chin.
The man was short and thick and stout,
His stomach was built so it rounded out,
His face was pleasant, and all the while
He wore a kindly and genial smile.
The choirs in the distance the echoes woke,
And the man kept still while the woman spoke.

"O thou who guardest the gate," said she,
"We two come hither, beseeching thee
To let us enter the heavenly land,
And play our harps with the angel band.
Of me, Saint Peter, there is no doubt,
There's nothing from heaven to bar me out.
I've been to meeting three times a week,
And almost always I'd rise and speak.

I've told the sinners about the day
When they'd repent of their evil way.
I've told my neighbors,—I've told them all
'Bout Adam and Eve, and the primal fall,
I've shown them what they'd have to do
If they'd pass in with the chosen few.
I've marked their path of duty clear,—
Laid out the plan for their whole career.

I've talked and talked to them, loud and long,
For my lungs are good and my voice is strong.
So good Saint Peter, you'll clearly see,
The gate of heaven is open for me,
But my old man, I regret to say,
Hasn't walked in exactly the narrow way.
He smokes and he swears, and grave

He never would pray with an earnest vim
Or go to revival, or join in a hymn,
So I had to leave him in sorrow there,
While I, with the chosen, united in prayer.
He ate what the pantry chanced to afford,
While I, in my purity, sang to the Lord.
And if cucumbers were all he got,
It's a chance if he merited them, or not.

But Oh, Saint Peter, I love him so,
To the pleasures of heaven please let him go.
I've done enough, a saint I've been.
Won't that atone? Can't you let him in?

By my grim gospel, I know 'tis so
That the unrepentant must fry below,
But isn't there some way you can see,
That he may enter, who's dear to me?

It's a narrow gospel by which I pray,
But the chosen expect to find some way
Of coaxing, or fooling, or bribing you
So that their relation can amble through.
And say, Saint Peter, it seems to me
This gate isn't kept as it ought to be.
You ought to stand by the opening there,
And never sit down in that easy chair.

And say, Saint Peter, my sight is dimmed,
But I don't like the way your whiskers are trimmed.
They're cut too wide, and outward toss,
They'd look better narrow, cut straight across.
Well, we must be going, our crowns to win,
So open, Saint Peter, and we'll pass in."

Saint Peter sat quiet, and stroked his staff,
But spite of his office, he had to laugh,
Then said, with a fiery gleam in his eye,
"Who's tending this gateway, you, or I"
And then he arose, in his stature tall,
And pressed a button upon the wall,
And said to the imp who answered the bell,
Escort this female around to hell."

The man stood still, as a piece of stone,—
Stood sadly, gloomily there alone.
A lifelong settled idea he had
That his wife was good and he was bad.
He thought if the woman went down below,
That he would certainly have to go,—
That if she went down to the regions dim,
There wasn't the ghost of a show for him.

Slowly he turned, as by habit bent,
To follow wherever the woman went.
Saint Peter, standing on duty there,
Observed that the top of his head was bare.
He called the gentleman back and said
'Friend, how long, may I ask, hast thou been wed?"
"Thirty years," (with a weary sigh)—
And then he thoughtfully added,—"why?"

Saint Peter was silent. With head bent down
He raised his hand and scratched his crown.
Then, seeming a different thought to take,
Slowly, half to himself, he spake:
"Thirty years with that woman there?
No wonder the man hasn't any hair.
Swearing is wicked. Smoke's not good.
He smoked and he swore,—I should think he would.

"Thirty years with that tongue so sharp?
Ho! ANGEL GABRIEL! GIVE HIM A HARP!
A jeweled harp, with a golden string,
Good Sir, pass in where the angels sing.
Gabriel, give him a seat alone,—
One with a cushion, up near the throne,
Call up some angels to play their best.
Let him enjoy the music, and rest.
See that on finest ambrosia he feeds.
He's had about all the hell he needs.
It isn't just hardly the thing to do
To roast him on earth, and the future too."

They gave him a harp with golden strings,
A glittering robe and a pair of wings,
And he said, as he entered the realm of day,
"Well, this beats cucumbers, any way."
And so the scriptures had come to pass.
The last shall be first and the first shall be last.

"I see by the paper that you have a call for a copy of 'St. Peter at the Gate', so here it is.

Our Boys in the Service

CAPT. JACK LYLE VISITS KALAMAZOO

Captain Jack Lyle, Camp Young, Calif., spent a leave with Mrs. Lyle, the former Miss Phyllis Hudson, 411 Locust street, and relatives in Decatur, and returned to duty September 9.

Capt. Lyle was inducted in April, 1941, and received his basic training at Aberdeen, Md., after which he was transferred to Camp Stewart, Ga., and then to Fort Bragg, N. C., and Virginia Beach, Va. He attended the officer candidate school, Aberdeen, Md., where he was commissioned a second lieutenant in July, 1942. He returned to Camp Stewart, and then was transferred with the 595th Ordnance group, as company commander to Fort McClellan, Ala., where he was promoted to the rank of captain in June.

Before entering service, Capt. Lyle attended Western Michigan College.

GETTING CADET TRAINING

Sept. 2, 1943. 2100 (9 p. m.)

Dear Mother, Grandmother and Louis,

Here I am in preflight at last. I'm really starting training now.

Yesterday, Wednesday, we got up at 0400. I packed all my belongings in about 2½ hours. We wore our insignia and garrison caps and white gloves. Classy, eh what? We marched to the edge of Classification, then had a band play for us and some officers made speeches. There were about 2000 of us lined up out there. We marched by groups (400 to 600 men) over to our new barracks. Slept some, ate dinner, unpacked, had policing detail, group orientation and guard lecture, made up our beds and finished unpacking. Up at 0545, bed at 2200 (10 p. m.)

This morning we had a 3 hour orientation lecture in the Service Club. Then we drilled till we were interrupted by a hard rain. Got pretty wet, but changed. This afternoon we had P. T. lecture, military courtesy and discipline lecture and movie, and details. It has rained a good share of the day.

Our barracks (Sqd.) has a good location: near Wing Hdqtrs., 4 blocks from Service Club, 1 block from theatre, 1 block from church, 1 block from swimming pool, and ½ block from P. X.

At last I'm getting Cadet Training. I start classes tomorrow afternoon or next morning. I'll get plenty of P. T. here, that will build me up considerably more. Our officers here are good. They are plenty strict, but they are on the ball. They know what they want us to do and how to make us do it so we won't feel we are being driven to do it by fear.

We are kept pretty busy already. I guess I've told you quite a bit and most all of what I've done here so far. Oh yes, I have to have a swimming suit, so send me mine.

Hope things are going all right back home and you are feeling well mother. Say, is your birthday the 28th of October? Louis, if you get a chance, write me and answer some of the questions I've asked you in various letters. Grandma, hope you are feeling a little better. I think of you a lot.

Much love to all,
Hiram.

Mrs. David Urick has heard from her brother indirectly, but she is assured that he is all right or was a couple of weeks ago. His name is Fay Rose and he entered the service from his home in Niles. He is now in Sicily.

HERE WE ARE IN LOUISIANA

We are indebted to Mrs. Grover Adam for the following letter from her son Robert whose address is given below. The Adam family now reside on Route 1, Hartford, but for many years were residents of this community and Robert attended the Decatur school. He has many friends here and in the country and it would probably please him to hear from some of them.

We left camp Thursday morning and camped at the fair grounds in Beaumont, Texas Thursday night.

They had a big swimming pool there and I had a nice cool swim.

We got here about 2:30. We have rifle inspection every day and if they are dirty we get fined $5 and it's double every time after that. It's the same with shaving. If we have dirty hands we don't eat.

We get one steel helmet full of water to take a bath in every day and about two canteens of water to drink. It sure is warm down here too.

We had a dandy electrical storm Friday night and lightning sure played ——— around here for a while.

We have a few snakes, not many mosquitoes, and yesterday one of the boys caught a wild hog. We had to let it go though.

The ground isn't so hard to dig in and the country looks something like Michigan. The hills do anyway. We have lots of Norway Pine.

We are moving our tents today, trying to get them straight. Will make this one short; have lots of work. Hope to see you soon.

Love, "Robin."

LETTERS FROM JOE AND LEWIS FORBES

Lewis Forbes writes from the Desert Training Center, in Southern California,—

August 20, 1943.

Dear Dad,

I am feeling fine and hope you and Sam are. Joe came in here about 4 o'clock this morning, but I didn't get up to see him. He is stationed about 20 miles from here on the desert. I saw his sergeant yesterday and found out when he was coming but was too tired to get up. We had a good shower Sunday.

Lewis W. Forbes.

A letter from Joe.

August 28, 1943.

Sam and Dad,

Just a few lines to let you know I am feeling fine and hope you folks are. We are out here where it gets plenty hot. It has been about 130 in the day time but it gets cooler at night. Most every night we sleep under a blanket.

I was in to see brother Lou a week ago today. He is coming out here tomorrow to spend the day. He is stationed about 18 miles from where we are. He is at the rail head where we draw rations and supplies.

The desert sure is a sandy place. We have lots of trouble driving trucks in the sand with the big guns on them.

We went on a motor march last night, got stuck and sure had a time getting back. We must wear our clothes out here all the time. We can't go around without a shirt. We don't have much entertainment, just a USO show to go to at night.

We have a PX here so have pop and beer to drink. Write when you can and good luck. Your son and brother, Joseph Forbes.

A line from Jim Kemp says, "I thought you might like to have a postal as a souvenir from Sicily. This is a panoramic scene of a town with Mount Aetna in the back ground. A small portion of the Mediterranean sea can be seen. Sicily is really a very pretty island."

It is a beautiful picture and we are indeed glad to own it. It is our first souvenir of Sicily. Thanks, Jim.

WILL LIVE IN CALIFORNIA

September 9, 1943.

I got a letter from David Urick's brother by air mail this morning he sent August 25th, saying he got the letter I sent him July the 12th on August 24th. He says, "You see I'm a long way from home. Sorry, I can't send any pictures or souvenirs, but would like to very much." He intends to live in California after the war is over, but will come back long enough to see us and get his family—his wife and little girl. They are living in Kalamazoo now. You will see he is Private First Class now and his address is,

Pfc Loren V. Urick,

ORVILLE BARNHART IN ENGLAND

(Here are two good letters from Orville Barnhart. At last he has been able to leave Iceland and is in England. The change is a happy one for him after so long a time on that barren northern island.)

August 28, 1943.

Dear folks,

I guess you will think that I am screwy or something not hearing from me for so long and then asking for money. Well I have not received it yet but should before long. I had a few days off sooner than I expected, so borrowed some money. I had a very nice time, in fact the best time for years and think we really deserve it. I saw Nash and Hovenkamp lately, but it seems I can never get a chance to visit with them much. They both look just fine. I have never seen Conway but may some day.

I received several papers the other day. One had the letter in it from George, telling about Rex. George sure must be a fine fellow. I can understand a lot of things that he can't say.

How are the pigs getting along? I bet they are doing good if you can get enough feed for them.

I suppose Kenneth has moved by this time. I owe him a letter. Guess I must write. Well, folks, I have about run out of anything to say. Needless to say I am feeling just fine, in fact guess a bit more cheerful than for quite a while. Guess I will close for now. I have to wash out a few clothes. So-long for now. Say hello to everybody. With love, Orville.

Professor Goddard Of U. of M. Dies

His Wife, Who Was the Former Lillian Rosewarne of Decatur, Passed Away 3 Years Ago.

Ann Arbor.—Emeritus Professor Edwin C. Goddard, whose home was also home, at various times, to more than 100 students whom he had provided with free board and lodging during their college days died last Friday in University hospital.

He was 77 years old and had been with the faculty of the University of Michigan law school for 35 years.

Prof. Goddard first came to the university in 1885, as a student, receiving his Ph. B. degree four years later. From 1889 to 1895, when he was recalled as an instructor in mathematics, he served as a high school principal in Saginaw.

He completed his law studies in 1899 and became a member of the law school faculty in that year. The university accorded him his professorship in 1917.

He found time, apart from his academic work, for many and varied off-the-campus activities. He was a member of the original committee appointed to study proposals for the beautification of the Huron river valley and the development of its recreational resources.

He also served as a director of the Farmers' & Mechanics' bank until its merger in 1936 and as a trustee of the Board of Education.

Prof. Goddard likewise was affiliated with many clubs and organizations. He was a past president of the Michigan Schoolmasters' Club, a leader in the Emeritus Club of Michigan Alumni, a member of both state and normal bar associations and of the U. of M. Club. He wore the keys to two honorary fraternities, Phi Beta Kappa and Phi Delta Phi.

Prof. Goddard married Lillian Rosewarne, a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Rosewarne, one of the pioneer families of Little Prairie Ronde. The wedding took place about fifty years ago in the pleasant Rosewarne home, now the home of Vivian Rosewarne, grandson of the original owner. The couple had met when both were students of the University. Mrs. Goddard preceded her husband in death about 3 years ago. Prof. Goddard was an occasional visitor here during the many years that the older generation of relatives were in their prime. He was a splendid citizen and made lasting friends here and wherever he went.

Upon the death of her father Miss Katherine Rosewarne, sister of Mrs. Goddard, became a member of the family and still resides in the household.

Funeral services were held in Ann Arbor at 3 o'clock Monday afternoon and the Misses Kate and Lana Kern were present from Decatur.

NEWTON WOODS

By Frank Flagg.

I love to walk in Newton Woods;
To tramp among the trees.
I love the cool refreshing shade;
The mumur of its leaves.
I pause beside this giant trunk;
I touch it with my hand,
And, Oh, how puny I become
As by its side I stand!

I like to sit within its shade
Far from the broad highway;
Far from the hasty rushing crowd
Who haven't time to stay.
Alone in Newton Woods I find
A fairy land of dreams,
As I idle here at dusk,
My soul with visions teems.

In Newton Woods, swift Time turns back
Five hundred years or more;
This elm a youthful giant stood
As Columbus sought our shore.
That whitewood was a full grown tree
Long ere the Pilgrims came;
Here Indians chased the wild red deer
And other woodland game.

The creek that flows through Newton Woods
And races to the sea,
Chants its one time happy song—
Now changed—to you and me.
Laughing here and sobbing there,
And sighing now and then;
It tells its tale of Nature's grief
At the heartlessness of men.

The kingly souls that loved this woods
And held this sacred trust,
Have long since passed to realms more fair,—
Their earthly frames to dust.
And others scattered near or far,
Who hold this gorgeous thing,
Are prone to sell this gift of God
For whate'er price 'twould bring.

* * * *

I walk, today in Newton Woods
And all around me ring
Echoes of the squirrel's bark
And songs the wood-birds sing.
They were the same in ages gone
When all the world was young.
They speak of glories long since past;
Soon forgotten and unsung.

I walk today in Newton Woods;
I fear to look ahead,
For soon these stalwart living things
Will prostrate be, and dead,
And only rotting, blackened stumps
Where once these giants stood
Will tell in mute, inglorious way
The lost splendor of this wood.

To the Reader:

I do not wish this to be a complaint against the present heirs of Newton Woods. It is their right, and duty to dispose of the estate to their own advantage. I would be disposed to do the same if it were mine. The pitiful thing is that we of this generation will let it go to the saw mill, because we cannot find a few thousand souls that would be willing to share in its preservation. I know I shall not be the only one that will see it laid low with a heavy heart.

Yours most sincerely,

Frank Flagg.

SOIL LIKE BANK ACCOUNT SAYS BERRIEN CO. AGENT

LURKINS SERVES AS ADVISOR TO $15,000,000 INDUSTRY

By E. B. Swingle, Editor
Michigan Extension News

(The following story about Harry Lurkins was printed in the October number of the Michigan Extension News, published by the Michigan State College at East Lansing. The Republican is indebted to Lewis G. Hall of Adrian for it, and in his letter he writes,—

"The enclosed copy of the Michigan Extension News carries a lead article on our mutual friend, Harry J. Lurkins which is particularly fitting as he is a great agent.

"It has given me so much satisfaction that I have taken this opportunity to call it to your attention, thinking you would be interested.

"I confess that while Harry and I are both county agricultural agents, he is so outstanding that we have only one other thing in common, that is that we both graduated from the Decatur high school."

Yes, Harry is a great agent, perhaps the best in the whole state of Michigan, but we are also proud of two other agricultural agents who had their origin in this community.

Lewis Hall, who sent the Lurkins story, has for the past ten years or more held the position of agricultural agent of Lenawee county whose fertile soil and enterprising farmers have made it a leading farm county in the state. And John Woodman, our own efficient agent, raised in the same neighborhood with Harry Lurkins, also knows his subject thoroughly; is a tireless worker and fills his important office to the entire satisfaction of our citizens. His father, the late Jason Woodman, was the first agent of Kalamazoo county, and we believe he was the first county agricultural agent in the state. Van Buren county has good reason to be proud of its citizens who have followed this calling.)

Harry Lurkins

Advisor to a 15-million dollar industry.

Philosopher—with practical visions of running a farm like a bank account, adding fertility to soil assets as the operator withdraws crops.

Just where does a writer begin to describe how Harry Lurkins carries on as county agricultural agent in Berrien county where two-thirds of the annual 15 million dollar farm income comes from fruit and the remainder from general farming?

"Harry likes people," says Mrs .Lurkins from observations she has made sihce 1927. Harry became one of the first county agents in the state when he was appointed in 1916. He engaged in other work from 1920 to 1927 and then returned to the St. Joseph court house in that year, with Mrs. Lurkins as his office assistant.

From early days in the work, Lurkins always has coaxed, advised and even preached a more permanent agriculture. He was engaged in 1916 by the Berrien County Agricultural association, ably led by President Rolland Morrill, peach and cantaloup king of Benton Harbor, and Secretary George Friday, fruit grower of Coloma.

In his first appearance before this group which paid in voluntary contributions for the work, Lurkins before he was employed aroused the fruit growers. He asserted that a fifth of the peach trees were starving, that only good quality and good volume could repay growers, and that soil must be treated like a bank account.

Another new trend, already proved practical by fruit and produce growers within the county, involves rebuilding the soil. Several farmers have taken one-fourth of their land and placed it in a rebuilding program, eventually getting far greater yields from three-fourths of the land during the rotation. On every fourth acre, the farmer grows two cover crops. The first is plowed "in," not under. The second cover crop stays on during winter months and then is turned into increased soil fertility.

More in the idea stage is Lurkins' suggestion that certified fruit farms be developed, just as there are such farms for certified potatoes, certified grains for seed. These certified fruit farms would become sources of good fruit stock for new or replanted orchards.

Those are highlights of an extension service that reaches back 27 years, but one which still visualizes the top problems of today and numerous tomorrows. Get Harry to tell you more about them, if you can corner him between meetings, office and telephone calls. Or talk to Mrs. Lurkins, who knows the county, its farmers and fruit growers and their problems about as well as her husband.

Our Beloved Dr. Thorp Has Finished His Earthly Career

A tribute and Brief Sketch of His Life By His Cousin, Helen Hathaway.

Rollin Lester Thorp was born in the village of Nicholsville, the location of the Little Prairie Ronde postoffice, on November 2nd, 1860. He was a son of Charles W. and Amanda Richmond Thorp.

At that time, Mr. Thorp was operating a general store in Nicholsville. Not long after Rollin's birth, however, he entered the Union Army in the Civil War and became a Lieutenant in Company "K" of Berdan's Sharpshooters. This left the mother alone to care for the home and the infant child. It was during that time that the child was stricken with smallpox and Mrs. Thorp went through the trying experience of nursing him alone in a home that was quarantined. Supplies had to be brought to the house and left outside where the mother could get them.

Rollin first attended what was later known as the "Huycktown" school, although the building was then a plain wooden structure, and his education was continued in the Decatur High School. He and Finlay Huff roomed upstairs in the Moulton home, and our Editor has sweet memories of the days when he enjoyed a hand-out from the home cookie-crock in the boys' room.

Rollin's higher education began at Ypsilanti State Normal School in the days before it bore the name, "College", and he was graduated in 1882. For a time he taught school at Minooka, Illinois, where his Aunt Kittie Richmond, who later became Mrs. Benjamin Hathaway, kept house for him.

A little later Rollin took up the study of medicine and completed his first course at Rush Medical College, Chicago. At about that time in his life, he married the charming Nannie Bitely, a school teacher of Casnovia, Michigan, where he located and began the practice of medicine.

Rollin's two younger brothers, Elmer and Charlie, were also physicians. Elmer, however, developed tuberculosis early in his career. Rollin stood nobly by his brother in his illness. He accompanied and attended him in the South and the Southwest, where he tried the milder climate in an effort to recover his health, but all to no avail, and he passed on in 1892. The father followed him in the spring of 1895.

Dr. Charlie Thorp (better known as "Charlie Boy") became an army surgeon and located in the Philippine Islands, where he contracted a disease to which the natives were subject and from which he never recovered. His death occurred in the spring of 1910.

Soon after the birth of their first child, Roy Lester, Nannie Bitely Thorp was taken, leaving Rollin with the young baby, who was cared for by his mother for several years.

In the meantime, Rollin took another course in medicine and received his degree from the Bennett College of Eclectic Medicine and Surgery in 1889, after which he practiced for a time in Chicago.

On August first, 1891, he took up his residence in Denver, Colorado, where he lived and practiced the remainder of his life. He was licensed to practice medicine there on October 6, 1891. He took post-graduate work at the old Gross Medical College in Denver, from which he received his medical degree in 1895.

Rollin remarried in about the year 1900, and he and his beautiful wife, Ida, took Roy into their home. At eighteen, Roy contracted spinal meningitis and lived only a few days. Rollin was thus left childless; and while he never had another son of his own he had a remarkable experience which brought a child into his life to take, as nearly as possible, the place of his own son.

A young man who needed help to get a start in life, came to Rollin, who took him into his own office and trained him in the medical profession. His protege, however, entered the service in World War I, leaving a young wife, to whom Rollin acted as friend, counselor and physician, and attended her at the birth of her baby boy, William, better known as "Bill."

In spite of Rollin's devoted attention, the young mother was taken, leaving the infant boy in Rollin's tender care. He and his wife took Bill into their own home, where he remained as their own child, to whom they were devotedly attached,—indeed after the coming of Bill into the home, Rollin was heard to say that "there were now no rooms to let in his heart any more". In due time, however, the young father returned from the service and remarried, taking Bill into his home.

This young physician did excellent credit to his training in Rollin's office and became the noted Dr. William C. Finnoff, who ranked among the world's foremost authorities on trachoma, one of the most dreaded and unconquered diseases of the eye. However, Dr. Finnoff's career was soon cut short by his death in the early thirties; and after the passing of his father, Rollin again stood by Bill, acting virtually as his foster father; and it was while he accompanied Bill on a trip to enter Antioch College, Ohio, that Rollin visited his Aunt Kittie Hathaway at Ann Arbor in September, 1935, as well as visiting other Michigan relatives and friends.

Rollin's mother, Mrs. Amanda Thorp, whose fine personality and leadership along higher lines in the Little Prairie Ronde community may be recalled by some of our older residents, passed on in 1917; and at that time the Thorp home in Nicholsville was broken up. From then on, Rollin's Aunt Kittie took, as nearly as possible, his mother's place in his heart.

The Man and Physician

What shall we say of Rollin, the man and physician? Somewhere we have seen in the preface of a book a description of a personality that we think would just fit our Dr. Thorp. We cannot quote it verbatim, but it ran something like this:—

There is occasionally a personality, rarely found in a clergyman, more often in the physician,—one that reaches out and meets other souls in a sympathy and understanding that is most extraordinary. This would seem to fit our Dr. Thorp. His ability to reach out and extend the helping hand was almost beyond anything we can conceive of.

We have recorded the instance of his influence on the life of Dr. Finnoff and son Bill. Another case, rather unusual, was that of a young man, whom he helped become an architect, and who later represented our government in the matter of erecting government buildings in Manila. So it is evident that his interest in stimulating our youth was not confined to the medical field.

From what we can glean regarding his association with his patients, the same element of intense personal interest prevailed. We cannot classify him in his success as a physician. The effect of such souls upon his contemporaries cannot be pigeon-holed or classified. We might almost say with Shakespeare, "It is mightier than the mightiest", and "It droppeth as the gentle rain upon the place beneath."

Rollin was especially interested in, not only relatives, but old friends of past days, who chanced to visit his city; and it was quite the custom among us back home to write a letter of introduction for any one in whom we had special interest, to present to Rollin upon a visit to his city. In no case did Rollin fail to respond to this challenge to his social nature. He loved a visit with any one who could talk over old times back in the 80's and 90's; and he could lose himself completely in one of those reminiscent visits.

Our ability to understand Rollin's professional success has been greatly aided by our acquaintance and friendship with his office secretary and able assistant, Miss Grace Willetts. Through her eyes we have been able to see how his patients responded to his treatments, and we are sure that each received a stimulus that sent him on his way rejoicing and that made of the patient a loyal friend throughout the remainder of his life. We also know through our own experience of case after case that Dr. Thorp helped to recover from some ailment that no doctor in our part of the country was somehow able to help, or at least did not do so. Again and again, the eager request came, "Send to Rollin, he helped me before." We are informed that one of his outstanding accomplishments was his own formula for gastric ulcers that has worked miracles in curing that condition.

Rollin practiced for some years in close association with the late Dr. Mugrage, whose passing he greatly mourned. We believe the good old doctor's son was one of the physicians who attended Rollin in his last sickness.

At the time of his last visit to Michigan, Rollin stated that he had practiced in Denver forty-four years; that he was six years at St. Joseph's Hospital in that city, and then started St. Anthony's Hospital, at which he practiced for twelve years.

An Active Mason

Dr. Thorp was a member of the Colorado State Medical Association, the Medical Society of the City and County of Denver, and the American Medical Association. He was also a charter member of the Physicians and Surgeons Club, one of the oldest organizations of medical men in Denver. He was at one time physician and surgeon for the old Denver Gas and Electric company, now the Public Service Company of Colorado, and he established his office in the Gas and Electric Building soon after it was completed.

Dr. Thorp was a Mason, a past Master of Highlands Lodge, a Knight Templar and a member of El Jebel shrine. Along with other workers in his Order, he sponsored a movement for the benefit of under-privileged children; and it was his special delight to accompany a group of these children on their annual picnic up at his cabin in the mountains. Some of our friends will recall the picture of Rollin sitting on the ground and holding the end of a rope, while the game was for the boys to try to pull "Dock's" three hundred odd pounds up on his feet, but they never could do it.

His Last Illness

Rollin felt deeply the loss of his beloved Aunt Kittie in 1939. He had hardly recovered from that blow when his wife, Ida, at the close of an evening's visit with him, rose to retire and dropped into a chair, never to rise again. One by one, his earlier friends and associates vanished into the unknown land, and left him to endure a loneliness from which he could not recover. Yet he kept up his good cheer and handed out what he had to give, surviving a broken hip and a severe attack of pneumonia in his last years, until he succumbed to the trouble which took him to St. Lukes Hospital in Denver during the month of April. He survived the operation and recovered sufficiently to be taken home, where his excellent housekeeper, Mrs. Batchelor, did her utmost to make him comfortable; but with her efforts, the aid of two nurses and several doctors, he still failed to recover and was taken from this world at 3:30 a. m. May 28th.

His last rites were attended by the Masonic Blue Lodge, with Knights Templar escort.

Those who most keenly felt Dr. Thorp's passing out in Denver, were Bill Finnoff and his wife, and the faithful and efficient assistant, Grace Willetts, and her mother, whose friend he had been for many years. Bill, who has married and has two fine boys, has become a successful chemist at the Arms plant. Rollin also left two cousins in Denver, Archie Himmelwright and a Mrs. Stover, besides eleven cousins in Michigan on his mother's side, and a number of cousins on the Thorp side.

"We cannot say, and we will not say, he is dead, he is just away." He has gone from our midst, it is true, but his influence lives, and we must feel that, in that fairer clime of love and light, his rich powers shall expand and his great-heartedness shall go on increasing evermore.

THE INEBRIATE'S LAMENT

Where are the friends that to me were so dear,
Long, long ago; long, long ago?
Where are the hopes that my heart used to cheer,
Long, long ago; long ago?
Friends that I loved in the grave are laid low,
Hopes that I cherished are fled from me now;
I am degraded for rum was my foe,
Long, long ago; long ago,

Sadly my wife bow'd her beautiful head,
Long, long ago; long, long ago.
Oh, how I wept when I found she was dead,
Long, long ago; long ago.
She was an angel, my love and my guide,
Vainly to save me from ruin she tried;
Poor, broken-hearted, 'twas well that she died,
Long, long ago; long ago.

Let me look back on the days of my youth,
Long, long ago; long, long ago.
I was no stranger to virtue and truth,
Long, long ago; long ago.
Oh, for the hopes that were pure as the day,
Oh, for the love that was purer than they;
Oh, for the hours that I squandered away,
Long, long ago; long ago.

WAR STARS

(Mrs. Geo. Cook of Otsego sent the Republican another poem written by her friend, Miss Helen Burrough Miss Burroughs has a twin brother Pvt. Harold Burroughs, who is overseas in Egypt, and thoughts of him inspired her to write the touching lines that follow.)

Star in a window,
Each tells a story;
Some are dimmed with sadness,
Others shine with glory.

Star in a window,
A vacant chair there,
A loved one is missing
Somewhere over there.

Star in a window,
Orange blossoms and lace
Her dreams set aside
A star takes their place.

Star in a window,
Empty arms wait there,
A son has been lost
Somewhere over there.

Star in a window,
All whisper a loss
Each heartache a star,
Each star a cross.

Star in a window,
A loved one waits there
Take care of him, God,
Not one can we spare.

Star in a window,
A symbol of prayer;
Bring them back safely
Our boys over there.

WALTER BROWN SEZ-

Say, you are perfectly right about Andy Johnson being impeached. I remember it perfectly well. He was impeached. I remember it way back at the time it happened. I was quite a boy then.

And I want to thank Mrs. Truesdell for what she said last week. That was a beautiful expression.

I've brought you the letter I got from Janet Curtis of Detroit, and you can print it if you want to. It's a nice letter and I think a lot of it.

I went over to Lakeside cemetery Thursday and planted some geraniums on father's and Mabel's graves. The cemetery looks beautiful. Who do you think I saw over there? Well, I will tell you. It was Elmer Woolfe and his wife. Elmer was mowing and he mowed all around that part of the cemetery where they buried Mrs. Martz.

That Elmer Woolfe is one fine fellow, you bet your life. I remember him well when he was a little kid. He used to come over to our house and climb up into a chair and talk with Mary and tell her what he was going to do when he got to be a man. He was looking way ahead and he had big ideas, yes he had. I never forgot that. It used to please Mary.

Well, he is one man who has made good. He works for the people, always doing for somebody else. He is certainly a good man for his home town.

Janet Curtis used to come out to Myron McGowan's in Lawrence and spend her vacations when she was a little girl. That is where Mary and I first met her and we have been good friends ever since. She graduated from the Detroit high school a few years ago, I couldn't say just when, and has a job now in Detroit.

Well, Edsell Ford is gone. That is too bad. I always liked his father, for he and I used the same reader when we went to school. It was McGuffey's reader. I kept my copy till just a few years ago when I let my grandson, Melvin Brown, have it. I let him have all of my old school books, I didn't want them any longer.

Here is a poem I found among some papers that Mary had put away. She never threw away anything, I don't care what it was. I happened to run across it and thought I would like to have you see it.

It's in father's hand writing all right. I recognized that, and it must be over a hundred years old, all of that.

I think father wrote it when he was teaching school in Kentucky. He taught school there when he was a young fellow. He couldn't have been over 18 or 19. He taught school in Pleasant Hill Kentucky.

Father was born in 1818 eleven miles the other side of Rochester, New York. He went to Chagrin Falls, Ohio, in quite an early day, it must have been. I couldn't say much about his history, but it must have been while he was living on the farm 12 miles from the Falls that he taught school in Kentucky.

Father never wrote poetry so far as I know, but that is his writing all right. I recognize that. He never said much but he was quite a thinker. I've always known he was quite a thinker.

The poem.

BEAUCHAMP'S CONFESSION

O dreadful dark and dismal days
How are my glories, fled away,
My sun's gone down, my days are past
I leave this pleasant world at last.

O Lord what will become of me
I am condemn'd, you all may see,
To heaven or hell my soul must fly
As in a moment when I die.

Judge David has my sentence past,
I leave this pleasant world at last,
Nothing to cheer my drouping head
Until I'm numbered with the dead.

But O, that awful Judge I fear;
Shall I that awful sentence hear?—
Depart you cursed, down into hell,
In flames forever there to dwell.

Me thinks that frighted ghost I see
Lamenting, tottering misery;
And I must their attendants be
To murder in the first degree.

His feeble hands fell gently down,
His chattering tongue has lost it's sound;
To see his soul and body part,
It strikes a terror to my heart.

How shall I meet the murdered face
Where blood is spilt upon the place?
His flaming eyes to me will say,
Why did you take my life away.

I took his blooming days away,
Give him no time to God to pray;
And if his sins fall on his head,
Must I not bear them in his stead?

O Lord how shall I be forgiven?
Not fit for earth or yet for heaven;
But little time to pray to heaven,
And then not sure to be forgiven.

Say, has anybody told you who that fellow was that Charlie Frye visited with? I'll tell you who it is. Any old timer ought to know. It was Bert Culverhouse. I guessed it the minute I read about him.

I think he used to work for the Michigan Central railroad and when the next I heard about him he was in the coal business.

I remember when the little feller worked in Browning's drug store. He was in the cellar when the store caught fire and burned up. He would have been burned up sure if it hadn't been for that grate in front of the store. He ran up to it and somebody pulled him out through the grate. I've forgotten who it was that pulled him out, but Bert owes his life to him, yes he does.

I had gone onto the Prairie to get a load of hay when that fire started. It was about noon as near as I can remember. I got the hay of Austin Lawrence, had loaded up and had just started home. I saw the smoke going up into the sky and knew there was a big fire in town. Was pretty sure it was on Main street, but couldn't tell exactly, It was so far away.

Now you can know I was anxious to get to town and find out about it. It might have been the Novelty Works for all I knew. I kept slapping the lines over the horses to hurry them up, but it didn't do much good. You can't hurry a team of horses much when they are pulling a load of hay. I guess you can't. If the hay was in front of them and they were hungry that would be different.

When I got to town the fire was pretty well burned down and the damage, whatever it was, had been done. I drove to the barn with the hay, got the horses put away and then hurried to town to learn what had happened It was a sorry sight, I can tell you. A fire always is, especially when it is in the heart of the business district.

I've forgotten what year that fire was in, but it was a long time ago, yes it was. Well, I must be going back to the house. It takes me quite a while to get there, and night will be on again before we know it.

(That Browning fire was in June 1893. Besides the drug store three frame building were destroyed. While Walt and the Editor were framing up this column Stub Woolfe called through the open window and also identified Charlie's Frye's visitor in Kalamazoo as Bert Culverhouse. Several others had curiosities but could not guess the man, so we told them.)

I just want to show you some things I got of Ellen Goble. She has saved things from the beginning of this village, almost. You'd be surprised.

One of the things in the box was instructions about the Decatur Union School for the year 1877-8.

The school board was John L. Harrison, A. B. Copley, John G. Haynes, Lyman T. Rawson, Wm. E. Trowbridge and E. P. Hill,—six members to the school board then.

I remember all of these men, I guess I do. John Harrison's home was on School street. Lawyer Grosvenor lives in it now. John L. Harrison was a pretty fine man and prominent in his day. I think he moved here from Hamilton township, the other side of the cemetery, along there somewhere on the Keeler road. He was postmaster of Decatur along in the early eighties.

I remember A. B. Copley too. He started the First State Bank and I always liked him.

John Haynes lived on the corner by the school house on George street. There was a picket fence around his house then and they raised lots of flowers there.

Lime Rawson was one of the most prominent men in this town in his day. He was a railroad engineer on the Michigan Central I'm told when he came here away back in the sixties. He built a beautiful home over across the railroad track and on a hill next to the muck land. He told me it cost him $6,000 to build, that's what he told me. It burned up one night about the year 1920, but I did not go to the fire, I was in Kalamazoo at the time, living there.

Wm. E. Trowbridge was one of the early business men of the town and L. G. Stewart married one of his daughters, and I've heard tell that E. P. Hill was the first president of this village. He was an old settler here, that's certain.

Well, now I would like to ask you some questions and you can take your time to answering them. The first question is, who were the Seven Sleepers?

It tells about them somewhere in ancient history, but they have got out of my mind and I can't recall them. I used to like to read ancient history, I certainly did.

I used to read about Cleopatra, too. She was one great person, I guess, from what I can remember. She let an asp bite her on the arm and kill her. She kept slaves and they would stand by her and wave ostrich feather fans over her to keep her cool. It was pretty hot where she lived. That is as much as I can remember about her, you might say.

I don't know what she was queen of, but she was on board of her ship when she let the asp bite her. She let the asp get good and hungry and had one of the slaves bring it to her in a box covered with diamonds and other precious stones. Then she took the asp and put it on her arm and watched it do its deadly work.

She was enamored, you might say, and I guess her lover went back on her, or something like that. I can't remember who it was that went back on her, but it may come to me later. He might not have gone back on her, but anyway she killed herself.

Well, Walt., we are getting a long way from home, and too far into the past for reminiscences, even for us old timers. But we too like history, whether it be ancient, medieval or modern, and will try to answer some of the questions. Maybe some of our friends who also enjoy this line of entertainment, will come to our aid and make a sort of round table affair of it. Let's keep the column open for them and invite them in.

We'll take up the subject of the Seven Sleepers first. They are not so well known as Cleopatra. If we ever get the local literati woke up on the subject of Cleopatra there will just be no end to it.

All we can tell about the Seven Sleepers is what we read in a book. We set down nothing here from memory, it was too long ago.

The story about them is a christian legend dating from the times of persecution under the Roman Empire.

In the reign of Emperor Decius, when the christians were persecuted, it is said that 7 noble youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a neighboring cavern, the entrance of which was closed by order of the emperor.

The persecuted youths immediately fell into a deep slumber, from which they were accidentally awakened in the reign of Theodosius II, after the lapse of about two centuries.

Pressed with hunger after their long fast, they sent one of their number to the city to purchase bread. He was astonished to see crosses erected all over the city, and his own antiquated dress and obsolete language confounded the baker, to whom he offered an old medal in payment for bread.

Suspected of having found a secret treasure, he was carried before the judge, to whom he related his miraculous story.

The bishop of Ephesus, the magistrates and the emperor himself, hastened to the cave and found the sleepers still bearing the bloom of youth. They related their story to the multitudes, gave them their benediction and expired.

That is the story, Walter; now do you recall it?

I thought I'd tell you that the farmers around here are not altogether broke of they couldn't be in the market for the expensive farm machinery that is shipped here to sell to them.

I was down to the railroad station one day last week and saw the train men unload three big Farmall tractors onto the McWilliams platform. I saw a fellow driving one of them away and went up to him and asked him where he was going with it, and he said Cassopolis. Maybe he went to Cassopolis and maybe he didn't. I don't know. I know he headed east and that didn't look very much to me like he was going to Cassopolis.

The next day I saw the other two had disappeared but where they went I don't know. The railroad does lots of business at this station, you can take my word for that and that man Planck, the freight agent, is one in a hundred. He must do the work that two or three men used to do, and he does it easy. He seems to.

And say, Charlie Ackley and his wife came here from Kalamazoo last week. I guess they must have come out to do canning, they had a basket of fruits cans.

THE LATE MRS. BROWN

Walter Brown's wife kept things. She put things away, saved them against the day when she might want them again. When she died the house was full of keepsakes, treasured by her for the pleasant memory of the time and manner in which they were acquired.

Just then Walter came in.

When her sister, Florence Murphy, came down from Kalamazoo she said that Mary told her, "I'll be back, I'll be here at the resurrection." That's the way she expressed it. And you know that's the Bible.

She was a good Bible student Mary certainly was. This book of her's verifies it all right. It is her day book, that is what it says on the cover, but it is full of Bible verses, memory verses, addresses and recipes as well as Bible verses.

Here is what she says about burns: "Equal parts of raw linseed oil and lime water will stop the pain instantly."

Here are some more of her remedies which she must have tried out and found to be effective:

Put ½ teaspoonful of sulphur in stocking heel every other day. It will generate the system and rheumatism escapes through the pores.

Make poultice of boiled rutabaga for running sores or cancer.

For neuritis, 1 lb. salts to 1 gallon water. Apply hot.

Apply pure extract of vanila for tooth ache.

There are many more remedies, which we have not room for here but they can be had for the asking.

A few of Mary's Bible readings:

For when thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness.

The fear of man leads us into the snare of the devil.

Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed, for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

This poem was found in the book:

Only the Obstinate.

Think you that God could have created me
To flounder in the darkness here below
Without a knowledge of my destiny
And the important truths that I should know?
He who directs the sparrow in its flight
And lifts the woodland flower from the loam
Will in His goodness guide my steps aright
And lead me thru the darkness safely home.
Only the obstinate who close their eyes
Against the saving sunshine of His grace,
Who spurn His promise of a paradise
And all the wickedness of earth embrace,
Will wander from the path that leads above
Where there is peace and happiness and love.

T. E. B.

I see by the paper that Dr. Rolin Thorp of Denver is dead. I remember him, of course I do, when he was a young man. He lived in a brick house in Nicholsville and it stands there now just as it did 60 years ago. It hasn't changed a bit as far as I could see the last time I was by there.

My father bought a windmill of his father. That was quite a long time ago. Old Mr. Thorp sold windmills, that was his business. He went all around the country selling them. Windmills were all the go in that day. Most of the farmers had them and some town people.

Father owned the flat there between the bend in the road and the railroad track. He put out a half an acre of onions and put up the windmill to water them with. I guess you couldn't give a windmill away now.

I've been going through some of the old things and keepsakes since Mary went. Mary never destroyed anything and she had saved a letter that was written to me by a good friend when Mable, my first wife, died. It was about the finest letter I ever got, and when I found it I made up my mind then and there that it ought to be printed if you care to.

Mable died May 11, 1897, and the letter was written the next day, May 12, and I treasure it to this day,—

Mr. Walter Brown,
Decatur, Mich.

It was only this noon that the news came to me, but it was not real. It is only a sad, mistaken dream, but my heart and mind are with those who are suffering and why ought I not tell you something of the thoughts that come to me? If I might give you one moment of comfort in these sad, lonely hours, I would not regret that I had attempted one last help for the sake of her who was my friend and your own, but she was God's first.

To me the word death does not exist. Just why our dear ones are called away from us when we most need them we cannot now know, but this we do know, they are called into a higher, purer, existence than we can even dream of and whatever the stage of this life's existence, it is good for them to enter the higher life. It is freedom and there comes joy.

And then, too, it is only a little journey, in the long run it is only a little while and we can go too. When we compare these sorrows with the ages of happiness that follow, they are nothing. Only a short separation from those we love and we will soon join them.

We are not able to bear these truths now and accept them, but we are given One Friend Who helps us and we are slowly reconciled to His Will.

There seems almost no more to be said, for we have all heard the truth many times and nothing new can be said.

I can surely know nothing of the care and sorrow that has come to you and I can only say, care for the little ones,—her dearest treasure to you, for her sakes and may you feel that "peace that passeth all understanding."

"In the heart's depths a peace serene and holy Abides, and when pain seems to have its will,
Or we despair,—oh, may that peace rise slowly, Stronger than agony and we be still."

(It is a beautiful letter. The thoughts are as helpful today as they were then. That which is good does not grow old, does not change, does not become old fashioned or out of date. For lack of opportunity to contact the writer to ask permission we are withholding the name.

Many Decatur people remember old Hoss Wheeler and one could compile enough stories about him to fill a page. Harry McWilliams recalled that he worked for his father on the farm for several years and Harry had worked with him in the fields. He was short but powerful.

Hoss told Harry something of his life history. He was born in Virginia and was about 12 years old when the Civil War broke out. A Union general by the name of Babcock ran across him and employed him to take care of his saddle horse. After the war General Babcock came to Keeler, and brought Hoss with him. Hoss worked back to Decatur and lived around here till he died.

There is a family of Babcocks living in Keeler today, and if we remember correctly John Babcock is the township treasurer. Would like to hear from members of the family regarding this story.

I tell you there's one boy in this town that ought to be noticed, and that boy is Jersey Halleck down at the water plant. He's done pretty well, I can tell you.

That boy never had much of a chance. His father was a soldier in the Civil War and when the family came here from somewhere out in the country his father had the consumption and couldn't do much of anything. He got a little pension but it wasn't enough to amount to nothing. George Hubbard got one too, and Sim Francis for that matter.

Well, that boy Jersey Halleck was a little boy when his folks came here. I never knew him to go to school at all and never heard him say that he did, either. He probably did, though, for a while.

He got a job in the stave factory, passing staves to old George Smith when he was ten years old. They worked ten hours for a day then, and he got two shilling a day.

Then later on he went out in the country to work. He asked a farmer for a job and the farmer said he did not have any money to pay him. Jerz. said, "I don't want no money." So the farmer set him to work, and when he got through the farmer gave him some potatoes and a half of a hog dressed. That just suited Jerz. What he wanted most was something to eat.

I don't know what he did next, but he got into the water works plant later on and stayed right by, till now he is getting his hundred dollars a month right along. Pretty good for a fellow that never had much of a chance, I should say. He was getting ninety, but now he is getting a hundred. They boosted him ten dollars a month. But I guess he earns it, he certainly does. He tends right to business. He's right there every day.

I was going by there the other day when he was setting in his car out in front of the plant. He said, "Get in here," and I did. We went west on the pavement till we got out in the Osborn neighborhood. Then he turned to the right and went north over a road I never was on before. There was woods on both sides of the road, young oak that had been cut over but never cleared, and come out on the Territorial road and back to the plant. It was a nice ride. It certainly was and I enjoyed it.

He was telling of an instance down to his home. He said there was some colored fellows parked in the road near his house and they stayed there so long he went out to see what was the matter. They had a dirty carburetor and didn't know it. Jerz. went at it and helped them fix it so the car went all right. I tell you they were pleased. They wanted to pay him but he wouldn't take nothing for it. But I'll bet they will always remember him. It is the little things like that that count in life.

Well, I've got rested so I'll be going home.

Sunday morning:—It was pretty cold this morning, I can tell you, 47 under my porch when I got up and that was a quarter to six. That is pretty cold for the 14th of June, yes it is.

Old man Goble, Mary's grandfather, used to tell that they had a frost every month in the year when he was a young man.

Did you know that George Crossman is in the hospital at Hartford? I didn't know it till I was coming down the street and saw his wife sitting on the steps in Brigham's doorway waiting for the drug store to open. I stopped and talked to her a minute and she said she was going over on the bus to see him. George Crossman must be very old, you can tell by the way he walks. He must be 87 or 88, but I couldn't say for sure.

He lives in what used to be the old Ben Scott house, I think he does. Ben Scott was a shoemaker for John Shaad for years. He used to go back and forth past my house every day.

That takes me back to thinking of a lot of things and I wonder whatever became of that old Indian cigar sign that George Riley had in front of his store. If anybody had that sign now he could get a lot of money for it.

(Well do we remember that old cigar sign. It was as big as a full sized Indian, was in war paint and feathers and presented a rather savage appearance. One Halloween night a crowd of young folks on mischief bent—so we heard at the time—carried that big sign over to the home of Prof. Pierce, now the Bert Kidman house, put it on the porch facing the door, rang the bell and ran.

From hiding places behind nearby trees Mrs. Pierce could be seen to open the door and quickly close it again. A few minutes passed and the door opened again. This time Mrs. Pierce carried a long poker and jabbed it at the Indian a number of times. When the Indian made no effort to defend himself she became convinced 'that b'gosh he was plaster paris' or wood, closed the door, and the incident was over for the night. The next morning the Indian was returned to his rightful habitation in front of the Riley store.

Well, Well, I see what Tom Lyon said in his letter last week and it brought up some long forgotten affairs in this village. The saloons were pretty bad and the temperance people got pretty strong in those days. The White Ribboners flourished. Don't you remember their club room up the street near Thomas's hardware?

But tell Tom I wasn't in on that beer dumping escapade. I remember the brewery, but was never down to it. I never drank any beer. No, I never did. The Westby boys, don't you remember them, they used to go to school here, Jim and Philander, they would go there and get beer. They asked me to go, but I never did.

Folks got pretty bitter over the liquor business. Father was a prohibitionist, quite a little so, and took an active part in stamping out the saloons.

One night when the fight between the wets and dries was pretty warm somebody cut down the two evergreen trees in our front yard and they did the same thing to Perry Young.

It was about that time that Ed. Campbell started out from Main street with his horse and buggy one night and the fast train hit him at the George street crossing. Sure it killed him, and the horse too. He was headed for his home in East Decatur. That tragedy was quite a shock to this community, for Ed. Campbell was a well known citizen.

25 YEARS ON CRIFFIELD FARM

Mr. and Mrs. Clyde Barnhart moved into their home on East Street in the village of Decatur last Thursday.

They had lived on the Criffield farm two miles west of Decatur on M-40, 25 years, which Clyde thinks is a record for anyone living on a rented farm. They brought up their eight children there and saw all of them grow up and leave home except Kenneth the youngest, and he is enlisting in the army this week.

The late Charles E. Criffield bought the farm of 240 acres of the A. B. Cass estate 23 years ago, while the Barnharts were there. He told Clyde that if he would stay on he would buy the place and the deal was made accordingly.

Mrs. Criffield sold the farm to Mr. and Mrs. Albert Sorensen and they took possession when the Barnharts moved.

Clyde is going to take the next few months to improve his house in town and get ready to take on some kind of work in the spring. His plans are not yet definite.

Do you remember the old tannery? It was a pretty good industry for Decatur back in the early days. It was going way back in the sixties I guess, it was a lively place when I came here in 1870.

Most all towns had tanneries in them days. They had to have leather, tanneries and distilleries. They had 'em in every town. They had to have whiskey too, gosh all mighty, yes.

Old Isaac Goble, Mary's grandfather, took his corn clear over to Paw Paw and traded it for whiskey and he took corn to Niles and traded it for meal, too. What those old pioneers had to go through with in the early days we don't know anything about.

There wasn't any tax on whiskey, I don't suppose there was. It was almost as cheap as water and it wasn't nothing like whiskey is now. The farmers always took a jug of it out in the harvest field with them to help harvest their wheat. That is some of them did. Some wouldn't drink the stuff even in them days.

I've heard say that grocery stores sold it, kept it in big barrels with a faucet in the barrel and a tin cup nearby. That is what I have heard tell. I never used any of it, nor any of my family, neither whiskey nor tobacco.

But I was mentioning the old Decatur tannery. I couldn't say who built it. It might have been Ransom Nutting. He run it before Rash Hendricks did, so they tell me. It was a pretty substantial building. Maybe you can get Tom Lyon to tell you something about it. He remembers it further back than I do.

I remember when it burned down, I guess I do. The sparks flew all over the town.

We got to talking about Clarence Lindsley. He was a mighty fine man, I want to tell you. I knew him from way back in the eighties. I used to work for him, out there on the farm, worked for him all one summer, cultivating corn and doing general farm work, and lived there with the family.

I got into a little argument about how he died. It was while I was living in Kalamazoo. It was about 20 years ago, maybe longer ago than that. I asked his daughter about it and she said he fell dead on the sidewalk here in town as he was coming out of the bank. That is the way I remembered it.

He was a good farmer, yes sir. Those Lindsleys all were good farmers.

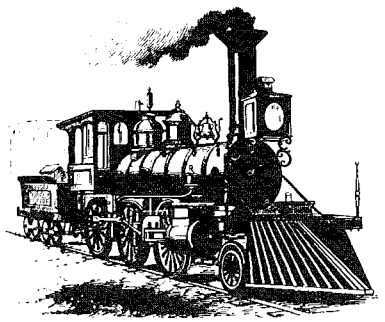
Well, I see Henry Carney was down here for Decoration. I wish I had seen him. I used to see him in Kalamazoo often. He owns a good home on the South Side in Kalamazoo. Henry Carney is a pretty good boy, I can tell you.

Henry is foreman of the switchmen in the Michigan Central yards and has been for yeaars. It's a pretty good job too.

I have to laugh every time I think of what happened down in the yards one time a long time ago. The engineer kicked his cars back too hard and the draw bar that couples the cars together slipped up over the coupling connection and punched a hole right through a tank full of molasses, and all of that car of molasses ran right on the ground.

I see it soon after and there was a great lake of molasses. It was a sight, I can tell you. I'll bet Henry remembers about it.

Art. Jackson's boy didn't fare so well as Henry on the railroad. He was a young man, not more than 18, I don't believe, and was braking right there in the Kalamazoo yards, and that was about 20 years ago too I think.



He had been warned. Older switchmen had told him never to stand in front of the draw bar to adjust the bar when coupling cars, but he would forget and do it. Those cars creep on up to each other pretty quiet like. You can't hardly hear them sometimes, they come together so quiet.

Art. Jackson's boy stepped in front of the coupling when the cars were coming together. He must of done that. Anyhow he was caught and held fast. Some bums heard him holler and they spread the alarm. The boy was got loose and taken to the hospital where he died a very short time after. It was a sad case, I can tell you.

But say, here is one on Guy McGowan, Clara told it on him. He had been to the store in Lawrence and got some weiners and when he come out he happened to think of something he had forgot. He put the weiners on that stump back of the store and went back . And then he entirely forgot the weiners.

Say, don't the bank open up Saturday afternoon? I came down on purpose to go to the bank, got 2 checks I wanted to deposit and have put on the bank book. I guess they will keep though till next week.

I've known this bank for a long while. Knew A. B. Copley, the founder of it. He was a pretty fine old man too. We were in this town before he ever started it. My father didn't help start it but he took stock in it, yes he did.

You know A. B. Copley was once a representative to the legislature. He made a good one too. And did you know he died in Cuba?

Do you remember the last factory in Decatur? I don't mean the last factory but the last factory, where they made shoe lasts. Father had stock in that too. I don't remember who all the stock holders were but old Cap. Beebe was one of them.

The last factory was started right there where the ruins of the grist mill are. Down across the railroad track.

Lasts were made out of hard maple. They were cut out of blocks a foot long, about that, maybe a little less and maybe a little more, according to the size of the lasts they were making.

You know what a last is, don't you? They made shoes and boots over them and in those days they made shoes and boots with wooden pegs.

Somebody bought the building when the last business ran out. They remodeled it and built it over into a flour mill. It was John Bickhart I think, but maybe it was Jimmie Ellis. You ought to remember that better than I do.

That last factory did quite a business for a while. The lasts they made were all shipped away. It was a good way back and I don't remember who worked in it.

Father didn't just exactly like the way things were going and he sold out, traded his stock for a house on Phelps street.

I was going down to Rogers', you know where, the clock fixer. He lives up stairs in the Roy Smith house on west Sherwood street. He is a good clock fixer and a nice fellow. He has had a tumor taken out of his stomach so he can't do hard work yet.

Well, when I passed the automobile repair shop around the corner the fellow had a auto out in front repairing one of the wheels. I stopped and talked to him and a young fellow standing there, and told them that that building was the first post-office in the village of Decatur. They looked surprised, so I said, you see that building down the street there, pointing across the railroad track—well that was the first depot in this town. They couldn't hardly believe me, but it was a fact, yes it was.

These young fellows don't know much about this town as it was the year I first come here. There has been lots of changes, I can tell you. There sure has.

Well, I went over to the cemetery Friday morning where the funeral was held. It was a Catholic funeral and a very impressive one, it sure was.

From the cemetery I come up on Phelps street and I couldn't help thinking how it looked down there when I first come to Decatur in 1870.

It was all heavy oak timber from the road clear to Lake of the Woods, all virgin timber—never had been cut. I tell you it would have been worth a lot to Decatur if it had been left standing. You've no idea what a difference there was in the town then.

All of the land to the north of Decatur was heavy timber, beach and maple mostly. Alex. and Jim McWilliams both had farms that were covered with this fine timber back there in the seventies.

I see you had something in the paper about Vanderbilt telling the public to be damned. That was true, he said it because I read it in the papers at the time. I never doubted but what he said it.

It's been a long time since Tom Burke shot that deer down west of town. He didn't kill it but it ran through town and down by the bridge that crossed the Dowagiac creek, and there it dropped dead.

Some fellers that lived across the swamp over in the Valley saw it drop, picked it up and took it home. Tom heard who got it and went over and claimed it.

Tom Burke was born right east of Rochester, New York, not a great ways from where my father was born, but they didn't know each other till they both came to Decatur. Tom Burke was a pretty well read man, yes he was, and I've heard that he was about as stylish a man as there was in town when he was young. Everybody liked him and he never had but one fault so far as I know.

He was a stave cutter in the old Hinkley stave factory for a good many years. He married Nell Nutting, one of the lively young women of the town. The Nuttings were high toned down east people. You know, there's a difference in people, you can tell it. The Nuttings had quality.

When we came here in 1870 Tom and his young wife had just got married and were living with her folks, Lucius Nutting and his wife. The old house is still there and is known to this day as the Burke house. It is on east Delaware street well back from the road, and almost across from where I used to live.

The old man Nutting used to raise tobacco in that hollow. He had quite a high roofed building in back of the house. It was open at both ends to let the air through, and I remember seeing great long tobacco leaves hanging up there.

Tom Burke came to a quick ending right there at his home. It was in the winter time, the snow was on the ground and he was shoveling a path from the house to the road when he fell right down on the shovel. They took him into the house where I think he died in a little while. That was all of 35 years ago. It might have been longer than that. I wouldn't be surprised if it was. It's pretty hard work to keep track of the time.

I don't feel very good, didn't get down town yesterday at all. Think I'll go and see the doctor right now.

Speaking of the kindness of the late Hobart Millard, once, a long time ago, there was an old colored couple lived out by the church in the Plopper District. When the old man's wife died Hobe' took the old fellow up to his place, fixed him up in a little house, and took care of him until he died.

You know Dana Smith had a pretty good story about Isaac Willard, but he didn't tell all about him. I suppose it would be next to impossible to tell all about that man. There are lots of stories about him.

I heard tell about a man who went to him and wanted work. Willard told him to set down and wait till he got back. The man sat down and waited three or four hours, and then got tired and went away. Probably if he bad stayed till Willard got back he would have gotten work and been paid for the time he waited.

Another thing I heard tell of about Willard. They had the Michigan Central graded from Kalamazoo to within a few miles of Paw Paw. The railroad company wanted Willard to donate the land for the depot and other buildings out of the acres which he owned at the Paw Paw settlement, and Willard wouldn't do it. So the raidroad men ordered a new survey, changed the course and cut Paw Paw off the line. That was how Decatur came to be born.

It kind of seems to me I heard something about the Michigan Central going through Charleston to the south of us, but I can't say for sure. They may have found it too hard work to clear the swamp on the Charleston route. There was some reason for cutting Charleston off, for Charleston was quite a town then, and Decatur wasn't anything. The railroad killed Charleston.

Well, say, I was reading over that list of names of the scholars in that picture you told about last week, and why didn't you give some of the older ones?

I remember when John Jordan and Jim Jordan went to school here. Ed. Rawson was another, and so was Delbert Wolf, he came from out in the country. And who was that lawyer whose house burned up? I remember now, Bill Tucker, his boys, Clyde and Frank. They were both pretty clever boys. Frank got to be an actor and for a while went pretty strong. Then he went a little wild, I guess, lost a leg and finally died.

The other one, Clyde, went west and nobody ever heard of him afterwards. Bill Tucker's house burned up. Yes it did. I know it did, because I went to the fire. It caught in the back end and the fire just crept right up the back of the house.

They didn't have any fire department then. I should say they didn't. They couldn't do a thing about it, just let it burn down, they had to. What could anybody do with a few pails of water to stop a fire like that! I tell you I don't believe we half appreciate what a good fire company we have now. That fire never would have burned the house up if our boys that fight fires now could have been there with their fire equipment.

That was a long time ago. It must have been in the seventies. It was when Burked was the professor and Emma Rice was the preceptress.

Thede Trowbridge built another house on that foundation and it is standing there yet. It is the house that Fred McWilliams has just sold

---

Did you see the hail storm Wednesday. It hailed some. I could hear it rattling down on the kitchen roof at my house.

But say, that hail storm wasn't nothing to compare with a hail storm that struck the muck over south of town years ago. That was the worst hail storm I ever saw or heard of. The hail was as big as my fist, ragged chunks at that. Somebody brought a ten quart pail full of them that he had picked up into town and I don't believe it took over 15 or 20 of them to fill the pail. That was back in the eighties, but I don't remember just what year.

One fellow coming to town in a lumber wagon got pelted so bad on the head that he had to go to the drug store to get fixed up, and his horses came near running away.

W. H. Clark worked a big piece of the muck land and kept his old horse hitched to the buggy grazing along the roadside while he worked. Great bunches came out on the horse where he was pelted and I expected to see him run away, but he didn't.

Clark was a good man but he had queer notions. At one time he had the best furniture store in this part of Michigan, I should say he did. Three floors and the basement packed full of furniture, and he sold lots of it, he did that. He was a good salesman. He had all of the undertaking business of the town and surrounding country too.

But he got the notion of clearing the big swamp and lost interest in everything else. You'll have to give him credit for doing a big job there, but in doing it he neglected his other business and it kind of went to pieces.

You remember that time he had a funeral and forgot to put the box in the grave and had to keep the mourners waiting while he rushed up to the store and got it?

He built a big barn on his lot at the corner of Main street and St. Mary's street. That was a big barn, the biggest barn anywhere around here, so far as I know. He raised lots of onions down there on the muck and always expected to get a big price for them, a little bigger than the market. He'd pack that barn full of onions in the fall and more than once he kept them till they rotted, and he had to haul them back onto the muck for fertilizer. I can remember when that whole part of town smelled of rotten onions.

Well, he was a good citizen, anyhow and he was one of the early settlers who helped to make Decatur the good town that it is today.

Say, don't you know better than to say that gang of men you put in the paper last week was the stave factory gang? That wasn't the old stave factory gang. There wasn't a one of them that worked in the stave factory, not as I remember it.

I'll tell you who those stave factory men were,—Tom Burke and Homer Hinkley were the stave cutters. You remember them, of course you do.

Then there was Charlie Labadie. He worked around the yard, and didn't he fire nights? I think he did, steamed the bolts.

And Scott Smith, he worked there. I don't know what he done. I can't recall all of their positions.

And Cash DeBolt, he worked there. I don't know what he did but he worked there. He lived across the railroad track.

And don't you remember that Carpenter. He was a cooper and worked for Dwight in the old cooper shop, that went with the factory.

George Smith, he worked there too. They called him Kirby and Stave Factory George, that was because there were 3 George Smiths in town then and they had to distinguish them apart.

Then there was old man Hammond. He might have drew the staves from the cutter out to the shed, but I can't remember for sure.

Let. Bashford, don't you remember him? He worked there too. He was an old timer there. He's been dead for years.

Bert and Will Young worked there too. Bert caught heading nights. It was a hard job. The heading would hit his fingers and hurt him.

Some worked there that I can't remember. Maybe Tom Lyon can remember more of them. Near as I can recollect he was one of the workers.

There's another question I want to ask you about. Did you ever hear of the lost city of Atlantis? Why, it disappeared over night. The Peruvians or some of those South American natives have got the story of it to this day. Mr. Watts, you remember him. He was a neighbor of ours and he had some mighty fine things in his house. One of them was a bowl made of some kind of clay that was excavated from the lost city of Atlantis.

I had a book about that city once and it got lost, and I'd give anything to find it. Things like that are interesting to me.

A Relic of Old Decatur Days

The Republican is indebted to Mrs. Edna Durham for a picture of the "Old Stave Factory Gang." It was taken about sixty years ago and to old time Decatur people it is an interesting relic. There are 22 employes in the picture and we could name all but one, of them. Every one of them is dead except possibly David Hughes. If living he is about 78 years old. The last we heard of him he was residing in Cleveland, Ohio.

The names of those in the picture are Perry M. Young, John Struble, Perry Robinson, John Hughes, Fred Simpson, Will Udell, James Jewell, Ed. Scott, Sid. Claus, Oakey Van Hise, David Hughes, Philo Scott, Ellsworth Thompson, Earl Simpson, John Boudeman, Asel Scott, Hiram Stillman Slocum, Hiram Carl Scott, Bill Popendick Young.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FIRST CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST, BOSTON, MASS., JUNE 7, 1943

MRS. DAISETTE D. S. McKENZIE

Incoming President of The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts

BOSTON, Mass., June 7.—The Christian Science Board of Directors today placed "prayer" at the top of the list of defensive and offensive weapons that free-thinking peoples are counting upon to win the global war against oppression and suppression.

In a statement to the annual meeting of The Mother Church, The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts, the Directors first emphasized the word "prayer," then followed with the term "miracle of deliverance" which is to be accepted, they said, as the logical answer to righteous prayer.

Thus, deliverance from the hand of the oppressor was seen by the Directors to be no miracle at all, but rather a simple witnessing to the fact that power springs from the prayer of understanding.

"A praying people can never suffer defeat," summarized the Directors' remarks to several thousand Christian Scientists assembled in The Mother Church.

The Directors announced the election of Mrs. Daisette D. S. McKenzie of Cambridge, Massachusetts, as President of The Mother Church for the ensuing year, succeeding Mrs. Elisabeth F. Norwood, of Brookline, Massachusetts.

From the Trustees under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy came the report that since the year 1913, when the Trustees were first appointed, they have expended $6,400,000 on church work. Announcement was also made that the sales of Mrs. Eddy's works, including "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," had more than doubled in the last two years.

THE WORLD'S NEED OF CHRISTIANITY

Extracts from a written sermon by C. C. Evans.

We must not forget that Christ still offers to men of every creed and race gifts far surpassing our power of imagination.

Two things remind us constantly that our grasp of Christ's great gifts to us is faulty. We have not solved our own problems of the bearing of Christianity on social institutions and more particularly on the present war.

Christianity, properly applied, would abundantly water the roots of political and commercial sagacity.

We have said there is no christian foreign policy. There is no christian domestic policy. In my judgment as to war and peace christianity has not lost its original moral greatness. It teaches love of enemies, meakness and friendship for all humanity. It brings men toward unity in a love that is universal in its sweep.

We have learned from the Scriptures that men must lose their lives in order to save them. Therefore today make of yourself a radiating center of divine love so that all the world may receive its benediction.

When Decatur Was Young and Gay

And the Stave Factory Gang Was the Life of the Village.

Whenever we can draw out a letter of old time Decatur memories from Dr. T. B. Lyon of Raton, New Mexico, we feel that a real interesting and worthwhile result has been accomplished, and it will be read and appreciated by readers of the Republican who now or in the past have looked upon Decatur as their home town.

Tom Lyon and Charlie Rawson, Alden Knight, Albert Abbott, L. G. Stewart, and Mrs. Percie Nash Seymour are among the few now living who can recall the gay and exciting times in this lively village during the sixties.

We often refer to the Van Buren County Gazetteer and Business Directory. It was compiled and published in 1869 by Chas. Leavens, son of a Decatur druggist, and Delos Hill, son of E. P. Hill, who was then in the wholesale and retail grocery business at the corner of Phelps and Delaware streets.

This directory was printed in the Republican office when it was located on the second floor of the Poor block, and it listed the following Lyons as residents of the village:

Eli Lyon, farmer, home on north side of Sherwood, near East street.

Hobart Lyon, clerk, Rawson and Co., boards with Jeremiah Teed.

Richard H. Lyon, musical genius, boards with Eli Lyon.

Dr. Tom Lyon was about 10 years old at that time and we rather suspect that he also was a boarder, without financial consideration, at the Eli Lyon home. Through the sixties and seventies, and into the eighties he was a pretty well known resident of Decatur.

Have been expecting to see Dr. Tom out here before this. Last spring he wrote that he was planning a trip to Michigan in August or September, but both of these months are now gone and he has not appeared. This is a time when "The best laid plans o' mice and men, gang aft a-gley." And now, though we cannot see him, it is very pleasant to hear from him. His letter follows:

Raton, New Mexico,
September 21, 1942.

Dear Friend Arba:

I am enclosing some "stuff" that may be of interest to the old citizens of Decatur, but if not dump it.

Tell Walter Brown that I have a watch I bought of E. L. Hawks when I was a lad and I might trade it for his fife if he will pay the freight. It has a coin silver case with open face and weighs just one-half pound. It is a half inch thick. Eddie Webster lived on Delaware street. Their property and ours backed against each other. Eddie was a smart little fellow, always at the head of his class, he and Willis Wilmont.

Am doubtful if we can go east this year. Gas, tires and railroads too tied up. Very truly, Tom Lyon.

BOYHOOD MEMORIES

There are three outstanding events of my early life in Decatur that still linger in my memory. They are the wreck of the Cereus, the attempt at suicide and the near drowning.

The Wreck of the Cereus

The Michigan Central ran past our old home only a block away. On July 4, 1872, while a bunch of young Lyons were playing in our front yard we heard the shrill whistle of a train in the west and soon the engine appeared past the stave factory running very fast and hauling a lot of flat cars.

At the crossing the engine hit a cow which got under it, and right in front of our house the engine jumped the track and plunged into the ditch. The tender turning toward the left, hurled up the bank, and the firemen, who was on the tender, was thrown nearly out of the right of way. He was not much hurt, but the engineer, Jack Riley, was buried under the cab. He had to be dug out but was still alive.

It might be related that all locomotive engines of those days had a name under the cab window and this one was named Cereus, Jack Riley, engineer.

The Attempt at Suicide.

Will Jones was a peculiar character. He had served his country as a soldier in the Civil War, was wounded and underwent extreme suffering in a Southern prison so that he never was considered quite right mentally. He played the guitar well with his sister Mary at the piano.

On the corner of Main and St. Mary's streets there lived a beautiful young lady whom he loved and serenaded. Along the fence on the St. Mary's side of her house there was a row of cherry trees.

One day when I was crossing this corner going to the Russell shop further west on St. Mary's, I saw Will over there under the trees. He acted rather peculiar, he reached up into the trees, then took something out of his pocket. I heard a pistol shot and saw him fall over against the fence.

Scared half to death I beat it up town and raised an alarm. Dr. Keables happened to be in the Poor block and together with others we hastened to where Will lay. As we approached he partly raised his face, which was deathly white and said to the doctor, "Well, Doc., I guess I've done it."

He was bundled off to his home and there it was found that the bullet, a .22, had hit a rib, followed around his back and emerged, doing very little damage. We found his watch in the tree where he had hung it.

Poor Bill had been jilted by the beautiful maiden who lived behind the row of cherry trees.

The Near Drowning

Charley Rawson built a boat in his front yard, using the space on the west of his house. I did a little at assisting him and others of our gang also helped.

The boat was launched on Lake of the Woods, and a house for it was built on the island.

Late in the fall Harry (Hadley) Hodges and I decided to go trolling and borrowed the boat from Charley. When we started out Hadley was in the back end and I was rowing. After going around the lake quite awhile Hadley offered to take the oars and we started to change places.

The boat was so small that in order to do this we had to crowd past each other standing, and in doing so Hadley fell over board with his feet hanging to the boat. This tipped the boat enough to fill it with water and we both went into the lake.

We tried to bail out the water but could not. We then tipped it bottom side up and tried to get it to shore a half mile away, but could not do that. Hadley tried to swim to shore but it was so cold he gave it up.

Seeing the old trapper who lived on the south shore of the lake we yelled to him that we were drowning and finally got him to come and haul us in with his dugout.

On the shore he built a rousing fire and we were soon thawed out enough to amble home. Our fish and tackle were lost in the lake, but we were thankful to be alive and were grateful to our savior, the trapper.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

I find the request in this week's Republican for a song which seems especially appropriate at this time. It was President Lincoln's favorite song and "one which he encored no less than eighteen times when sung at a Sunday school convention in Washington in 1864."

YOUR MISSION

If you cannot on the ocean
Sail among the swiftest fleet
Rocking on the highest billows,
Laughing at the storms you meet,
You can stand among the sailors,
Anchored yet within the bay,
You can lend a hand to help them
As they launch their boats away.

If you are too weak to journey
Up the mountain, steep and high,
You can stand within the valley
While the multitudes go by;
You can chant in happy measure
As they slowly pass along—
Though they may forget the singer,
They will not forget the song.

If you have not gold and silver
Ever ready at command;
If you cannot toward the needy
Reach an ever-helping hand,
You can succor the afflicted,
O'er the erring you can weep
With the Savior's true disciples
You a tireless watch may keep.

If you cannot in the harvest
Garner up the richest sheaves,
Many a grain, both ripe and golden,
Oft the careless reaper leaves;
Go and glean among the briars
Growing rank against the wall.
For it may be that their shadow
Hides the heaviest wheat of all.

If you cannot in the conflict
Prove yourself a soldier true
If where fire and smoke are thickest
There's no work for you to do.
When the battlefield is silent,
You can go with careful tread—
You can bear away the wounded,
You can cover up the dead.

Do not, then, stand idly waiting
For some greater work to do;
Fortune is a lazy goddess—
She will never come to you.
Go and toil in any vineyard;
Do not fear to do or dare—
If you want a field of labor
You can find it anywhere.

—Ellen M. H. Gates.

The call for this song was printed last week and brought two responses, the one from Mrs. Truesdell and one from Mrs. Anita Gale. Mrs. Gale brought in a copy of "Pat's Pick," which is a collection of the sweetest, sanest, jolliest folk, school and patriotic songs," compiled by Henry R. Pattengill. On the cover is written, "Grade V. Anita Youells, from class of 1916."

Henry R. Pattengill was a famous man and one of the greatest pep leaders Michigan ever produced. He was a favorite everywhere he went and his song book became as popular as he was.

T. J. BASS, 84, OLDEST ACTIVE BARBER IN STATE

Man, Who Came to Village In 1884, Has Cut Hair and Shaved Members of Five Generations.

By Caroline Johnson
In Kalamazoo Gazette

Thomas J. Bass, Decatur barber who observed his 84th birthday May 1, lays claim to being the oldest active barber in Michigan. Bass is the sole proprietor of a shop in Decatur's Main street and here he caters to patrons whose relations for five generations have been his customers. Leo Rose, Kalamazoo, who drops in at "Tom's barber shop," while in Decatur, is one of these customers. Tom has shaved Rose's grandfather, his father, Leo, and his son, and has trimmed the hair of his granddaughter. The men of the Graham family have also been steady customers through the years. Bass also recalls that he used to cut Edgar Bergen's locks when that comedian was a boy and before he brought fame to his home town of Decatur.

Tom, who continues to work 14 hours on Saturdays, remembers when Decatur had a barber's war on. At the crest of the competition, haircuts were turned out for five cents and shaves at the same figure. Twenty-six heads of hair in one day was Tom's barber war record.

The halcyon days of the barber trade, Tom relates, was when 60 shaving mugs were racked against the wall. During this period, coloring moustaches, and waxing and curling them was a lucrative business. Tom has a special recipe for coloring moustaches, but he has temporarily mislaid it. Luxuriant "side burns" used to be the delight of tonsorial artists, but these for the most part have gone the way of the decorative shaving mugs.

The veteran barber remembers the rage for the college cut in vogue when "Yale was king of the conquered East and Michigan ruled the West." The hair was left full and free with only a slight trim.

Bass has a diary in which he has jotted down the deaths of Decatur townspeople. His book contains 1,800 names and when any resident wishes to check on a death he consults Tom who always has the correct answer.

Asked if the barber shops didn't have the reputation of being centers for masculine gossip, Tom agreed that they did, but added, "I hear plenty, but I let the customers do the talking."

Tom's hobby is his garden. His wife died seven years ago and one of his sons and his family resides with him. He is a baseball fan and his favorite team is the Chicago White Sox. Occasionally he travels to the city to see his favorites in action. He has a grandson in the service. He is Corp. H. J. Roberts, stationed at Detroit. He holds medals for marksmanship.

Tom used to be a member of the Free Methodist church and sang bass in the church choir. He was also treasurer for 15 years.

Bass was born in Raleigh, N. C. He started barbering at 21 in Richmond, Ind., and worked in several Indiana cities. He came to Decatur in 1884. He has not barbered continually but has laid off several times only to resume his trade. He started working for Aaron Burnett in 1884 and later worked in the shops of Frank Stapleton and H. B. Tompkins.

For a period he worked for "Bo" Hackley in Paw Paw in a shop located across from the courthouse. Among his clients he recalls Judge Benjamin Heckert, Circuit Judges Mills and Hilton, and Henry W. McCabe, former deputy sheriff and GAR veteran. Bass still possesses steady nerves and looks forward to many more years of barbering.

THE ESSENTIAL NEED OF FRIENDS

By C. C. Evans

In attending good will meetings in Grand Rapids I notice a great improvement in the friendly attitude of people toward each other. I attribute this to the common interest developed by the menace of our enemies in this war.

We are learning that no one is self-sufficient. Even though American resources are the most abundant in all the world, yet we have found them by no means ample to carry on and win a world conflict alone.

It takes the cementing of friendships to win a war like we are in today. We cannot expect to enjoy future liberty, peace and happiness without the friendship of other nations and of all races.

We have had too much of a tendency in the past to look upon the people of other nations and races in terms of masses of population, rather than men and women deeply concerned in world progress and security.

Many of us have had the mistaken conception that learning or education is the prerogative of the western world, but we must concede that some important discoveries and inventions come out of the East. We should bear in mind that printing and the compass, explosives and other inventions are all of eastern origin.

The fact is that in the far East are people not only ingenius and resourceful, but also highly educated. I do not speak in terms of individuals, I mean people taken collectively.

It is said there are more literate people in China than any other country except the United States. The people of this country have made great contributions toward facilitating education in China, helping to establish schools there and setting up universities, and this has helped to build up a better health situation in China. That has made her both a friend of America and a great power against the aggressors in the far East.

Another thing which should be carefully consideerd by our goverment is the post war attitude of Russia. Whatever our views may be Russia stands out today as the savior of democracy in Europe. Without Soviet assistance it is difficult to see how Nazism could be brought to its sudden defensive.

You may search through ancient and modern history and you will find no threat of world domination by Russian people, and our destiny will be much greater and more secure if we have these people as our friends.

In conclusion I want to criticize the tendency toward race prejudice. Prejudice breeds hatred and hatred is the originator of intollerance. Once this trio is permitted to go unchecked it will destroy democracy. We must not forget that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness cannot fully materialize in any society poisoned by hatred and intollerance.

I am inclined to believe the churches should be assigned a specific task in relation to peace making and the creation of international order, and form a world wide fellowship wherein differences may be settled and mutual respect established. Then we would enjoy the fruits of the spirit which would result in joy, peace and happiness.

FEELING FINE AT 83

William L. Congdon received a Christmas greeting from his brother, Charles, of Springfield, Mo., in which he said, "I hope you are feeling as fine when you are my age as I am."

Charles was the oldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Congdon and Will the youngest. Charles was 83 December 26 and Will was 62 December 9. The Republican sends congratulations to them both.

Charles is a retired railroad man, he never resided in Decatur but has been an occasional visitor here.

Typewriter paper at. the Republican office.

The Republican is indebted to Principal Henry H. Houseman of the Decatur public schools for the brief sketch of the life and work of Prof. Eben Mumford. Mr. Houseman was his student and admirer. He knew the bright and ever helpful Mumford mind from his work in the class room, and from his writing and lectures. And even though it has been several months since he passed away our townsman thought it not inappropriate for the Republican to pay tribute to his memory.

In that thought we agree, and these few lines are indeed a beautiful tribute:

The French have a proverb: "Some men are cisterns; a few are fountains."

In every college there are to be found a few men who are not mere reservoirs of knowledge, but fountains of knowledge; sources of inspiration to their students. Dr. Eben Mumford was such a teacher.

H. H. Houseman.

Mr. Houseman also furnished the following sketch:

Professor Mumford

A pioneer in agricultural extension work in Michigan, Prof. Eben Mumford, former head of the department of sociology at Michigan State college, died at his home in East Lansing on October 17.

Dr. Mumford, retired in 1938, came to Lansing as pastor of the First Universalist church, and later left for a period of graduate study.

Mr. Mumford served as the first leader of the county agricultural agents from 1912 to 1921. He helped to organize the Michigan State Farm bureau in 1919, and later met with a group of farmers in Ithaca, New York, where he was a leader in the formation of the American Farm Bureau federation.

After completing his undergraduate studies, he attended the University of Chicago, where he studied sociology for several years. This was followed by further graduate studies in the Universities of Paris and Berlin. He completed the requirements for the degree of doctor of philosophy at the University of Chicago.

Before Professor Mumford came to Michigan State in 1912, he had taught in several Illinois colleges. After serving as professor of economics and sociology at M. S. C. for two years, he was appointed head of that department in 1924 and served in that capacity until retirement in 1938. He is survived by the widow, Luella Mumford.

Christian Scientists Hold Annual Meeting in Boston

Boston, Mass., June 8—The great task now confronting a liberated America, which more than three quarters of a century ago fought a four-years war to free the slaves, is to aid in working out the freedom of the whole world from slavery, The Christian Science Board of Directors told the several thousand Christian Scientists gathered in annual meeting in Boston today.

The directors also announced the election of Mrs. Elizabeth F. Norwood of Brookline, Mass., as President of The Mother Church for the ensuing year. The chief duty of the President is to preside at the Annual Meeting.

Today the Board found that the establishment of Christian Science in some countries was being limited by the dictators, that some churches and institutions were being closed and confiscated. "But wherever multitudes of plain people in ordinary, everyday living cherish and practice the truths of their religion," the Board said, "its resurrection is assured."

The frequent reports of increasing wartime interest in religion as the streams of dependence upon material systems run low were accentuated by the announcement of the Trustees of The Christian Science Publishing Society that the sales of Bibles this year "are the largest in the history of the Publishing Society." Increased circulation of The Christian Science Journal, the Christian Science Sentinel and The Christian Science Monitor was also reported for the last 12 months. Literature of the Society was said still to be going to many parts of the world, arriving sometimes on delayed schedules, but nevertheless reaching Switzerland, Unoccupied France, Spain, Portugal, all parts of Africa, Australia, the British Isles, South America, New Zealand, India and Ceylon.

Charleston

The first weddings in the township were those of David Curry and Alexander Fulton to Sarah and Elizabeth, daughters of Josephus Gard. Both couples were married by the same ceremony in the spring of 1832. The first birth was that of John H. Rich October 31, 1832, and the midwife was Mrs. Micajah McKinney of McKinney's prairie in LaGrange, who rode an almost unbroken colt the 15 miles journey to the home.

In 1836 Charleston on Little Prairie was platted and named for Jacob Charles, on whose land much of it lay. Five men platted it, Jacob Charles, Jacob Morlan, Alexander and Samuel Fulton, and David Fenton.

Elijah Goble kept a hotel, the Brown Eagle, there for 30 years. When the Black Hawk war was impending and all the men took their guns and went to the protection of settlements that were threatened, the women at Charleston and nearby made a fort out of rails for safety in case of danger. It was a false alarm and the men soon returned. Charleston was on the stage route and a bigger town then than Niles.

In the Legislature

Col. James Newton came in 1830, and in 1835 he with James O'Dell of Penn and Baldwin Jenkins of Pokagon were delegates to the first constitutional convention, held at Detroit and while Michigan was still a territory, although then preparing for statehood by this convention. They made the trip on horseback and over blazed trails much of the way. Mrs. Jane Crego is a granddaughter of Col. James Newton who had won his military title in actual service. Later in 1840 Mr. Newton was a member of the legislature as was his son George Newton still later—Mrs. Crego's father.

Others of the township who have been elected to the legislature were Alexander B. Copley, John Struble and George Gard, and it has had one state senator Emmons Buell. Mr. Gard was also county treasurer two terms. Our popular county commissioner of schools, Edmund Schoetzow, was a student at the Pleasant Hill school, and for 27 years taught the Marcellus high school.

Others who attended school in this township were Charles Warner, now prospering in Chicago; Clyde W. Ketcham, now a successful attorney in Kalamazoo; Coy Kent, now in business in Bellview; Ray Carey, who later became a magazine writer; Hilda Carey, who became a world war nurse in France; Clifford Robinson, now a leading physician at Indiana Harbor, head surgeon of the Indiana Steel Mills and president of the park board of South Chicago; his father, Dr. C. S. Robinson, was Volinia village's first resident doctor, and a good one.

A Beautiful Country

Howard Rogers, who built Volinia's first store also wrote the county's first history, and a good one. He took a prominent part in the Volinia Farmers Club, one of the first organized in the country and the first to stage town fairs. Both the club and the fairs attracted widespread attention and did much to make the township famous.

Timber for building purposes was plentiful, and sawmills along the Dowagiac river furnished power for converting it into lumber. Teams of 10, 12, and 15 yokes of oxen were required to "break" the soil, the plows having a sharp shear and a beam as large as a barn timber. Men who

Early Builders

Dr. Henry Fowler was the nearest doctor those days, and he lived at Geneva, on the banks of Diamond lake. Folks did not have time to be sick, although the ague was common. Alexander Copley built the first saw mill in 1835, and it cost $129.07. It was built at the present Nicholsville and was started up December 20 of that year. The irons for the mill were cast at Mishawaka.

About the year 1851 Harry George built the first grist mill, now gone to decay. He sold the mill to the Nichols brothers, who put up a store there also, which burned in the winter of 1845. C. T. Wilkins, H. T. Wing, A. Goff and Charles Thorp have operated stores there, and the village now has two. The first church was the A. M. E., and the second, the Baptist. Both are well attended. The Dunkards later built a church, but the society has become so small the services are very irregular.

The Crane schoolhouse was the first one erected, and it then stood near the present Crane cemetery. It was built in 1833 and its first teacher was V. V. Crane. The first town meeting was held that year, when James Newton was elected supervisor and David Crane clerk. The town hall was built in 1875. My great-grandfather, Edwin Pierce, served in the civil war, and four brothers of my great-grandmother, the Nash boys, were soldiers during that struggle. One of them, Captain George I. Nash, is still living and is nearly 91 years old. He was with the famous Loomis Battery and now lives in Marcellus. Simeon Huff, now living in Decatur, was with the squad which captured Jefferson Davis. Three of the Nash boys died in battle. The township furnished soldiers also for the Spanish-American and world wars.

Joseph Gard named the township Volhymia, after a provice in Poland. Its present name came later.

Concerning a Former Townsman, Dr. Orr

In a pleasant Fourth of July letter from Fay Beach, editor of the Fenton Independent, he enclosed an item about Dr. John Orr. The item does not do justice to him in that it fails to state that he spent his young life on his parents' farm near Decatur and that he graduated from the Decatur high school in the class of 1902. The item follows:

FORMER HOWELL PASTOR WRITES SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS FOR MAGAZINE

Dr. John Orr, Ph. D., former pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Howell, and now professor of Bible and Philosophy at Westminister college, will prepare the Sabbath school lesson page for summer quarter of the United Presbyterian magazine, the official organ of the Presbyterian church.

Dr. Orr, who was born in Ireland, was educated in America at the College of Wooster and Princeton Theological Seminary and received Ph.D. degree from the University of Pittsburgh. Previous to his Westminister college appointment, he held Presbyterian pastorates at Middleport, Ohio, and Howell. He became associate professor of Bible at Westminister in 1928 and three years later was made head of the department. Dr. Orr is the author of "English Deism and Its Roots", and "English Deism: Its Roots and Its Fruits."

LOOKING BACKWARD

36 YEARS AGO

September 12, 1907.

Miss Nellie Potts has returned to her school work in Jackson, Miss Ida Potts will teach in Boyne City and Miss Emma Bradfield has the grammar room in Dowagiac.

Joe Haynes

One of Decatur's most beloved and respected citizens is Joseph Harvey Haynes, agent for the American Express Company.

He has been a resident of Van Buren county 70 years, a resident of Decatur 41 years and express agent 21 years. A record in years but a still better record in quality of citizenship.

He was 6 months old when his parents left the old home in Genesee county, New York, to find a home in the west and brought Joe along. They came from Detroit by team and wagon, but not over roads such as we have today. If they made ten miles a day over the ragged highway across Michigan they were doing well.

They located in Lawrence township where Joe grew to be a man. That was near the time that Mchigan became a state and that the Woodmans and others came here from New York, and these reminiscences will tie in nicely with the pioneer stories now running in the Republican.

Joe Haynes came to Decatur in 1866 to clerk for E. E. and J. L. Chadwick in the 3 story brick where G. R. Gale now sells hardware, and the old timers say he was as popular a salesman as ever stood behind a counter. He clerked for the Chadwicks 20 years and then took the express agency.

On the date above given he completed a building of his own adjoining the Chadwick building and it was dedicated with fine ceremony. His wife, Ella, and daughter Bernice, assisted him as hostesses.

The Voice of Nature

By Lowell Mallox of Decatur.

As mankind hurries on in time of peace or war intent on their own pursuits, inscrutable nature goes on as she has since the beginning of time. To those who understand her voice and moods she tells a wonderful story.

Just walk with me along the edge of a lowland woods on a moon-lit night in the late spring. The soft moon beams filtering through the haze casts a ghastly light over the countryside.. Striking the twisted limbs of the elm the moon casts grotesque shadows before you. A faint phosphoric light draws your attention and perhaps startles you. When you investigate it, however, you find it to be fox-fire.

From the woods comes a sweet unforgetable odor, the wild grape vine, and from afar comes the acrid, sickening smell of the burning muck.

You go on. A shadow blots out the moon and shortly after comes an agonized shriek. The hoot owl, nature's feathered spitfire, has struck a rabbit, a common tragedy of the wild. Muskrats splash and frolic in the ditch. Fireflies sparkle in the woods. A queer noise assails your ears. At first you take it for a screech owl but listen carefully, it is more squally, the whicker of a raccoon.The incessant piping of the frogs, the "Hyla Pickeringii," or spring peeper seems to dominate every other sound, although occasionally can be heard the mournful call of the whip-poor-will.

Sometimes you may see two beaming eyes, a marauding house cat, a constant menace to our fast vanishing wild life.

These are but a few of the little secrets that nature will reveal to you if you will but look and listen.

All these things were once common knowledge of our pioneer forefathers. But the rising tide of civilization has blinded us to the voice of nature.

A Quality Pioneer In Your Vicinity

Three quarters of a century ago Dr. T. B. Welch and his son, Dr. C. E. Welch, originated and perfected the method and control of preserving the rich juice of the Concord grape without fermentation.

After many years of experimentation of interblending of the choicest table quality grapes together with laboratory control and most sanitary equipment, they are producing a standard of quality in the grape juice industry comparable the same as the House of Sterling is to silver.

Through many years of insistance on the highest quality grapes and the uniformity of laboratory control, each bottle retains the same rich flavor and color everywhere.

It was natural that a company pursuing such ideals and standards should prosper and continue to grow and today a large percentage of all the grape juice bottled is made by the Welch Grape Juice Co., who have plants located at Westfield, N. Y., Silver Creek, N. Y., North East Pa., Lawton and Mattawan, Mich., and Springfield, Arkansas.

The unique, smooth blend of Welch grape juice is enriched with healthful quick-energy supplying dextrose to insure uniform sugar content and palatability in every bottle.

This same company processes the nationally known grapelade, a smooth jelly-like jam made from the choice Concord grapes grown in this area.

Today grape juice is recognized for its high nutritional and energy food value. It is no wonder or surprise that the government purchases a large number of cases of Welch grape juice, tomato juice and Welch quality jams and preserves.

This community can point with pride in their contribution in supplying the armed forces over the far corners of the globe with food processed from the very grapes grown and harvested here.

It will be patriotic, helpful and necessary to harvest these grapes at this time.

Will you use your spare time to help some one in picking grapes!

This is your second front.

Dear friend Arba:

I noticed in your paper two weeks ago that you desired information relative to Dexter H. Dean who died in your village in 1877. Perhaps what little I know of his family may be helpful. One of his sons, Dexter Valverd Dean was my uncle, having married my mother's sister. Our family genealogy states that the parents of my uncle were from Ellisberg, New York and that may be a clue on which to work to find out more information.

Sorry that I have nothing better to offer but thought this might help some.

Best wishes to you always,
Hal D. Spicer.

From High Chair To Electric Chair

Juvenile delinquency was reduced by a large percentage in San Juan Hill within a year. It can be reduced in any community if society and the parents want to reduce it.

Some day we shall sum up juvenile delinquency from its origins,—poverty, ignorance, disease, education in disorder on the streets and in the home, and attack the problem intelligently and systematically. Then we will see how great an economy it would be to give the children of slums the opportunity for supervised education. God speed the day when the parents of this nation will recognize their responsibilities to their children, for it is in the home that the fight against delinquency should begin, not after the boys have been corrupted by the gang and the reformatory.

If you neglect your boy today, Mr. Father, tomorrow he may take the road which heads to the penitentiary and the electric chair.

The above comments were given the Republican by Harry Baldwin, who had them copied from a clipping sent him by a friend in the South. He has been around among the delinquent children here and elsewhere and knows only too well the habits that boys fall into who grow up without guidance or discipline.

Some years ago when the 5 and 10 was in the other block 4 or 5 little boys came out of the store and saw Harry, who was one of their big boys friends. They surrounded him and said, "Look, Harry, see what we've got," and each boy pulled out of his pocket some small trinkets. "Where did you buy them?" said Harry. "We didn't buy them," said the boys, "we just took 'em."

They took Harry back to the store to show him how easy it was done, and he informed the proprietor. The boys were made to realize the seriousness of what they had done, they returned the plunder and the matter was droppd. Those boys are now grown up and most of them are married. They are good citizens and have thanked Harry for showing them their childish mistake.

WILL A. CLARK OF EARLY DECATUR DAYS

Will A. Clark was born in Decatur September 11, 1867. His father was Nathan Clark, one of the early residents of this village. Will grew up in this village and the old Clark home was on School street, opposite the school grounds.

He was a natural musician and when we first remember him he belonged to a fife and drum corps known as the Star Boys. There were a half dozen boys in it, but we can remember only two others, Frank Hawks and Will Secord, both still living, one in Virginia and the other in California.

In later years Will Clark became a bandman. He took up and held to the alto horn and became such a good player that he was signalled out for solo parts in special numbers. He played also in the then locally celebrated Decatur Symphony orchestra, led by Carl Herzfeld. Willard Van Antwerp and Nick Huff were also in that orchestra, and Grace Chadwick was the pianist. This orchestra played Sunday evening concerts in the Universalist church and they became so popular that the little church was not large enough to seat the congregations. This church is now the Catholic church and again it is found to be too small for the congregations that attend it.

When Will Clark was young the Hinkley Stave Company was a thriving concern. It gave employment to Decatur's young men and they were a hardy crowd. They kept the village on the map and the "Stave Factory Gang" was known for miles around. They were not only good workmen, but good ball players, musicians and actors.

The timber around Decatur finally became scarce, the products of the factory became more or less obsolete, the Hinkleys had served their day and died and the men were compelled to seek work elsewhere. Will Clark went to Battle Creek and held good jobs there till old age and ill health compelled him to retire, and on the 14th of March he was called to the home beyond.

They buried him in Lakeside cemetery but Mrs. Clark, who was Mae Blades, also a resident of this community for the first half century of her life, was too ill to attend the burial. He was buried on the Blades lot and there is one more grave reserved for his wife. She has ordered markers for Will and herself.

EARLY VAN BUREN COUNTY DAYS

By Nellie Truesdell
916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

A SONG

THE GRAVES OF A HOUSEHOLD

By Felicia D. Hemans

They grew in beauty side by side
They filled one home with glee
Their graves are severed far and wide
By mount and stream and sea.

The same fond mother bent at night
O'er each fair sleeping brow;
She had each folded flower in sight,
Where are those dreamers now?

One midst the flowers of the west,
By a dark stream is laid—
The Indian knows his place of rest
Far in the cedar shade.

The sea, the blue lone sea, hath one
He lies where pearls lie deep,
He was the loved of all, yet none
O'er his low bed may weep.

One sleeps where southern vines are dressed
Above the noble slain;
He wrapped his colors round his breast
On a blood-red field of Spain.

And one—o'er her the myrtle showers
Its leaves, by soft winds fanned;
She faded 'midst Italian flowers—
The last of that bright band.

And parted thus they rest, who played
Beneath the same green tree:
Whose voices mingled as they prayed
Around one parent knee!

They who with smiles lit up the hall
And cheered with song the hearth!
Alas for love! if thou wert all,
And naught beyond, O, earth!

I learned this song of my mother many years ago, and now I am thinking of the graves of her parents and brothers and sisters.

Some are in Paw Paw cemetery, some in Texas and her grave is in Monks' cemetery, Geneva. One of her brothers, William Lewis, was wounded in the Civil War and died there. His body was not brought home for I have heard my mother tell of how she and her mother watched for grand father Lewis to come home. It seems he went to see him, and how they saw him coming up the road and Willie was not with him.

How some moments in our lives stand out, and are never forgotten. This was one of hers.

And now may I write the prayer I had the honor of giving at the Soldiers' Monument last Saturday as Chaplain of W. R. C.

"Oh Thou, who in Thy greatness holds the planets on their way, and in Thy providence guides the sparrows flight, and in Thy tenderness marks the sparrows fall, may we not be blind to Thy footprints in the events of everyday but see them guiding our way and feel more and more Thy love. As we pay tribute today in memory of the countless numbers who have given their lives that we may be a free nation, let us remember not only our heroes who died, but also remember God's ways are good and He has never forsaken us.

Nellie Truesdell.

Congratulations on the Diamond anniversary of the Decatur Van Buren County Republican. Long may it continue to be "black and white and read all over."

Dr. George A. Jett

By Fred W. Green.

For the last 20 years Decatur has been accustomed to seeing a gentleman around town who had become a familiar figure to us all. Lately he has been seen more frequently, always with a gracious greeting and happy smile for any whom he happened to meet. I am referring to Dr. George A. Jett. Yes, Dr. Jett has left us for good.

He came here about the year 1918. He had always a yearn for rural life and satisfied this ambition by purchasing the Popendick farm on the West Valley road. He simply lifted that farm up out of the decay it was fast approaching. He overhauled all the buildings, repainted them and made them a credit to the neighborhood.

The Doctor was not without means when he arrived at this home where he and Mrs. Jett spent so many happy days surrounded by friendly neighbors. They fitted into the picture as naturally as if they had been there always.

His first venture was to set out a vineyard of concords, sending to New York state for his vines. So he had New York Concords growing in Michigan. And a wonderful vineyard it turned out to be. It is now in the possession of its new owner, Mr. Miller, who purchased it in 1942.

It was not long before Doctor Jett found out there was more hard work to farming than he had ever anticipated. He never expected to do the actual hard work of the farm and never was called on to do so, as when he arrived here labor was always available. But as the years went on labor became scarce and it was then the Doctor found out too late that he was not able to cope with the laborous manual labor of a farm.

He had his joys and his setbacks. About 8 years ago Mrs. Jett passed away very suddenly and that was his first real mishap, one from which he never recovered. She was his inspiration. She went at anything and everything connected with a wife's duty on the farm. But Mrs. Jett, like the Doctor, was not physically able to cope with the many duties she found herself called upon to do. She never complained but went on with a will and determination she must have inherited from her ancestors. Mrs. Jett was an admirer of Boston Bull dogs and had many prize winners.

After she passed away, the next 7 years were tiresome and lonesome for Dr. Jett. With the assistance of loyal neighbors he carried on in true form, but the load was getting heavier each year. Had it not been for his failing eyesight he would have carried on even to this day. He sold his farm and took up his residence with Mrs. High, where he enjoyed every minute of his residence there. He made arrangements to leave June first, and during that terrible rain he went to Chicago to take up his residence at the King Hotel for retired college graduates. Since leaving he has not been heard from, but am sure he is happy, and what more can any one ask. If there were more happiness in the world we all would be better off. Although this I will say, I see no one in the United States who looks as if he was in need of a square meal.

It may not be generally known that Dr. Jett worked many years ago with me in the Chicago post office, but the P.O. had no charm for him. There is a lot of studyin gto do to be be a proficient P.O. man, he was then already wed to the medical profession; medicine and post office do not mix, so he chose medicine. He was a successful practitioner. For 30 years he occupied the same office in the Columbus Memorial building and had a large clientage.

He was physician for many of the large hotels in the loop, and surgeon to many industrial factories, besides doing a general practice. He left all this for farming which was not his calling.

I am sure he will be missed and equally sure all will wish him happiness in his newer surroundings. We shall look forward to seeing his smiling, happy face again in Decatur. He always smiled and never growled at hard luck.

The Doctor has one daughter, Grace, to whom he is devoted, but her visits here were few, owing to her work which takes her to all parts of the United States, never being able to stay long in one place.

Decatur Twp. Cemeteries

Many questions arise as to the maintenance and support of our local cemeteries. Some explanation of the appropriations and funds for the care of them might be in order.

There are four established cemeteries in the township—Anderson, about five miles southeast of the village; Harrison and Lakside in the village; and the Van Hise cemetery, located in East Valley. The last named is a private cemetery, not supported by public funds.

The three township cemeteries are maintained by the township. Funds for their care come from the general fund of the township, sale of lots, gifts, etc., from some private individuals, the latter amount being small.

Anderson cemetery, while being probably the oldest established cemetery, is very little used. It is the burial place for the earliest settlers of the township and has been a burial place for many of the former residents of Little Prairie Ronde and East Valley.

The lots in Anderson cemetery are free lots. That is any one may have a lot for burial free of charge. This cemetery excels the others in some respects. It has an excellent soil for maintaining grass and does not dry out as badly as Lakeside or Harrison.

Lakeside cemetery, familiar to all, is the largest. The former population of Decatur, buried in Lakeside probably exceeds the living inhabitants of the village.

Harrison and Lakeside lots were formerly sold to anyone for 1 dollar each, and in some instances even this amount was not forthcoming.

The township board realized that while that arrangement might have been satisfactory years ago it was not suitable to present day costs of keeping the cemeteries attractive. So years ago the price of lots was raised in the village cemeteries. At the present time the price to non-residents in Lakeside is $100 per lot.

Local residents and taxpayers may still purchase a lot in the eastern annex of Lakeside for $25, which by the way are the only lots left for sale in the cemetery. The lots in Harrison are somewhat less in price.

This cemetery has several acres left for platting. It is the area north and east of Harrison not enclosed by the fence.

The soil of Harrison being entirely sand it is almost impossible to keep grass or lawn in condition there.

The sale of a lot to any individual carries only the right for burial space and erection of suitable monuments. No resale, transfer, planting of shrubs, vines or trees is granted.

If a lot is not wanted after purchase it should be released to the township for resale. The reasons are obvious. The indiscriminate planting of trees, bushes, etc., results in a cluttered up appearance and requires many extra days of work in a year trimming, and adds considerable to the cost of upkeep.

One problem that arises out of the old system of selling lots, is the one where perhaps 60 or more years ago a lot was sold to some one for a burial place and perhaps one burial is on it. There are left five burial places and the family who bought it has left this vicinity; no markers are erected, in fact the place is forgotten, yet it was a sale, the township still spends the money to care for the lot. The individuals interested are probably dead or, if living, not interested in the care of the lot.

The cost of maintaining the cemeteries of the township averages about $1,000 per year. While this amount is not excessive considering the acreage and that it requires the services of two or more men, it does represent a greater portion of the township's income.

Decatur township operates on a tax of $1 per thousand assessed valuation. If all is collected that rate brings only about $1,850, out of which township cemeteries, township fire protection, township hall and all other township expenses, salaries, etc., must be paid. There is little likelihood that this amount will ever be increased. We operate under the 15 mill tax allocation. It simply means that if the township is to take more the schools, county, etc., would have less.

Sometime in the not too far distant future this cemetery system in order to have funds to operate adequately and have the care that most people demand will have to be assisted by the village of Decatur which has adequate funds, or a lot assessment for individual care will have to be collected.

In the meantime an attempt will be made to care for the township cemeteries with the available funds.

If you are interested in the appearance of the cemeteries please do not transplant bushes, plants, trees, or other items not wanted at home to your lot at the cemetery and leave them without attention until Memorial day. The sexton will not have the necessary time to remove them and perhaps your neighbor will not want the refuse too close to his lot.

STEPHEN DECATUR

DECATUR NAMED AFTER NAVAL HERO

LOYALTY AND PATRIOTISM CHARACTERISTICS OF MAN WHO TAMED MEDITERRANEAN PIRATES

the village of Decatur received its name or of who is entitled to the credit of naming it. The village probably took definite form as a settlement in 1848, the year the Michigan Central railroad was built through to Niles, and may have been named by one of the road's officials when it became a railway station. It would be interesting, especially to our many older residents, if anyone could furnish the Republican readers with additional information on the subject.

That the village was named in honor of Commodore Stephen Decatur, who was at that time America's greatest naval hero, is beyond question of doubt. In fact his name has been given to a dozen towns and counties in the United States, among which the city of Decatur in the state of Illinois has acquired a population of 45,000.

Commodore Decatur's career was patriotic, brilliant, spectacular, tragic. Born near the city of Philadelphia but three years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, he grew up with the infant union and became one of her boldest defenders. His pride in his native country, his fearlessness, almost to the point of recklessness, in fighting her battles on the sea, won admiration for the young republic and brought her recognition and respect wherever her proud banner was unfurled.

The Mohametan states of Tunis, Tripoli and Algiers, by means of pirate cruisers, had been accustomed for many years to prey upon the commerce of the Mediterranean. The profits of this nefarious traffic had been the chief source of revenue of these Barbary states, and Decatur took the leading part in an effort to drive the pirates from the sea. His daring exploits and thrilling victories form an important part of the history of our country at that period. Lord Nelson characterized one of his exploits as "the most bold and daring act of the age."

Decatur was drawn into a duel with Commodore James Barron on the morning of March 22, 1820, and fell mortally wounded, the bullet from Barron's pistol passing through the abdomen. As he lay on the ground he uttered these sad words, "I am mortally wounded, at least so I believe; and I wish I had fallen in the defense of my country.'" He was but forty-one years old.

Loyalty to his county was the very breath of life to Decatur. It is even said that he told her who afterward became his wife that he had devoted his life to his country, and that it should ever have first place in his heart. So long as patriotism inspires the hearts of men his famous sentiment alone will keep his name alive:—"My country,—may she ever be right, but, right or wrong, my country."

Readers of the Republican will remember Martin F. Ryaan of Marshall. He has a railroad record of which any man might be proud, and he was a personal friend of that one time wizard of Michigan Central engineers, Lightning Bill Howland, who was brought up in East Decatur.

Martin Ryan may have once lived in Decatur, himself. We know he worked with James and Michael Mahoney on the section, but it may be that he was not anchored any closer than Mattawan. He has at least two ties here, however, one his cousin, Mrs. Maynard Southworth, and the other the filler of these columns.

Martin refers to the Republican as a literary forum, and he is right for this issue, at least, for it contains the contribution following from him.

The story is taken from Cyr's 4th reader which was common in the public schools of Northern Michigan a hundred years ago.

Our friend writes that due to its literary beauty, and its logic which is prophetic of the present time, he has tried to learn something of the author, but without success.

Charles Sprague is not listed in the libraries of Marshall, and we rather think Martin is putting it up to the Republican to get a line on him. All we can do is to turn the question over to our readers. Like Martin we never like to leave a question unanswered and shall greatly appreciate the information from whatever source it may come.

When you read this beautifully worded story, you too may be sufficiently interested to join in the search for a sketch of the author:

The Fate of the Indians

By Charles Sprague, in Cyr's Fourth Reader. July, 1825.

Not many generations ago, where you now sit encircled by all that exalts and embellishes civilized life, the rank thistle nodded in the wind and the wild fox dug his hole unscared.

Here lived and loved another race of beings. Beneath the same sun that rolls over our heads, the Indian hunter pursued the panting deer, gazed on the same moon that smiles for you and wooed his dusky mate.

Here the wigwam blaze beamed on the tender and the helpless, the council fire glared on the wise and the daring. They dipped their noble limbs in your sedgy lakes, and paddled the light canoe along these rocky shores. Here they warred. The echoing whoop, the defying death song—both were here; and when the tiger strife was over, here curled the smoke of peace.

Here, too, they worshipped, and from many a dark bosom went up a prayer to the Great Spirit. He had not written his laws for them on tables of stone, but he traced them on the tables of their hearts. The poor child of Nature knew not the God of Revelation, but the God of the Universe he acknowledged in everything around. He beheld his God in the stars that sank in beauty behind his lowly dwelling; in the orb that flamed on him from its midday throne; in the flower that snapped in the morning breeze; in the lofty pine that defied a thousand whirlwinds; in the fearless eagle whose untired pinions were wet in the clouds.

And all this has passed away. Across the ocean came a Pilgrim bark bearing the seeds of life and death; the former were sown for you, the latter sprang up in the path of the simple native.

Two hundred years have changed the character of a great continent, and blotted forever from its face a peculiar people. The Indian of falcon lance and lion bearing, the hero of the pathetic tale is gone, and his degraded offspring crawls upon the soil where once he walked in majesty, to remind us how miserable is man when the foot of the conqueror is on his neck.

As a race, they have withered from the land; their arrows are broken and their springs have dried up. Their cabins are in the dust, their council fire has long since gone out, and their war cry is fast dying in the untrodden west. Slowly but sadly they climb the distant mountains and read their doom in the setting sun. They are shrinking before the mighty tide which is pressing them away. They must soon hear the roar of the last wave that will settle over them forever.

LETTERS

AN APPRECIATION

As has been previously stated in the Republican we are indebted to James Chamberlain of Fort Worth, Texas, for a copy of the book, Vinegaroon, the story of Roy Bean or Law West of the Pecos.

The books, "Dodge City, the Cowboy Capital," and "The Pinkerton Dynasty," which Jim has found in the Fort Worth library, we have already borrowed, one from the Dodge City, Kansas library, and the other from the Paw Paw library. Both of these books have been returned, but we are desirous of owning them.

We hardly know what to say in reply to Jim's compliments. He is a life-long friend and we expect him to be prejudiced in our behalf. We also know him to be sincere in what he writes, and we are sincere in expressing to him our deep appreciation and thanks.

We have for many years been interested in Johnny Appleseed and have read several newspaper and magazine accounts of him. Miss Bessie Fuhrman has written a poem about him which will be published in the Republican as soon as we can get to it.

It was Kit Fortain in the old picture, the spelling as it appeared was a typographical error.

We printed the poem, "St. Peter at the Gate," by Joseph Bert Smiley, sometime last summer. You remember that the author's wife, Minnie Fern Hawks Smiley, was one of our school mates. Glad to know that the poem is on file in your city library..

Thanks again, Jim for your letter and for the poetic versions of Texas which accompanied it. Your letters are always welcome and they do their fair share in making the Republican a better home town paper.

JAMES CHAMBERLAIN WRITES FROM TEXAS

Fort Worth, -3- Texas
October 31, 1943.

Dear Arba,

Replying to your very kind letter I am happy to state that I am truly glad that you like the book sent you and that you are in a position to pass some of the lessons to be derived from such a character as Roy Bean and his system of justice to your readers.

With regards to the other books that you advertised for, I have been unable to buy any copies of them. However 'Dodge City, the Cowboy Capital,' and 'the Pinkerton's Dynasty," are in the public library. I could get them for two weeks with a privilege of renewing. I will be on the lookout for copies of these books and will be glad to get them for you if I can find them.

Other authors have written the story of Judge Bean. One of these writers gives in his book an extended account of the Jersey Lily's visit to Langtry shortly after the Judge's death, also an extended account of how the Judge single-handed held up the Jay Gould special and entertained the Gould party so long that the financiers in Wall Street became alarmed about getting no news of the special's whereabouts. They feared some accident had happened to the Gould party, and a near panic in Wall Street resulted.

The book is a token of my friendship and appreciation of the service you have rendered to the Decatur community, appreciation of the aid you have given in the war effort, also for the pleasure and benefits I have derived from the reading of innumerable articles in the Republican.

Although I have not agreed with you at all times, I have admired your courage in standing for what you believed right and the frank candid way you have denounced what you deemed wrong.

Considering your ability and experience I regard you as a great asset to the Decatur community. Your loss would be keenly felt wor where could anyone be found to fill your place?

I will not bore the readers (if any) of this letter with a detailed statement of the home paper's importance in community life, but each one should ask himself how he would like to live in a town without a local news paper. If he does this he surely will give his local paper proper support for then he must realize that in aiding the paper he is aiding the community. Of this aid he will get his share for in benefitting or damaging any part of an article, we likewise affect the whole.

Arba, you publish a dandy paper and merit the patronage of all Decaturites at home and non-resident. I consider myself in view of the number of local newspapers that I have read to be a pretty fair judge of local papers.

Johnny Appleseed

If I may digress so far I would like to recommend the reading of another book of which perhaps you are familiar. It is the story of Johnny Appleseed. Doubtless you will recall Johnny went from Maine to California, from Michigan to Texas, everywhere planting apple seeds. He was far in advance of settlers and as the country was settled, thousands of families had their orchards ready for them when they arrived at their new homes.

Government by Bureaus

The founders of our glorious republic were very desirous that too much power of government should not be invested in any of the departments, so in writing the Constitution they endeavored to keep separate and distinct the powers and duties of the legislative, executive and the judicial departments. This division of powers has been quite well sustained until recently there has been a strong tendency to bestow many of the powers formerly exercised by the legislative department upon a multiplicity of bureaus. These bureaus are subject to the control of the executive department, giving that department a disproportionate share of the powers of government. This tendency if not curbed might result in case of a despot in the White House, in a form of government similar to that of Germany under Hitler, and Italy under Mussolini, who are the Judge Beans of the present day.

When peace is restored, I hope the powers of government will be restored to their former balance and the danger of despotism averted.

The "Law West of the Pecos" is such a good example of the evils of despotism that I hope you can use it in "This Week" in contrasting our democratic form of government with the one that Hitler is trying to impose upon the world. The important thing is to win the war and then to make our country truly democratic.

Tarrant county's quota for the recently completed war bond drive was $21,500,000, the issue was oversubscribed, the final figures being twenty-eight million six hundred eighteen thousand dollars.

In the picture of the school group, wasn't it Kit Fortain instead of Kit Fountain as stated in the paper?

If you desire the poem "St. Peter at the Gate," by Smiley, I can get the words from the library.

Your friend,

Jim.

"TEXAS, YOU CAN HAVE IT"

by Randolph Rookie

'Twas once that I was happy
My life was filled with cheer;
I never had seen Texas
Till the Army brought me here.

I'd heard songs of her beauty,
Pretty girls and strong men,
Rolling plains and majestic mountains,
Just heaven from end to end.

The one thing that is certain
(Of this there's no denying)
The guy that started all that noise
Did a heck of a job of lying.

Deep in the heart of Texas,
There is sand in all we eat,
The girls, they are bow-legged
The boys all have flat feet.

Why did they have to send us here
To sit in sad dejection
Out in the lonely desert
For this durned state's protection?

Down here the sun is hotter,
Down here the rain is wetter—
They think it is the very best state,
But there are forty-seven better.

An answer to the poem "Texas, You Can Have It," written by Pfc. D. V. Lloyd of Kelly Field.

Unhappy lad from another state
You feel so very sad—
Before you get back home again
You'll say Texas is not so bad.

Her mountains, plains and fields
Some day you may see their beauty;
Some day, big strong men will get back here
After they have fulfilled their duty.

You cry about the sand you eat.
About bow legs and boys' flat feet;
It takes some sand to make a man
Who can stand a battle's heat.

If you would know about the Texans
Ask Eisenhower, Nimitz and MacArthur where they are;
They'll no doubt say, "Without those men
We couldn't win this war."

For when our Uncle Sam said, "Go,
We've got a war to win, you know;"
Yes, when this call to us was sent,
Near half a million Texans went.

When you have learned to be a man—
To eat and walk and sleep on Texas sand,
Then you'll have earned the right to see
The beautiful land of the truly free.

You are now in Texas on a grim vocation
Don't expect to feel you are on vacation;
When we win this war and the world is free
We'll show you what a welcome can be.

A LETTER FROM ENGLAND

(Another of those interesting letters from Marry Bull, brother of Mrs. Geo. Kemp, of Lowestoft, England.)

10 Maidstone Road,
Lowestoft, Suffolk, England,
April 10, 1943.

Dear Lizzie and George:

It was pleasant yesterday to receive your letter dated March 4. It had been censored but nothing had been crossed out, so you again get full marks for avoidance of saying things you ought not.

So you have had a cold winter in the states. Ours was very much the other way. We had a little snow at the beginning of January, and that was about all that we have seen. February and March were very warm with the result that plants are forward. The hedges are quite green already.

On Wednesday we had a strong gale with the result that the roads were strewn with tile, slate, chimney pots and other debris, and a good many wooden fences were blown down. It was the strongest wind we have had for years.

We have had a peaceful time lately for which we are thankful. Now and again we get a warning, and about a (censored) ago we had a noisy night, but were very fortunate here.

Yes, much has happened lately, and we are more sure than ever of winning the war. We have never doubted that, but should like to see the end of it as soon as possible,—the sooner the better for we who are in the "front line."

We are glad to hear of the continuance of good fortune in North Africa recently, and are waiting the day when all the enemy will have been cleared out of Africa, and when we shall have complete control of the Mediterranean Sea.

The Russians are not doing at all badly, and there is plenty of activity in all parts of the world. The measures against the enemy submarines are also meeting with success. So taking all things into consideration we may confidently say that things are going well for us.

Last week-end I went to Derbyshire again, traveling all Friday night and having to wait at Petersborough station from 2 to 6 a. m. I found Ethel quite well but her mother was troubled with rheumatism. Elsie has had her operation and is in a nurses' home in Chesterfield. She was cut about a good deal but has made a splendid recovery, being quite cheerful, happy and contented, so we are all pleased.

Alice and Billy are quite well and so were all our brothers and sisters when we last heard.

May God bless you in every way and give you that peace and joy which He alone can bestow.

Love from all in England,

Your loving brother,

Harry.

EARLY DECATUR DAYS

Dr. Tom Lyon opens the way for some more stories of early Decatur days and we shall try to bring them out soon. Walter Brown our faithful friend who has been ever ready for a story on the old timers, has been having more than his share of trouble the past few weeks, but we hope that he will square away again in a little time and find his peace in thinking over and perhaps living in memory the happy times he has known. He has a wealth of friends here who will do anything they can for him. The letters from Tom Lyon always arouse his interest. "That man knows what he is talking about," is Walter's favorite expression.

Raton, N. M., May 9, 1943.

Dear Friend Arba,

I have been waiting to see some answer to the question regarding the time Dr. Rogers house was built. He was living there as long ago as 1864 for I had typhoid fever then and my father took me there for treatment (calomel and quinine) and probably he built it.

I well remember the killing of Joe Pearson for I was in the neighborhood at the time and remember how he looked lying on the saloon floor, but will leave the story for Walter Brown to relate.

Like Walter I do not remember one in the picture who worked at the stave factory and I worked there from 1869 to '85, off and in addition to Walter's list I remember John Beach, Will Taylor, Dave Callicut, Paddy Clark, Fred Minnis, Charley Prichard, Joe McDonald and the three Lyons, Bill, George and Tom. The Taylor and the Callicut families lived across the track. The elder Callicut was a blacksmith with a decided English brogue.

Does anyone remember the campaign of '72 when Grant ran and of the big celebration when they had 60 yoke of oxen hitched in a string hauling the old settlers in a wagon? My father was in that wagon.

Tom Lyon.

MEMORIES OF THE DEWEY HOUSE

(This letter is rich in early memories of Decatur. Mrs. Fisher has our sincere thanks both for the letter and for the renewal of her subscription to the Republican, which was even a little ahead of time.)

Dec. 28, 1942..

Dear Mr. Moulton:—

Just for once, I want to send my subscription to the paper really on time. Would hate to be without it..

I enjoyed Leroy Dewey's letter about the old farm very much, for I, too, was saddened on reading of the burning of the house there. When the Dewey family moved into town, my father Delsey Welcher, and my uncle, William J. King, rented the place from I. S. Dewey. There my brother Royle was born January 16, 1895. From there too, my brother Jim started going to school.

It seems that never have apples tasted so good as the big "Fall Pippins" and "Maiden Blush" which grew there. A big peach orchard was on the farm and several plum trees with such delicious big yellow plums.

I remember the cattle in the row of stanchions in the "Red" barn. There was "Belva Lockwood," "Little Belva," the little roan cow, the little red cow, old "Laura" and the white cow. I believe "Belva Lockwood" was a namesake of a woman who ran for president. (Am I right, Vedah, Fred, Lizzie, Roy?)

Just up the road lived the Calbetzors on the farm formerly owned by great grandfather Scott. Grandpa Scott was the original maker of the famous "Scott Sticking Salve," which will be remembered by Decatur old timers as the salve which grew a new tail on a dog. Some extremeists even went so far as to say that some of the salve applied to the severed tail grew a new dog. However, I never took much stock in that story.

Mother and I drove past the old Dewey place several years ago and it still looked natural in spite of the changes the years had brought. Still seemed like old "home" to me.

We have had no zero weather yet, nor as deep snow as you in Decatur.

Grace Fisher,
Montague, Mich.,

ADDRESSES OF SOLDIERS

Mr. Moulton:

I am sending money $2.00. Will you please send the paper to my nephew Ward Mills, whose address is below?

Pfc. Ward A. Mills, ASN 16011278,
3rd General Dispensary,
Headquarters SOS, APo 781,
c/o Postmaster, New York City, N. Y.

I also have a grandson in England and if you want to print both of these addresses in the paper you may do so.

Pilot Officer J. E. Pritchard,
R. A. F. Officers Mess,
Somewhere in England.

He is from Madison, Wisconsin. A plane went over my house five times and I thought it was Everett. This fog makes me think of what they write about English fogs. Oblige.

Mrs. Charles Morlan,
307 Adams Street,
Dowagiac, Michigan.

Mrs. Morlan gave his exact address, which we would like to print, but fear it might come under the censor rule.

CHARLESTON

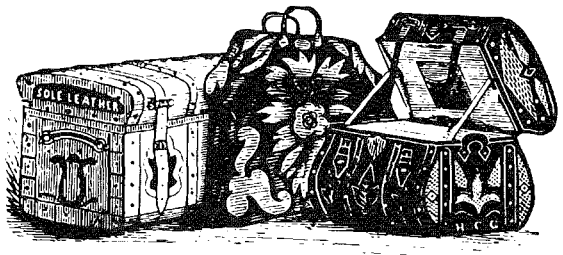
I saw Helen's writing about the village of Charleston. I might add a little more.

In the year of 1888 I came to Charleston as a bride and lived there for 2 years, the wife of Myron L. Pritchard. His father, O. M. Pritchard owned 10 acres of land with a house, barn and other small buildings, 12 trees of lovely apples. Frank Pritchard owned the hotel on the corner, selling to Frank Denise's parents. She was an invalid and I did their baking.

The next house south was Lawrence and 2 houses west Andrew Tyler lived in and had a large family of children and a pet sheep that would butt anyone.

There were 3 families of Morlans lived south and one west and all are resting in the cemetery there now.

Mrs. Chas. Morlan.



ELI KEYES' SUITCASE

Early Settlers and Their Cemetery Home

By Fred W. Green
of Hamilton Township

I can always get a story out of something old.

Recently I had an appointment with Sexton Henry Richmond at Hamilton cemetery. I got there early and seeing a tombstone that looked as though it might be ancient I walked over to examine it. On it was carved the name and date,—"Calvin D. Millard, 1838." That was two years before any known record of Hamilton cemetery, the earliest date recorded being 1840.

Just how and why this came to be the Hamilton township burying ground, I have been unable to ascertain. If it was bought or put aside like school land, history, so far as I can learn, does not record the fact. But it is a free cemetery for the burial of Hamilton's dead. Its upkeep is paid by taxation, and it takes but a glance to see why Hamilton people are proud of it.

I was sure if there was one burial in the cemetery as early as 1838 there must be others near that date, and I found them. They will take old timers back to the earliest days of the township, and bring forth memories both pleasant and sad.

Samuel Earl and Cynthia Barney were buried there in 1839, the year before the land was given over to the township for burial purposes.

I learned from Calvin Millard of Hamilton that the Calvin D. Millard buried in 1838 was his grandfather, who at the time of his death resided on a farm a little west of the cemetery, and was buried on his farm. After the cemetery was dedicated, his remains were transferred to their present resting place. I am unable to give any reason why the other two were buried there before the cemetery was established.

With the assistance of the sexton I learned that Zebina Stearns, Crumley Coleman and Catherine Holmes were buried there in 1846. Then I found the grave of Adeline Wakefield, buried in 1845, and of Thomas Geer and Charlotte M. Merriman, buried in 1844.

In 1848 Dan Fox and Silas Gromley were laid away. In 1847 Harris N. Fox and James Nesbitt. It is not my intention to record all the burials in Hamilton cemetery, but those of around the 1840's seem to me to be historically worthy of mention.

I will add here a word about the grave stones in the cemetery. It will probably be agreed that a grave stone leaning over or out of shape or weather-worn does not add to the appearance of a cemetery, and there are a number here that will topple over if not properly replaced.

It is too heavy a job for one man. Henry does the best he can and is working there every day the weather is fit. The cemetery looks the care it is having, and I think he is doing a good job.

While on the subject of old timers it might be appropriate to mention a few who were among the first arrivals in Hamilton over a century ago.

The first supervisor of the township was G. A. Bentley, in 1840, and I would not be surprised if it were he who had much to do with alloting the cemetery to the citizens of the township. If so he did a good thing and we are all proud of it.

The first known building in the township was a hunter's cabin, erected in 1833. The first known entry o land was made in 1835 by Rober

Nesbitt, section 4.

The first child born in the township was Mason Wakefield, in 1836 and the second was Mary, daughter of Robert Nesbitt, in 1837. The first marriage was that of Robert Nesbit to Maria Comley.

The first to die was Mr. Knickerbocker. This is a matter of history first, because it was such a sad death and second, because it shows how well, even then, Hamilton township took care of her dead.

It is recorded that Mr. Knickerbocker died of starvation, exhaustion overwork and lung fever. He had dreamed of a home for his family on the bank of Knickerbocker Lake The walls of his house were erected but as yet there was no roof or chimney. Huddled together in that uninhabitable place was the way Robert Nesbitt found the dead man and his family. The dead man was in one corner and his widow and family weeping in another. That was in the fall of 1835.

Zebina Stearns joined Mr. Nesbitt in doing what he could for the relief of the stricken family. He went to Paw Paw to secure a coffin, and on returning brought with him Peter Gremps, Elder Warner, Robert Nesbitt, James and John Nesbitt, and a hired man by name of Wheeler, employed by Robert Nesbitt.

It was Knickerbocker's request that he be buried on the island in the middle of the lake bearing his name, and this was done. Elder Junia Warner preached his funeral sermon. The record does not say how the body was landed on the island, but it does say he was buried there, and the remains are supposed to be there yet.

There are many stories of the trials and hardships of the first settlers of Hamilton township, now such a delightfully pleasant place in which to have a home.

In 1835 Lewis Johnson and wife were found trudging along through the woods toward what was to be their home. They each had a bundle of household goods and food, and Johnson also carried an axe and led a cow. That was the extent of their worldly possessions, but they were on their way to find a place to settle down.

They stopped that night at the home of Zebina Stearns and worked there till they had earned a supply of food, and Johnson chopped down trees enough to build a shanty.

Zebina Stearns must have been a good man. History gives him credit for doing many deeds of kindness to his neighbors. The same is said of Robert Nesbitt. There was more community spirit then than exists today, there had to be, or some of those old pioneers could not have survived.

Joseph M. Osborn seems to be next on the list of early arrivals in Hamilton and he was followed shortly by other members of the Osborn family.

John Bennett came in 1849 and his wife was a daughter of Calvin D. and Lucy Millard.

I knew I would find a Collins if I looked long enough and sure enough John H. Collins appeared on the scene in 1859. The local history gives him a very good word and his thrifty wife a very good word, and I am sure they deserved it. The families have kept up the good record to this day.

Aaron Barney located in Hamilton in 1835, and Austin D. Barney about the same date. Philotus Haydon also came in 1835, James M. Lumbard in 1836, James and Reason Comley in 1836, Caleb Bartlett and Joseph McClintock in 1836, G. G. Yeckley in 1836, and S. T. Howell in 1835.

It is not my object in giving this short letter to intrude on Nellie Truesdell's hobby, and hope she will forgive me for taking up the history of the old timers with which she is conversant.

In writing this letter one thing just brought up another, and I thought it would not be out of place to bring these old pioneers back to the notice of our present generation. They built well and laid the foundations for the wonderful farms and families that now grace the township.

Should the gravestones be left to languish and decay, or should they be straightened and given a firm foundation? Every cemetery has them, but is that any reason why they should be tolerated in Hamilton?

The Michigan Central, The Engineers and Marshall

Three hundred people gathered in Marshall on Sunday, May 23, to witness the dedication of a monument erected to commemorate the founding of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which occurred in that city 80 years ago. Engraved on the monument are the names of the 12 men, all engineers, who founded the Brotherhood, and below their names is a short history of the organization.

The chairman of the committee which planned the monument and dedication was Martin F. Ryan who passed away a few months ago, after seeing his plans through to the point of attainment. Mrs. Ryan took part in the dedication, as did her sons, Attorneys Ronald Ryan of Battle Creek and Edward Ryan of Kalamazoo.

The esteem in which Martin Ryan was held by his townspeople and the Brotherhood was shown in a silent tribute paid to his memory.

Melbourne Jenvey, instructor in music in the Marshall schools, accompanied by the band, led the assemblage in singing, "I've Been Working on the Railroad."

Harold C. Brooks of the local committee reviewed the early Michigan Central Railroad, history in Marshall and the organization of the Brotherhood there, from which we take the following:

Formative Days of the M. C. R. R.

"We are here to commemorate a great event—the founding in Marshall in 1863, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive engineers. But for the moment let us roll back our local history to a point nearly two decades before the memorable happenings of this Civil War year.

"August 10, 1844, was a day when the people of the village of Marshall were gripped with excitement and a tense expectancy. They had watched the laying of the last rails of the Michigan Central Railroad, on its approach to Marshall from the east, and now were about to witness the long hoped for arrival of the first train.

On that Saturday afternoon, nearly a century ago, work and play were forgotten as men, women and children crowded along the tracks and waited for the sight of the thick smoke above the trees and the sound of the puffing locomotive. Many were frightened at the monster. There were hundreds of children who had never seen an engine and they ran away and hid, or clung to their parents' hands. Men cheered. The workmen hailed the oncoming engine and its four cars with shouts of triumph. The conductor, Zenos Tillotson, of Marshall, recently graduated from his stagecoach driving, tried to urge the engineer to "whip her up" as he used to do with his horses when effecting a grand entrance into the village.

A Wonderful Little Engine

"Our late and deeply lamented fellow-citizen, Martin F. Ryan, in one of his interesting articles, called this first locomotive 'a wonderful little engine with a pair of small trucks in front, with one driver on each side; and a tender that was just large enough to carry a couple of cords of wood and a few barrels of water, and no more wheels than a one-horse wagon'.

"The trip from Albion to Marshall was made in forty minutes, while the fastest stage coaches took two hours. It was a great day for Marshall. (At that time the total mileage of railroads in the entire United States was only 4,300, compared with 234,000 miles today.)

"For many years after the Central Railroad reached Marshall, this place was the principal point of railroad activity between Detroit and Chicago. The first divisional shops were built in Marshall in 1845 and continued their operations here until 1873, when, because of Marshall's failure to raise $60,000 for their retention, they were moved to Jackson.

"Before dining cars were put into service the big Marshall depot fed the travelers. As the trains approached Marshall, passengers were presented with small handbills bearing the following important message:

MICHIGAN CENTRAL EATING HOUSE
MARSHALL

PASSENGERS are respectfully notified that the next station is MARSHALL,
At Which This Train Will Stop
TWENTY MINUTES

FOR DINNER

Brilliant Prospects Fade

"The bustling activity of Marshall's railroad life of those days affords a picture which is quite marked in contrast with the present scene of a dreary and desolate station, where most of the trains are known only by their passing speed, and whose passengers are comfortably unaware of either the town of Marshall or its colorful early history.

"Marshall is no longer the great "halfway house" between Detroit and Chicago. A goodly portion of the western world passes through Marshall today but only a very small portion lingers, and few know that on three memorable occasions Marshall's influence was nation-wide. Three of the great political, educational and economic movements in American history originated or received impetus here. The Crosswhite Slavery Case was a determining factor in bringing about the Civil War; the Public School System of Michigan which affected all states admitted into the Union after 1837 and influenced others, was conceived and planned in Marshall by two of her pioneers; and the oldest continuous labor organization in the country was born in Marshall, the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers

Today, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers counts a membership of nearly 80,000. It owns two great office buildings and a large hotel in Cleveland, Ohio. There is an insurance department, writing every type of policy for its members, which to date has paid out in claims and benefits approximately $100,000,000. The brotherhood not only gave birth to organized labor in this country but its success has stimulated similar organizations, profoundly influencing the labor situation in many directions.

"We thus come to the end of a story of early railroad history which, perhaps, might have been better told had Providence spared to this day our old friend, Martin F. Ryan, who for so many years was connected with the Michigan Central Railroad and whose articles on the subject of pioneer railroading were so intensely interesting. His recent passing saddens this present occasion—a day which he had looked forward to with fond expectation and it is fitting at this time to pay tribute to his memory.

Martin Ryan

"Mr. Ryan was one of Marshall's outstanding citizens and a man of sterling character. In thinking of him today we recall his charming and gracious manner, his simple and unaffected dignity, his innate culture, and his charity toward all. To know Martin Ryan well was to respect and admire one of the finest of men who ever walked the streets of Marshall. We dare to hope that, although it was his Maker's will to remove him from the earthly scene, his spirit is with us today, silently participating in this event which he largely promoted, and in the planning of which he played such a prominent part."

The above story is taken from the Marshall Evening Chronicle which was sent to the Republican by former Sheriff Warren Dodge who has a store there. He wrote, "I thought you might be interested in the "doings" here Sunday. Much is said of your late friend, Mr. Ryan." Warren's thoughtfulness is greatly appreciated.

In the files of the Republican are a number of stories of early railroad days which Martin Ryan wrote for this paper and they will be prized for their historical record when generations yet to come are searching out the origin of great American enterprizes.

Martin Ryan proved his worth to us as a friend, even though our acquaintance was confined to correspondence. And when we think of him we think also of our mutual friend, one of the greatest engineers of all time, the late "Wild Bill" Howland.

Melbourne Jenvey, who led the singing at the dedication, is a former resident of Decatur and a graduate of the Decatur high school class of 1916.

The distance from Albion to Marshall is 12 miles and that first Michigan Central train made it in 40 minutes! That was on August 10, 1844. It took the Railroad Company four years to build the track to Decatur.

We wonder what sort of a city Marshall would be today had its citizens of 70 years ago been sufficiently enterprising to raise the $60,000 asked for the retention of the shops. We venture the guess that it would be the great halfway point between Detroit and Chicago, and equal in size to the combined cities of Jackson and Battle Creek, and perhaps Kalamazoo added.

And remorseless memory brings back again, those sad, sad words, "It might have been."

THIS WEEK

By ARBA N. MOULTON, Editor

It was 11:15 p. m. last week Wednesday. We were sitting in a warm room writing out some letters from the boys in the service, when that dreaded alarm of fire sounded out above the storm.

The sound of the Chief's auto siren followed and firemen from different parts of the village sent their cars through drifting snow to the fire station.

There is always an uneasy feeling in the mind of some individuals at the alarm of fire, until its location is learned and then the uneasiness turns to regret for the unfortunate ones.

This uneasiness is lessened somewhat by the confidence imposed in our voluntary fire department of which Decatur has one of the best.

The loyalty of our firemen to their home town can hardly be expressed in words. They receive no salary. They do not always receive a thank you. But whenever that siren is sounded, be it day or night, in fair weather or storm, they drop their work or arise from a comfortable bed to rush into a fight with the elements that may hold them to hard dangerous work and severe exposure for hours.

All praise to the home town volunteer firemen and when we, their fellow citizens, can see a way to express to them our appreciation for their services, let us never hold back from doing it. It may be our home or our business that they will next be called upon to save, and we may rest assured that to save it they will put forth their best effort.

Emeline Childs died June 25, 1907, at the age of 80. That was 35 years ago. Her maiden name was White and her maternal grandmother was Anna Hull, daughter of Commodore Isaac Hull.

Mrs. Childs possessed something of the forceful character of her illustrious great grandfather. He was a cabin boy at 14 and rose to the command of a ship in the West Indian trade. In 1798 he entered the newly established American Navy as a lieutenant. He was appointed to the frigate Constitution which he commanded as captain from 1806.

Hull was an expert seaman and in 1812 his skill enabled him to escape from an English squadron after being pursued three days and nights. The same year he captured the British frigate Guerriere after a battle of 30 minutes.

The Guerriere was so badly damaged that she had to be burned, while Hull's frigate escaped with such slight damage as to gain for her the name of "Old Ironsides." Hull received a medal from congress and swords of honor.

Mrs. Childs, the great granddaughter of the great naval hero, came with her young husband to this new country of which our village was the center in 1854 when Decatur was but six years old, and she lived here until her death.

The Republican of June 27, 1907, contains a sketch of her life from which is taken the following:—

Mr. Childs was a carriage and wagon maker and had a shop on west Delaware street which became later the Theodore Harlan property and now is the site upon which the handsome residence of Marion E. Chadwick is located. (This is the present home of Mrs. Jennie Borst.)

In 1857 the family moved into the house which has been Mrs. Child's home to the time of her death, and Mr. Childs died in the same house in 1860, before the upright was completed.

In those early days Mrs. Childs suffered hardships which only a brave and successful woman could surmount. Left a widow with four small children and no property from which she could obtain an income, she was compelled to meet conditions which would discourage one less determined.

Mrs. Childs worked at anything she could get to do and kept her family together until they grew up and could do for themselves. She did dressmaking and fancy needle work, painted signs for the merchants and pictures for the home and made beautiful artificial flowers.

She puttied all the glass into the windows of the Methodist church when it was built, and there were but few nights in those early years that her lamp was not burning until midnight.

To her there was no place like the old home in Decatur. She found a warm welcome with her children but was not contented until she was back to the little house between the churches and there she lived a quiet and peaceful life to its close.

There are so many interesting things to write about that one need never want for something to do to keep himself busy, and the way one thing leads on to another it becomes a natural conclusion that life is one never ending continuous story.

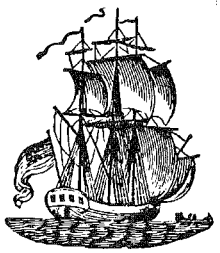
From coming across the above account of the death of one of Decatur's pioneer residents we are led on to write about one of the most famous vessels of the United States Navy, the Constitution, commanded by Commodore Isaac Hull, her great grandfather.

In the battle with the Guerriere, the history states, the English vessel was left a total wreck and 79 of her crew were lost, to 14 of the American crew.

The Guerriere was sinking and could not be towed into port. She was therefore blown up. Hull sailed into Boston with his prisoners, to such an ovation as few men have ever earned in so short a time. In less than 25 minutes of actual fighting he had lifted the despised American Navy and nation to an equality with the proudest in the world; and drew from Great Britain such an explosion of rage and humiliation as she has never known before or since.

The Constitution saw much active service and won other notable victories after brilliant fighting.

Finally, in 1830 she was reported unseaworthy and condemned to be broken up, but Oliver Wendell Holmes published in the Boston Advertiser his thrilling poem, "Old Ironsides," and the public clamor excited by it saved the noble vessel.



She was rebuilt and again put into service in 1833. In 1877 she was again rebuilt and took her last trip across the Atlantic the next year. In 1897 she was roofed in at the Boston Navy Yard and was used as a barrack ship until 1925. She was restored by popular subscription and in 1931 visited several ports on the Atlantic seaboard.

Most Republican readers are familiar with the poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, but as they may not have read it of late years we are printing it here:

OLD IRONSIDES

(September 14, 1830.)

Ay, tear her shattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky;
Beneath it rung the battle shout,
And burst the cannon's roar;—
The meteor of the ocean air
Shall sweep the clouds no more.

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,
When winds were hurrying o'er the flood,
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread,
Or know the conquered knee:—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

Oh, better that her shattered hulk
Should sink beneath the waves;
Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
And there should be her grave;
Nail to the mast her holy flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the god of storms,
The lightning and the gale!

We are going back a few months to a day in August when we received from the museum of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, a picture of Commodore Decatur, the dashing Naval officer for whom the village of Decatur, Michigan, was named.

Had discovered from casual talks with our townspeople that comparatively few of them are acquainted with the life and accomplishments of this great American Naval hero, or knew that our village was named for him.

A few years ago Charles Lee Lewis, professor of English and History of the Naval Academy, wrote a biography of Decatur. It was published by the University of Pennsylvania Press, and we were fortunate to receive an editorial copy with the compliments of the publishers. This book gave us our first intimate knowlege of the man for whom our village was named.

Of course the people of this village had no part in naming it. There were no people here then. The financiers of New York City, who promoted and built the Michigan Central, laid out the line across the state on paper, obtained their right of way, put the dots along the line where they would build stations, and named them.

Commodore Decatur was listed for one of the names and it happened to be here. He was killed in a duel in 1820 and the Michigan Central was planned in the forties, so it is quite probable that among the promoters of the railroad he had in his lifetime some personal friends.

There has never, to our knowledge, been any sort of public recognition of the man for whom our village was named. There is no likeness of him in our public buildings, and nothing whatever to identify him with the town of Decatur.

We therefore decided to obtain if possible a suitable picture of him to place on a wall of the Republican office.

We first wrote to the University of Pennsylvania Press, publisher of the Lewis biography, which contained several handsome illustrations from portraits.

The reply came back that the pictures from which the illustrations were made were in the possession of the author. We then wrote to Mr. Lewis expressing our desire to purchase a suitable likeness of Commodore Decatur for the Republican office, and received this very courteous reply,—

41 Southgate avenue,
Annapolis, Maryland.

I hope you will pardon my delay in answering your recent very interesting letter, as I have just returned from my vacation, a part of which was spent in Boston and New York.

I am pleased to hear that my biography of Decatur has given you so much pleasure, and it is perfectly natural that you should desire a picture of the famous Commodore for your office.

I have arranged with the Curator of the U. S. Naval Academy to send you one, possibly two, for this purpose, and I hope you will derive pleasure therefrom.

Very sincerely yours,
Charles Lee Lewis.
Professor U. S. Naval Academy.

A few days later we received the picture and the following letter:

Your letter addressed to Professor Charles Lee Lewis has been referred to this office for a reply.

I take pleasure in forwarding you a photograph of an oil painting of Stephen Decatur by John Wesley Jarvis with the compliments of the Naval Academy Museum.

Very truly yours,

The invitat[illegible] call and see

Because Commodore Stephen Decatur played such a prominent part in the early history of our country, because he was a Naval hero of whom the American people owe much for his accomplishments, and because our village was named for him, we conceived the idea of briefly sketching his career in this column.

We wrote again to Professor Lewis, and asked the privilege of using his book as the basis for the sketches. Another generous reply came from him, a portion of which reads as follows:

"I feel flattered that you should plan to run a sketch of Decatur's life in your paper based upon my biography, and you have my entire permission to do so. I have been looking over the copies of your excellent newspaper, and I hope the people in your community fully appreciate how much you are doing in an educational way for all its readers.

I congratulate you on being able to contribute so much to the general welfare of your town and community."

We hasten to assure Professor Lewis that the readers of the Republican do appreciate our efforts to publish a good home town newspaper, and that is what keeps up our ambition to do our best.

We hope soon to start the sketches of Commodore Decatur and if we are capable of doing justice to them, can assure our readers that they will be interesting.

Others have done it, why cannot he? Others with no better opportunity than Lowell Mattox, have made names for themselves through writing.

Lowell earns his living as a laborer. He has gone into the woods with an axe, has worked on the railroad with shovel and pick and worked on farms, but all the time his mind has been busy with other things. He has observed the beauties and wonders of nature and formed in thought beautiful sentences.

When the work day is over he goes to the library, selects books of the best writers and spends his evenings in reading and study. He is the town authority on the books of greatest merit.

A few months ago he acquired a typewriter that has seen better days; but he has it in working order and is using it.

Last week he brought to the office a short poem for which he wrote this explanation:

"It was the early belief of some tribes of Indians that when they died their spirits rode into the sunset and their pathway was swept clear of obstacles. When the Dark Angel came he blew his icy breath onto the chosen warrier who then rode west never to return."

The poem follows:

LAST ADVENTURE

I know not to what distant land I'll go
The day I ride into the blazing sunset bright,
Where there will be no sorrow, pain nor woe
Beneath the dazzling radiance of His sight.

I'll shrink not when I feel that icy breath,
From thorns of doubt my pathway will be clear;
And to that last adventure men call death
I'll go as I have lived,—without a fear.

Lowell Mattox,
Decatur, Michigan.

Mrs. Charles Morlan of Dowagiac gives some more remembrances of Charleston which are printed in the column of letters. Are there others who remember this once active little settlement? Guy Calbetzor was born there about 65 years ago.

Bottle for bottle is the new government order to govern the dairy. The new rules and regulations were printed in the Republican last week.

A greeting from Mrs. Nellie Betaque of South Bend brings up happy memories which carry back to childhood.

Her mother was Orilla Kirkland. We have heard words of praise for her father, but he died early in life and left his widow with two young daughters, Nellie and Jennie, to get on as best they could.

Mrs. Kirkland was a woman of unusual strength of character. No one doubted that she would meet any responsibility imposed upon her. We remember her first when she went to work in the Upton family. How she did the housework and helped in the bringing up of those six lively Upton children was something of a wonder. We played there a good deal in those early years and she was the one who kept the children within bounds. She had a way of doing it which made us love and respect her.

Nellie graduated in the class of 1882 and went right to work to earn her living teaching school. Then she married Frank Rich and by that name she was best known in and around Decatur where she always worked. She became one of the standbys of the Decatur school and was our teacher in the grammar room.

No one of her pupils will ever forget her. She exacted obedience, but did it in such a kindly way that we wanted to be decent; and as an instructor she made the texts so plain and interesting that it was easy to learn our lessons.

Time went on with its changes and Mrs. Rich went through the sorrows of separation and death and finally became Mrs. Betaque. South Bend has been her home now for many years, and we hope those years have all been kind to her.

She still has friends in Decatur with whom we are happy to share this cordial note:

Walter Bruce has listed for the Republ[illegible] are not pre[illegible] to be in the order of their occurrence:

Hopkins gristmill and sawmill
Wilson and Warner sawmill
Lyman Bacon residence
Willson sawmill
Old tannery
Adams grist mill
Butter tub factory
3 houses on Paw Paw street
Henry Byers' sawmill
Roberts and Stewart grocery
Geo. B. McOmber store
Browning drug store
East side of Main street
George Smith house
Sherwood street to Ransom Nutting house
John Foster house
Dan Lee house
Watts house
Presbyterian church
Universalist church
L. L. Hamilton store
Nick Huff's studio
Poor building
School house

Walter has remembered only a part of Decatur's serious fires. He did not list the stave factory fire, the fire that burned the printing office on West Delaware street. There came near to being a panic and loss of life at the time of that fire.

The Civil War veterans were holding a camp fire in the old town hall and the hall was packed with people. Editor Bob Warren was master of ceremonies and some of the veterans' daughters were taking part in the program.

The shrill cry of fire was heard out on the street and the crowd rose up as one person. Old timers will remember that the hall was on the second story of the building. Had the people ever started to rush the stairway nothing could have stopped a tragedy.

With great presence of mind Bob Warren rushed to the front of the platform and cried out in a commanding voice, "Sit still! there is no fire. Some boys are playing on the street!"

At the same time cool heads at the stairway rushed the audience out as fast as it could go with safety. We remember well getting to that stairway and being pushed along with the command to hurry.

The hall was emptied without an accident and the crowd that went to be entertained by the veterans stayed to watch a serious fire.

That was some time in the eighties. Our memory is not clear as to what buildings were burned. It may have been the corner store buildings.

Pvt. Donald Miller has been in the army long enough to see the seriousness and sadness of a state of warfare among nations, and to look for messages of hope for peace.

From his camp on the fair grounds at Springfield, Illinois, he sent home the following lines which he clipped from a paper:

"There shall be peace again at Christmas time,
When men have done with bayonet and bomb,
When Mars' grim legions vanish in the chime
Of holy bells that sing a holy calm.
The world shall see again on Christmas morn
Freedom arising from a stricken land,
Freedom again, her native strength new-born,
Her lighted torch uplifted in her hand.

Take heart, it is not ours to fear the foe,
Nor ours to waver from a steadfast trust;
Despite disaster and disarming blow,
The final victory is with the just.
Let there be vision then, and faith to see Beyond the strife—the triumph of the free!"

—Helen Carson Janssen.

With all her faults and limitations there is something about Decatur that one does not easily forget, and the memory is a pleasant one.

We have in mind Mr. and Mrs. I. H. Slominski. They dropped into this village some seven or eight years ago like a sunbeam out of the sky. They came from Chicago. How they happened to select for their dwelling place this small settlement we cannot remember, but they bought a pleasant bungalo on Wheeler street and moved here.

Mr. Slominiski was an Old Salt with the rough side out, but a kindlier veteran of the sea never lived. One of his first acts when he settled here was to subscribe for the Republican. That meant that he intended to take an interest in his new home town, to be a part of it and to boost it. Such a man makes friends from the start and is an asset to the fortunate community with which he decides to cast his lot.

Our new townsman stayed a couple of years, maybe three. He liked our people, our business places, our climate and community, but he loved the big water. He did not realize how he would miss it when he could no longer see it every day. You can't see across Lake Michigan, but you can Lake of the Woods and all of the other lakes within walking distance of Decatur. Our lakes are more like ponds for toy sailboats.

Lake Michigan in a strong wind can work up an agitation that reminds one of the mountains and valleys of the mighty deep, and gives a thrill of inexpressible joy to one who loves the boundless expanse of Nature's handiwork.

The little home became the abundant world to Mrs. Slominski and she would gladly have stayed, but she willingly went when they found a home to their liking in St. Joe. There they can look out from their house onto the rippling water of the Great Lake and watch the sun make its shiny path to the land beyond recall, and, to get down to the prosy side of life, they can have the uninspiring job of cleaning fish.

Mr. Slominski can sit on the pier with his hook and line and have his fun while he grins defiance on the fierce commands of the rationing board.

But, as we said before, there is something about Decatur that one cannot forget and that is made clear by these good people when they continue each year to read the little home town Decatur paper.

We think it interesting to set down here what this former townsman wrote on the 28th of December from his home in St. Joe:

"Well, Arba, another year has rolled around and it's time to renew the subscription to the good old Decatur Republican, so inclosed find a money order for $1.50. I want to tell you that my wife has been more or less on the dog wagon for the last three months and as for myself I am still kicking around. Was 74 years old the 26th of December and thank God am still able to get around and go to the lake fishing when the weather is fine. Good luck to you. I. H. Slominski.

Others have done it, why cannot he? Others with no better opportunity than Lowell Mattox, have made names for themselves through writing.

Mrs. Charles Morlan of Dowagiac gives some more remembrances of Charleston which are printed in the column of letters. Are there others who remember this once active little settlement? Guy Calbetzor was born there about 65 years ago.

The Republican takes special pride in announcing that the Commencement speaker for the class of 1943 is to be Charles H. Mahoney of Detroit, a native of our village and member of the Decatur Alumni Association. It is the first time in the history of the Decatur High school that one of its graduates has been asked to come back to perform such a service. It was a happy thought of Superintendent Dodge which may well be repeated in future years.

Charles Mahoney has given a good account of himself since his graduation from the D. H. S. under Superintendent Hungerford in 1904. Several times in the past years he has spoken at Alumni meetings and has so impressed his audience with his intelligence and natural ability as an orator that we bespeak a packed auditorium to hear his Commencement address next week Thursday evening.

Charles' young life in Decatur is well known to those who lived here when he did. He was a quiet, serious minded, likable boy, and he was good to his widowed mother. He worked and earned what money he could out of school hours and at vacation times, and returned faithful service to his employer. One man said just last week, "He worked for me occasionally on the farm and he was a dependable worker. He always wanted to earn his money"

He has been interested in politics since going to Detroit and served four years on the City Planning Commission under Mayor Cousins. The City Planning Commision has the functions of buying parks, laying out streets, placing public monuments and generally supervising the growth of the city. He then served some ten years on the Board of Supervisions for Wayne county.

In 1932, he was the Republican nominee in the First Congressional district for Congress and of course was defeated in the great land slide. He was later appointed by Governor Fitzgerald as Commissioner of Labor for the State of Michigan and after his death, served under Governor Dickinson until his defeat by Governor Van Wagoner. After the recent election of Governor Kelly, he was again appointed Commissioner of Labor and is now serving in that capacity.

Our Commencement speaker has had some interest in educational matters—being a member of the Southern Education Foundation, which is a national foundation and handles the distribution and investments of the Jeans Fund; the Slater Fund; Peabody Fund; and the Virginia Randolph Fund. There are over five hundred Jeans teachers scattered through the South and in the Islands of the Caribean Sea, who are acting as assistants to the county supervisors or the State Supervisors of Public Instruction.

The foundation helps foster and to finance colleges and universities throughout the South, and generally uses the funds to promote the cause of education wherever the need evidences itself. The Board is made up of such people as Mrs. Roosevelt, Mr. Snow of the Chase National Bank in New York, Mr. Page of the Telephone-Telegraph Company, Mr. Rainey, president of the University of Texas; Mr. Sands, director of the Duke Foundation, Mr. Patterson, president of Tuskegee, and other persons of the same description.

Cold Weather

By W. H. Tuttle

(This story contains an account of the cold New Year. It was written by the well remembered Will Tuttle who passed away a few years later. It was first printed in the Republican January 17, 1918, twenty-five years ago. We are indebted to Frank E. Howard of Lawrence for this copy.)

I have heard several people say lately that this is one of the coldest winters that we have ever had, but if my memory is good for anything—and I admit it isn't good for much—our present winter compares with some that we have had during the past fifty years about like a candle beside an electric light.

The Cold New Years

The first winter that I remember very distinctly was the one with the "Cold New Years" in 1864, and all that I remember of that was the two weeks that included that historical date, and anyone whose memory goes back that far is not likely to forget it.

I was fifteen years old then and had just started out on my career as a telegraph operator, and was stationed at Parma, just this side of Jackson. The day before New Year's was warm and when I went to bed in the evening it was raining, but about midnight I had to get up and go to the depot because a train had gotten into trouble, and Oh, my, what a change! It was snowing and blowing terribly and the cold was something awful, and that storm lasted almost two weeks. The thermometer stood at 35 below zero day after day, the wind blew a hurricane, and everything was buried in the drifts.

Trains were stalled all along the road, and stock froze to death by the carloads. Even passenger trains could not get through, and passengers on some trains nearly died from cold and hunger. That was in war days and in some cases soldiers froze to death in their tents in spite of all that they could do.

A big fire in Dowagiac on New Year's day burned up a good share of their main street. It was so very cold that the fire company could do very little to stop the flames, and they had to let the fire burn itself out. The "Cold New Years" was a time that was long remembered, but of course, the present generation has grown up since then and knows very little about it.

The winter of 1872-73 was a very severe winter, too. I was stationed in the telegraph office here through that winter. The snow was very deep and it was very cold, and it was nothing strange for trains to be from 10 hours to two days late. Almost every station was filled with trains on the side tracks, either because they couldn't get out, or else they were held by the dispatchers on account of stalled trains ahead of them.

Thermometers Froze in 1874-75

That was a bad winter, but I think that the one that really took the cake and all the rest of the bakery, was the winter of 1874-75. All through the month of December it was very warm and pleasant, no snow on the ground, and it seemed like May.

I was living in Manistee then, but was home on a visit, and I started back the last day of December and it was very warm and pleasant when I left Decatur, but before dark it began to snow very hard. I got into Coldwater the next morning and the snow was nearly two feet deep then, and I don't believe that it stopped snowing a moment from that time until April, and many days the thermometer was frozen all day, so it must have been lower than 39 below zero.

The ice on Lake Michigan was a sight worth seeing—thrown up in great hills and ridges. It was said that the lake was frozen over solidly from shore to shore, and several steamers from Milwaukee were frozen in out in the lake for weeks. I think that was the worst winter I ever knew, because it lasted so long, and it was said to have been just as bad down here as it was up north. There was no railroad at Manistee then, and the first boat that reached us in the spring brought five hundred barrels of beer and five barrels of flour, and then they complained because they brought so much flour. (That's awful old but I am not to blame for it.)

The next winter that was peculiar in any way that I remember, was the winter of 1881-82, and that one went just as far the other way—it wasn't any winter at all. We never had any snow nor any cold weather at all through December, January and February, and no ice formed in those months thick enough to cut for use. On the 4th day of March we had a blizzard that lasted several days and that was the first and only cold and snow we had all that winter. Then ice formed about four inches thick, and that was the only ice we got for the icehouses that winter.

In January I worked out grubbing and clearing off a piece of new land, and when I would go out to work in the morning the top of the ground would be frozen just a little, but it would be all thawed by nine o'clock. It was beautiful spring weather all the winter through until after the first of March. It was "the wind tempered for the shorn lamb" that time surely for us, for I had just finished my house south of the tracks, and we had very little to buy wood with. We didn't use coal then—cost too much. I used to hitch up the old horse to the wagon, and my wife would drive while I picked up pieces of old stumps and roots and threw them into our motor truck, and take them to the house to be used for wood, for it was all that we had all winter long.

Express Train Stalled at Glenwood

Another very hard winter was in 1884-85. I was in the telegraph office again, and some times trains were tied up here all day long because they could not push through the drifts, or else some train ahead of them couldn't. The railroad sent work trains here and hired large gangs of men to shovel snow onto the flat cars so that it could be carried away and dumped into some hollow; and some of our side tracks were not cleaned out until it thawed in the spring. It was fearfully cold all the time.

All the spare time that I had I put in digging out paths through the snow, and at our front gate the top of the snow was higher than my head, and we almost went through a tunnel. Homer Hungerford used to help me and he was good at it, for he was younger and quicker than I was, but I was younger 32 years ago than I am now, and didn't mind it so much. That was the winter that an express train got stuck in the snow near Glenwood and had to stay there all day. The passengers pretty nearly ate Glenwood all up and then some of them had to go hungry.

There was another very large express train just behind that one and they had to stay here from eight o'clock in the morning until after 4 in the afternoon when they finally got the Glenwood train dug out, thereby releasing the train here. The conductor told me that there were over two hundred and fifty passengers on the train that was held here, and they made a large dent in Decatur's stock of eatables before they got away. Men went through the cars with market baskets filled with bottles containing drinkables, and they were snapped up like hot cakes. It seemed to me as though every passenger on that train must have sent not less than half a dozen messages that day, and you may be sure that I was some tired when I went off duty at night. That was quite awhile ago, too—32 years.

One winter—I am not sure about the year, but it was about 1896 or '97—we had a very cold spell, the coldest for many a year. In those days we had to go on duty Sunday mornings just as early as any other day. We had a train called the "Cannon Ball" going east, and every day but Sunday it would go through here sometime before daylight, but on Sunday mornings it was sure to be late and pass here anywhere between daylight and noon, and it was necessary for some one to be on duty until it had gone by, consequently I had to go to the office at the usual time to relieve the night operator. Well, on that awful cold morning I got up to light the fires, I went to the front door and glanced at the thermometer and it stood at 25 below zero. My sakes, but I almost had heart failure right there, and I made up my mind that if I ever got shut of the railroad that I would lie abed all day when it was as cold as that. But there was nothing for it only to get up and do the chores, get something to eat and then go to the office to stay all day likely.

There have been many hard winters during the past sixty years, and many of them have been very much worse than the present one; some of them have been much longer, and some of them have been a great deal colder. The lowest that I have heard of the thermometer going this winter has been 27 below, and that only in the middle of the night, while in other winters it has gone to 35 below and would not get above 25 all day long. We are always inclined to think that the present is either the worst or the best that ever happened, but it isn't, because the oldest inhabitants can always tell a bigger story than anyone else can.

History tells us that one hundred years ago—1816—there was no summer at all, and that it froze ice every month in the year. The crops were all killed in the northern states, and in many places the people were hard put to get enough to eat. There were no railroads or telegraphy at that time, and provisions could not be transported from one section of the country to another as quickly as they can now. That was called the "Year Without a Summer," and it was a time-mark for many a year afterward.

The oldest inhabitants used to tell us—they are all dead now—that in this vicinity the spring of 1832 was a very bad one. In what is now Van Buren county all of the inhabitants lived on and near Little Prairie Ronde, and that spring they had two severe frosts that killed all of two plantings of corn. They had no more seed corn to plant again and Dolphin Morris sent a man and a boy with a pack horse through the dense woods one hundred miles, to Fort Defiance, Ohio, to get seed corn. They made the trip successfully and returned Saturday evening with two bushels of seed corn. Although the next day was Sunday everyone turned out and planted that corn, and this time it grew and made a crop. That was all the corn that was raised in this county that year, but it kept many from starvation. There were no mills to grind grain then anywhere near here and they had to hollow out the top of a large stump, and pound the corn into a course meal with a wooden pestle. What would we think of living on that kind of bread?

LOOKING BACKWARD

TAKEN FROM THE FILES OF THE REPUBLICAN

36 YEARS AGO

January 10, 1907.

THE DEATH OF DR. ROSE

This is the issue that tells of the passing of our beloved Dr. Rose, which brought deep sorrow to the people of our village and surrounding country. Few men make as deep an impression on their fellow townsmen as did he. Now after 35 years his name stands out as one that will not be forgotten so long as Decatur itself is remembered.

There was such a demand for sketches of his life and work that several hundred extra copies were printed and they can probably be found in many Decatur homes today.

Dr. Gilbert L. Rose died Saturday, January 5, 1907, at 2:15 in the afternoon, at the age of 53.

His final illness was of brief duration. Monday he seemed to be in his usual health and did his usual hard day's work. Tuesday morning he was taken with a chill, but in response to a summons, drove to the home of his nephew, Carl Rose, six miles south into Volinia township.

That was the doctor's last drive. The little team which was known on every highway for 20 miles around, had carried its last succor and good cheer to the sick and dying. The voice of their noble master was forever still.

The doctor went home after this trip with a well developed case of the grip, which took a more serious turn and which the most expert of his fellow physicians could not check.

This beautiful tribute was written for the Republican by Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney, who is still practicing his profession in Chicago, and who also stands out as one of Decatur's finest citizens of the generations past:

IN MEMORY OF DR. ROSE

By Dr. Geo. W. Mahoney

Dr. Rose is dead, but he still lives in the hearts of all who knew him as the most noble, the most generous, the most charitable, the most beloved of all men. As we pause in silence and in grief and vainly try to look forward into the days that are to come, it seems impossible that we shall never see him again.

During the thirty-two years that he practiced medicine here he was the central figure of this community. There never was a public improvement of any kind that was not championed by and worked for by Dr. Rose. He gave freely of his time, busy though he was, and opened wide his purse for everything that was for the public good. He was a man of refined and cultured taste, a lover of art, and the beauties of nature always appealed strongly to him.

Among the many things that stand out boldly in the life of Dr. Rose is that there are many men today who owe their success in both commercial and professional life to the substantial assistance as well as the encouragement and advice of this noble benefactor. It was at his earnest solicitation that I took up the study of medicine. It was due to his generosity and unselfishness that I was enabled to begin the practice of my profession the day I returned from college.

Of all the men I ever knew he was the most loyal friend. He made a friend's cause his own, and such friendship is among the rarest of God's blessings to mankind. The tribute I hold within my heart is more than I can express.

He loved truth and honor, justice and honesty, things that were noble and good. There is no place in his heart for malice or envy, but kindness, helpfulness, friendship, love and charity made up his tender nature. His cheery way and light heartedness lifted his friends above the monotony of life's daily care.

We heard his name every day and hour. It was a household word in nearly every home. We knew he worked hard; we knew he drove all day and far into the night, and often arose again before the gray of morning appeared to respond to a call at the bedside of some sufferer. The night was never too dark or stormy, or the wind never so bleak or piercing as to keep him at home when he felt his patients needed him.

He was a great student of disease a skillful diagnostician, a good surgeon. He was the ideal family physician, and he was much more. He cheered the strong on to better and nobler things. He assisted the weak in their struggle with the world; his counsel and advice were sought every day and freely given on things in and outside of his profession, and his judgment was always good.

By his genial smile and happy ways he dropped a flower in the pathway every day of every one with whom he came in contact. We who knew him best loved him most. His very presence in the sickroom was like a sunbeam pushing aside the dark and lowering clouds. The touch of his soft and gentle hand always soothed the fevered brow and his words of cheer quieted the overworked heart of his suffering patients; and when the hand of death visited a home, his words of comfort always lessened the sting of the awful messenger and the smothering grief was less terrible to bear.

He was a friend when a friend was needed. He loved his home. He was a devoted husband and an ideal father. He loved his wife and children with a tenderness that knew no bounds, and he has left to his two manly sons the greatest heritage that a father can give, the heritage of an honored name.

He wanted to live to see his sons take their places in the world of affairs, and carry that name onward and upward.

There never was a physician or a man in all this section of the country that was counseled every day by more people, high and low, rich and poor, good and bad, than Dr. Rose, and we doubt if there ever will be. And to all he gave the greatest consideration. There never was a physician in all this section of the country who visited the bedside of the sick and suffering more often with no expectation of recompense or reward except the simple gratitude of the poor than Dr. Rose, and there never will be; and he was yet only in his prime, at the zenith of his usefulness.

Oh, that he could have lived! but he has gone. That familiar figure and genial face will be seen no more, but the name of Dr. Rose and his magnificent generosity, and the remembrance of his charity will be always with us, and will go out in widening waves for the good of all, and the world is and will be better that he has lived.

The shades are drawn and the office is dark for the first time in over thirty years. The medicine case has been closed and clasped for the last time. The fever thermometer has been laid aside, and the hand has been stilled. The pines seem to sigh more deeply, and the wind to moan more dolefully than ever before.

And as in speechless grief we saw all business life in Decatur stilled, and saw the throng of people gathered from all walks of life, from all sections, paying to this man with their silence and their sobs the greatest tribute that was ever paid to anyone in this section, we turn and say in resignation, as if he could hear us—Rest, rest, our beloved friend, rest. Rest from the awful heat of summer's sun and the driving rains you have faced so often. Rest from the piercing blasts and awful storms of winter. Rest from your long and tedious drives in the dark and cheerless nights while others slept. Rest! Rest! Rest!

A Girl's History of Ancient Volinia

Written by Mildred Hollenbeck and Reprinted from the Cassopolis National Democrat of August 9, 1923.

Mrs. Ida Swan has been sorting out her keepsakes and came across this history of Volinia written by Mildred Hollenbeck twenty years ago. Mildred was a school girl then, now she is married and away, but this history, for which she won a prize, is today no less interesting. Mrs. Swan rightly thought we would like to reprint it. It takes an old timer now to remember the Cassopolis National Democrat. It was published by Chris Allison, a kindly old soul but a radical old Democrat. At that he was no more radical than his Republican contemporary, the Vigilant, or other rock-ribbed Republican weeklies. In the days following the First World War the reaction against the Democratic party was so strong that many of its followers were compelled to take to the tall timbers, and the National Democrat was one of them. It folded up. We have forgotten the year of its demise but it could not have been long after the date on which this history was published, and we are truly glad the paper lived long enough to print it.)

Volinia Township

The following sketch of Volinia township and its founders was written by Miss Mildred Hollenbeck, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ted Hollenbeck, and was awarded the prize in the historical sketch contest suggested by Edmund Schoetzow, commissioner of schools:

The first settlement made in Volinia was made March 27, 1829, on section one by Samuel Morris, later the Elias Morris farm and now owned by Henry Gish. (Now in 1943 by Mr. and Mrs. Deron Paul.) 3 days later Jonathan Gard, Samuel Rich and Elijah Goble came, the former settling on what is known as Gard's prairie, the two latter on the west side of Little Prairie Ronde. They had come under the guidance of Squire Thompson of Pokagon, who came very near being Cass County's first settler. Jacob Morlan and Jacob Charles came the same season, and in 1830 Josephus Gard, William Tietsort, John Curry and Samuel and Alexander Fulton arrived. In 1831 Obed Bunker, who gave to Bunker lake its name, and John Shaw came, and in 1832 David Crane, James Newton, Levi Lawrence and Amos Huff.

The pioneers who made their journey thitherward were men of fearless character who came to improve their condition by making homes for themselves and their families. Samuel Morris traced his ancestry back to Scotland; Elijah Goble was a descendant of Holland-Dutch and the Gards were of mixed Dutch and Irish. The remaining few were mostly of Dutch descent. The lakes and streams abounded with fish and the forests were full of game. It was a beautiful country, so beautiful that Alexander Copley in recalling it as he first saw it in the thirties said there would never be another Michigan.

Indians Friendly

The first settlers found the lands occupied by Indians. Chief Weesaw had his village on the present site of the Newton schoolhouse. He was six feet tall, a dignified, fine looking Indian and friendly to the newcomers, dividing meat with them and giving no trouble. He had three wives, his favorite being a daughter of the tribal Chief Topinabee, who with other head chiefs signed the treaty at Chicago in 1831. When the Newtons cut their way through the dense forest to the site they selected for a home, and cut a place for a building site Weesaw was there, and gave them a welcome, although on land he was occupying.

A stage coach carrying mail and drawn by four to six horses passed through from Kalamazoo to Niles, and it took two days to make the trip. Those who received a letter had to pay the postage, the amount depending upon how far it had come. There was very little stock and crops were hauled to market; now many of the farmers drive their crops to market—they feed their crops to stock.

When a farmer had a field to clear, his neighbors came and helped him, and he in turn helped others. Barns were raised the same way, and the butchering was done that way, swine being shipped dressed, as there were no plants in the cities for handling live stock. The housewife made up the spring the year's supply of soap, stirring the boiling mass with a sassafras stick to give it the pleasant odor of that shrub. Ashes were stored in a barrel, and packed hard. Water coming through the ashes became the lye which changed the fats into soft soap, a necessary article in the home. Maple trees abounded everywhere, and maple sugar was always made in early spring. The Indian chief Weesaw made sugar every spring, or his squaws did. The women held quilting bees, sometimes selling quilts for benefit of the preacher, and all the news of the neighborhood was disseminated at these gatherings.

There were spelling matches and singing schools, and every community had its champion speller. Many young couples formed their first acquaintance at the singing school, and they were a fruitful source of matrimony later on. Then there were the husking bees, followed by a barn dance, and the one who found a red ear had to kiss the handsomest girl there.

The Education of the German Youth Under Hitler

By Mrs. Louis Loeser.

Foreword

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Loeser arrived in Decatur total strangers the first of January, 1941. They were out looking for a farm and chanced to see the sign "For Sale" on the Berchaney farm at the foot of Fifield hill. At once it seemed to them it was their farm, and they were not long in making the purchase.

They have entered into the life of the community and show in many ways their appreciation of being in America and their desire to be good representative citizens.

Knowing that they are intimately acquainted with life in Germany and the purposes of its Fuehrer, we asked Mrs. Loeser for a story of life under Hitler. She very kindly complied with the request, and every American who reads what she has written in this paper should have a greater appreciation of his great good fortune in being born a citizen of the United States.

At our further request she wrote this brief account of their coming to the United States:—

I left Germany with my husband in August, 1938, and arrived in the U. S. A. in September, 1938, after we visited with relations in France and in England.

I was born in Stuttgart, close to the Swiss border and lived there all my life except for 3 years when I learned and worked on different farms in our vicinity.

I left with my husband because of Anti-Jewish persecution, and because our lives were not safe anymore, and we didn't have any possibility of earning a living.

We had in our mind since the time the question of an emigration arose, that to the U. S. A. would be the only country we wished to go. Luckily American relations provided us with the necessary affidavits.

Since this time our both parents, friends and relations are scattered all over the world, except for my brother who is living in Boston with his family.

We didn't see our parents since the time we left Germany. Luckily my parents are in Switzerland waiting anxiously for the war coming to an end, so that they can join us over here, and we all can live a happier and more normal life.

We ourselves don't have any close relations in Germany. We too hope that towards the end of next year we will be able to get our citizenship papers, and this indeed will be then one of our happiest days we have known for a long, long time.

We love our new home country and everything that was seems to be like a black dream, from which we wake up and find ourselves in a world every human being longs for. The things that happened to us can never be forgotten and there never can be a reconciliation with the people who destroyed the vrey roots of our family and everything we hold dear.

Our greatest wish is now, to be able to show the people here, that we are worth their confidence in giving us a new chance for a life that can be so wonderful if one just takes the chance one is given in a country like the U. S. A. We are thankful for that chance and therefore put our whole strength in our work, that it might help to win this war.

The Education of the German Youth Under Hitler

The following will be pretty hard to understand for everybody who loves freedom and all what goes with it. It is hard for me to understand that things like Hitler is preaching for, ever could be made so true, that it frightens every human being, especially now, since I learned the truth of a great country and its principles. It makes it a little easier because I have the knowledge and the faith, that life can be different, if we the people, want it so.

This is the greatest difference between the people of the United States and the people of Europe. It was even before Hitler or Mussolini ever were known. Naturally not as drastic as it is now. Nevertheless there never is another country that has a government: by the people, for the people and to the people. So whatever I tell you, this fact has to be considered.

The Hitler Youth

Nowadays you read so many articles about the German youth, or better known as the Hitler youth. Things you shudder about, things you can't believe or don't want to believe because they are so utterly against humanity. And still I lived through it, I know the things you hear are true, because they happened all around me, until I finally had the luck to come over here. Now I try to forget what was and I am eager to learn from this country, and I pray that some day the whole world acknowledges what wonderful rules and principles the people of the United States are living for.

You see over there when a baby is born, his or her life is already fully lined out and it has to live up to it. Just as much as it is the duty for each mother, if rich or poor, and no matter how young or how old, just so that they can have children, they have to have them. This is the first rule each woman has to live up to, if she wants to be a good citizen and the pride of her fatherland.

These mothers have all the privileges a government can give to its people. They have the knowledge that whatever happens to their husbands, if they have any, or to themselves, there always will be a welcome room for their babies. They get all the food and clothing they need, and they don't have to worry where the money comes from for their keep, and they know that the children get all the proper training the government asks for.

The Baby Belongs to Government

The baby really belongs to the parents only until it is big enough to go to "Kindergarten". This is the only time the parents can truly say: our baby belongs to us. After it starts to kindergarden, the government already takes slowly over, increasing it year by year. Since all the teachers and nurses have to go through a very strict and tough training and schooling, it affects the children as soon as they are old enough to understand some things and can be trained.

You see all colleges and everything that has to do with education are under government control, and therefore only the best Nazis are selected to be teachers. They have to prove through many things that they are truly Nazis and faithful followers of Hitler, and only such people are allowed to teach and educate the precious Hitler youth. Once the children are under the control of teachers the parents have practically no control over their children, except if they are by heart true Nazis. The teachers are always right, no matter how you think about it, the children always have to do what the teachers say, and if you tell them different, you face a concentration camp.

As children are, they might go to their teachers and say: My mother thinks different. A few days later a secret police man comes to your home and gives you a harsh warning and tells you that you have to leave the education up to the government, who knows what's best anyway. If it should happen again, they tell you that you aren't fit to raise the children, and therefore they are forced to take them to a better place, where they can be educated to be true German men and women. Well, this would be the last you would have seen of your children, if you weren't wise enough to keep your mouth shut. And that is what most parents do, because they would rather take up with everything, than lose their children.

After kindergarden they enter grade school at 6 years. They go to grade school for 4 years and enter then the secondary school that ends after 6 years with a diploma, that opens to most any profession except the ones you need college like for doctors, lawyers a. s. o. If one wants to go to college, he goes to high school for 3 more years and then can enter any college. During the time in college he or she has to give part of the vacation to serve on a farm.

It even went so far, that each boy or girl had to serve 1 year in the country on a farm before ever being able to get any job. And that applies to everybody. After that the boys have to serve 2 years in the army before ever being able to learn any kind of a job or profession. You can figure out yourself how old a German boy must be, before he ever can think of having a real job and earn his living independent and start a family.

The Fuehrer Knows Everything

But going back once more I want to show you how the government places her hand over the entire German youth. As I told you the children go to school with 6 years of age. That's when they get their first uniform. They belong indirectly to the Hitler youth, they get some training like marching and playing with toy guns, they learn already that they are much better than any other children and that when they grow up, there will be only Germans to rule the world, and therefore they have to be proud and live up to whatever the Fuehrer tells them to do. The Fuehrer knows everything and wants only the best for them, and they should never forget, that they are all his children as long as they are good and obey.

When they are 10 years old they enter formally the Hitler youth, where they get real training by now, like long marches in any kind of weather, with or without heavy packs. They learn to shoot and swim and all the different kind of exercises to harden and steel their bodies. They learn about the German race that is prior to any other race, and it just happens that they have to tolerate some other races. But those races like the Jews, Polish, Russians a. s. o. are not wanted and that the Fuehrer will get rid of them. That all the other people left have is to obey the Fuehrer, if they want to go on living with them.

Hitler Is Their God

They learn that there is only one religion, and that the Fuehrer is their God and they believe only in him, because he knows everything and a voice is talking to him once in a while that gives him a sign which way to go.

This religious question was one of the hardest things for Hitler. You see on the one side there is by name a Catholic and a Protestant church in Germany, but they can't use the old testament. Hitler denounces Jesus too, since he says he has Jewish parents. He can't believe in the 10 commandments otherwise all his ideas would be lies. So what is there really left? That is the time when you read about so many priests and nuns being in the concentration camps. These were courageous people, who tried to save their own people even if it cost them their own lives, just to tell them the truth. But it was in vain. They had to preach Hitler's way, if only to give their people a church to go to.

The children learn too that there are girls, and the girls that there are boys. And that it is their duty to be together, and that the Fuehrer wants more and more children, because the German race will spread and spread over the whole world. They learn that they should follow their natural instinct and be not afraid what might happen, because the Fuehrer never lets a faithful follower down.

The children don't learn anything about other countries and their way of living except to mention how ridiculous other people are, and how fortunate they themselves are to live in such a great nation and be able to be a part of it.

Two Groups

The Hitler youth is divided into two groups, the HJ for the boys and the BDM for the girls. The Hitler youth has the children until they are 16 years old. During this time the leaders study the different children and determine to which further branch they will be useful. If they should become a SA Fuehrer or if they show special abilities they enter the SS, the elite group around Hitler or in some other group, where they can be most useful.

If they ever should join the SS, they will be placed in a Fuehrer-school and from there on there is only one goal to live for—to give everything to the Fuehrer and the Fatherland. There will be no private life or any kind of secrets. They dedicate their lives to the Fuehrer. On the other hand they always will be provided with things they need. They don't have to worry what will become of them.

The other children join what you call here the CCC. This is the year where boys and girls work on the farms. They don't get any wages, just room and board. In some instances they live in camps nearby some villages and just go for the day to the farmers, in other cases they live right on the farm. Boys and girls camps are separated, but close enough for exchange visits. After this year is over the boys go to the army and girls prepare for a profession or marry.

Women Not to Work

Until the war broke out, no German married woman was allowed to have any kind of a job. First it was the rule that the German woman's task is to be a mother and a mother can't have a job without neglecting her family, and besides that she is the symbol of the true German family and therefore it would be impossible for her to go to work.

But besides this noble reason there was a far more practical one. When Hitler took over the power 10 years ago, he had over 12 million unemployed people on his hands and he promised his people that within 3 years there would be not one man without a job. Well he put as many men as possible in the CCC, SA and the army, but still he had some over. That's when he became so considerate and generous to tell the German women, that they don't have to work and that their duty is to stay at home and raise a fine family.

Become Fanatics

When the boys come out of the army, they start whatever kind of profession they would like to have. By then they are between 20 and 22 years of age. What is the result of such a one sided education? These boys and girls are as fanatic as one can think of. You can't reason with them, because they know only one thing and that is what Hitler teaches. You can't show them how happy other people in other countries are, because they sneer at everything that doesn't stand for Hitler or Germany, and so strong is their faith in all that, that we who know these kids are afraid now that they will never change. And we are seriously afraid that this question will be a very very difficult problem after Germany is defeated.

If you take especially children from the age of 10 to 15 years old, they are by now between 20 and 25 years old, they make the mass of the German people. There is hardly any way to deal with them on a sensible basis, because they know nothing else, and it is so preached into them, that they are just beyond in believing something new. All they know is how to hate, how to kill, how to be brutal and take whatever they want and is good for the German Reich.

They don't know anything about justice, liberty, decency and religion. They read only controlled books, they listen to the controlled radio and read the censored newspapers. They see only German movies, they dress the German way and dance the German way, they stand for hours in the sun or rain just to cheer their Fuehrer and that is what they call fun or duty, just whatever you might call it.

This Hitler youth is the greatest problem, and before we can break their fanatic faith and spirit, there will be hardly any durable peace, because we have to keep in mind, that these will be the people we have to deal with in the future after Germany is defeated, and may God help us all, that it will be very soon.

Mrs. Louis Loeser.

LOCAL HISTORY

Arba N. Moulton made a noteworthy contribution to published history of Michigan in the publication in the Decatur Republican of a series of articles, "Early Pioneers of Van Buren County." The articles were written 50 years ago by David Woodman, one of the pioneers of Decatur and Paw Paw townships and the manuscript was copied last winter by his daughter and printed in 18 installments in the Republican. Mr. Moulton observed: "We predict that some time they will be made into book form and become a part of the standard history of Michigan which is yet to be published."

The Civil war diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon is now being published in serial form by the Republican.—Gene Alleman, Editor Michigan Publisher, Official publication of the Michigan Press Association.

The above story was read by Larry Towe, director of the University of Michigan news service and brought a letter from him in which he said:

"I called the attention of Randolph Adams, who is curator of the Clements Library, to the article. He fairly bounced. That is exactly the type of material which both he and the Michigan Historical Collections here are seeking."

We have no extra files of the Republican from which all of the numbers can be supplied, but a way may be found to obtain them for the University.

As out of a clear sky the problem of how to present to the University the series of pioneer stories written by David Woodman fifty years ago and prepared for publication in the Republican by his daughter, Mrs. C. D. Richmond of Tampa, Florida, has been answered. Monday morning we received from Miss Laura Morris of Hartford this letter:

Hartford, Mich.

Mr. Moulton, Friend,

I noticed in one of the Republicans that some reader wished the articles that were written by Mr. David Woodman about the Pioneers of Van Buren county.

I think I have them all as they were printed along. As I cannot use them and someone cares for them, I think this is the best I can do with them. Not any of my own care for them. Many have not cared enough about them to save them, but after a while I think they will wish they had.

Take the Civil War diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon of Hamilton. I think my father knew him. I have all to July 16, 1861. I do not feel as if I need any thanks for these clippings. I have enjoyed reading them and I hope they will be of use to some one.

I have enjoyed your paper, especially about the Boys in the Service. My eyesight is poor, but I manage to read about the boys.

Sincerely,

Laura Morris.

Miss Morris's grandfather, Dolphin Morris, was the first settler of Van Buren county, and she was born in Volina township, Cass county, some 90 years ago.

We shall offer the clippings to the Historical Collections of the University with the compliments of Miss Morris.

The Civil War Diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon

Of Company E, Second Michigan Infantry.

FIRST INSTALLMENT

(Charles B. Haydon of Kalamazoo was made Second Lieutenant of the Second Michigan Infantry September 22, 1861; First Lieutenant, January, 1862; Captain, September 1, 1862. Wounded in action at Jackson, Miss., July 11, 1863; made Lieutnant Colonel July 30, 1863. Died at Cincinnati, Ohio, March 14, 1864, at the age of 30 years. This fine record was found in "Michigan in the War.")

April 30th, 1861

Left Kalamazoo in K. L. G. for Detroit to join the 2nd regiment Michigan Volunteers. At Merengo we threw off James McEvoy for drunkeness and insubordination.

We left Kalamazoo at 11 a. m. and got nothing to eat on the road because the boys (principally the Battle Creek Company) stole everything movable at some of the first stations. This was telegraphed in advance and all the groceries were closed against us on the rest of the road. They cleared out several groceries entirely and their officers seemed to make no effort to restrain them.

We arrived at Detroit about sundown and at the quarters about an hour after in the midst of a heavy wind and rain. Most of us were wet through. We were marched into what was once Floral Hall or more properly, shed. The mud was about two inches deep in the shed which was open at both ends. Some loose boards were all there was to keep us out of the mud.

At 9 o'clock we got a very fair supper of bread, butter, beef and tea. About 11 p. m. we got the men's quarters changed to neighboring barns where they were much more comfortable. Lieutenant Dake, Sgt. Ford and self, by the kindness of a citizen, were taken to good quarters in his own house. I never appreciated a good bed more than I did after the prospect of sleeping in the mud and wind of the shed.

While we were lodged in the shed one of the boys declared that he would never complain again when his mother did not make his bed right. We need a little hardship sometimes to make us appreciate our blessings.

May 1st, 1861

Came in with a smart snow squall which continued from time to time during the day. We did very little except to fit up our quarters with berths and straw beds. We are thickly stowed in, one above another but the quarters are warm and reasonably comfortable.

May 2nd, 1861

Weather very fine—the men still working on their quarters when off duty. The regular camp orders are given: we have to rise at 5 and drill 1 hour, then wash—breakfast. All lights are out at 9 p. m. The men are writing letters, playing cards and lounging in the sun. There was much complaint this morning about hard times and poor board. Several wanted to leave, but I believe none went.

We got part of our arms today and I bought a knife large enough to chop wood with. We had battalion drill in the afternoon. I was pleased to see Capt. Chas. May of Co. K, and Prosecuting Atty. of our county, Kalamazoo. He knew nothing about the drill and was compelled to trot up and down through the mud for two hours in great heat, vexation and confusion. His boots, at first nicely polished, soon after were loaded with as much as 15 pounds of clay mud each. I have seldom seen a man more blowed and he swore most prodigiously which I have never heard him do before. There was a German Capt. in the other Company of his Division with a most ferocious mustache who roared out to him from time to time in a manner which fairly lifted him off his feet.

May 3rd, 1861

Serg. F. and self quartered with the men last night. We had a straw bed and each a blanket and a shawl so that we were warm enough and I slept well, but F. complains considerably. Nearly all of the men have bad colds and 3 are sick.

The duties of the day commenced at 5 by washing at the pump. The day, like the latter part of yesterday, is cold and disagreeable with fair prospect of another storm which would make the parade grounds impassable.

I acted as second Sgt. this P. M. and was sharply berated by the Colonel for not knowing my business. I very soon learned it, however, and shall not be caught again on that point.

We are becoming more accustomed to camp life. Still there is some grumbling among the men. Those who are living better now than they ever lived before grumble most in many cases. Such are always first to complain when they are away from home.

May 4th, 1861

We had today the first fine day of camp life. The weather was really comfortable. We could lounge in the sun. I could laugh as heartily today to hear the Colonel blow up others as they did yesterday at my berating. I had the satisfaction of seeing Lieut. Dake on the full run several times—a rare sight. The Captain did not fare much better.

May 5th, Sunday, 1861

Corp Ball and self went up to Ft. Wayne after breakfast to see how the other regiment was faring. We had a fine ride up and back on a steamboat and saw the fort and men. We returned to a late dinner.

At 3 p.m. we mustered 18 men in our Company to march to religious service. We marched before breakfast for one hour, and after church we drilled two hours. They were busily drilling at the fort.

May 6th, 1861

Some rain last night; weather fair this morning. If the men pursue the enemy as vigorously as they do the women they would make very efficient soldiers. A smart rain.

We were today examined and took the oath of allegiance to the state. The examination was not rigid and none were rejected on account of physical incapacity. About a dozen spare men had to be thrown out and will very reluctantly (most of them) go. Some will return home and others will enter other companies of this regiment to supply the places of those who have been thrown out or have deserted.

Many enlisted hastily and from some companies, especially the Adrian guards, desertions have been frequent Till today the stay of all was merely voluntary—henceforth it will be compulsory.

An opportunity was given before taking oath by our Company for any who desired to withdraw. Only one went and he (Dennis Stockwell) among abundant groans and hisses from the Company. He returned before the oath and would have come in again if he had been permitted.

Camp life is not much different from what I expected—card playing, profanity and the stealing of provisions are among the most noted characteristics outside of the duties. There are four Companies of us quartered together,—2 from Kalamazoo, the East Saginaw Guards, and Constantine Union Guards.

I noticed at one time this p.m. 15 four-hand games of euchre going on at the same time. No gambling is allowed in camp and strong measures are taken to prevent stealing.

I have not as yet regretted that I enlisted. I went from a sense of duty and I expect that to sustain me in the hardships which I may be called to endure. Only one thing troubles me seriously—that is to get up at 5 a.m. and drill at double quick time before breakfast.

Second Installment

May 7th, 1861.

Rain a. m. light. I have been on the go pretty briskly for two days acting as sec. and sometimes as first sergeant, owing to the sickness or absence of the other. The battalion drill makes busy work for a new guide and for one who is the only file closer for a large part of the time. The rascals steal everything they can put their hands on. Stole Ford's shawl (an important part of our bed clothes) today.

It is reported that we cannot go into service unless we enlist for three years or during the war. I should very much dislike three years and I also very much dislike to return without doing anything. If it was not for business I would not hesitate for a moment. After all we can do little while the war continues and we should do all we can to aid the vigorous measures which the administration is taking.

May 8th, 1861.

I am today Sergeant of the Guard and I find it dull business. It will probably be duller yet before 10 a. m. tomorrow. We are out in all about 26 hours—2 hours on and 4 off. This is the first time I have been on.

There is something exceedingly solitary in the looks of a sentinel pacing slowly up and down in the stillness of the night. The weather is fine and we shall have a good night. The morals of camp life are bad and manners likewise. It is doubtful whether the effect which war has upon the morals of a people is not more to be regretted than its more ostensible evils. I believe I have kept on as usual.

This open air will be good for me, I think. It seems like old times to be out doors all day.

May 9th, 1861.

Morning watch 6 a. m. We passed the night, which was a good one, in comparative quiet. The Corporal's Guard was called for but twice during my watches. The first time my Corporal, a very worthy German, ran without the countersign and was himself arrested and sent to the guard house. I laughed heartily at the joke on the Corporal.

I slept well about three hours. My head aches a little and I feel dull and tired this morning. This standing guard is the most tiresome service I have. I believe I would rather march all the time. We were finally relieved at 11 a. m. after about 27 hours of duty. I have not felt quite as usual today. I have a sour stomach and a tendency toward a looseness of the bowels. I do nothing for it save to stop eating.

May 10th, 1861

It rains hard this morning and I am not sorry, I can assure you, on any account save the condition of the grounds. I feel better this morning but am not entirely well. Nearly all of the men have diarrhea and several are in the hospital quite sick. This is caused by the indiscretion of the men and by the quality of the food.

Our victuals are cooked and served out by a contractor at one of the fair buildings. The quantity is ample and the quality before cooking is good enough. There is a good deal of dirt mixed with it when we get it and some of it comes in very bad shape. The butter is bad and I eat very little of it. We have soup for dinner, made, I presume from the fragments of breakfast. I think this soup is one of the principal causes of sickness. The potatoes are of poor quality. The bread, thank God, is good. We have in addition fresh and salt beef and pork. The provisions would be ample if well served. We have also tea, coffee, sugar and sometimes milk.

It is certain that this regiment will not be ready for three months. We must enlist for 3 years or during the war unless sooner discharged. I have not yet positively decided to do that. The Company will stand about half and half. If I had poorer prospects at home or a better place here I would not hesitate. Our grounds will be all afloat by night. I wish the state could find dry land enough for us to camp. I would rather sleep in the open air, than be quartered in the mud. I fear we shall all be sick when warm weather comes. The boys behaved rather badly in some cases yesterday. The guardhouse was pretty well filled and one came near being flogged.

May 11th, 1861.

It rained nearly all day yesterday and we had no drill except a private one for a few who saw fit to take part in it. I went to town once and spent the balance of the day in studying Hardee, etc. This noon is fine but the grounds are very bad. We have drilled but little today owing to the state of the grounds.

There is a good deal of reluctance to enlist for the war or three years. There are all manner of doubts and excuses raised. I can not wonder very much at it—a step which involves the possibility of three years in the army is a pretty serious one for most men. I have pretty much decided to go. It seems to me that I cannot honorably do otherwise. I should very much dislike to return to Kalamazoo at this juncture of affairs.

There is a general laxity of discipline in the camp, partly because of two days of idleness and partly because many of the men expect soon to be discharged and having no prospect of fighting before them, care very little whether they do anything or not.

There was some disturbance last night at the other building. Several were sent to the guard house and pistols were freely drawn but none fired. A new made acquaintance of mine, a Sergeant of the Hudson Guards, is on trial by a court-martial today in consequence. We have no uniforms yet and shall soon be a very ragged regiment if we do not get them.

Sixth Installment

June 1, 1861.

Ignorant Officers

I went to the party last night and enjoyed myself pretty well although I was tired and partly sick. We got back to camp about 1 a. m. I gave half a dollar to get off guard yesterday and I would have given double the amount to have laid abed this morning.

I bought the Atlantic last night and read two articles. I will keep up with that if possible. It keeps me pretty busy to tend to duties and write what letters are necessary and study tactics some time each day.

We are greatly in need of well drilled officers. If I had joined the Kalaazoo L. G. when I thought of it I should have done much better. I believe I begin to know my business, but I had too much to learn and was sometimes taken off my guard.

It is amusing and at the same time painful to me to see our Captain at battalion drill. He seems to think we ought to come to our place without orders for the most part. "Boys, why in h——l don't you come out. You know where to go just as well as I. Don't wait to be told every time."

This is the way he often speaks and we come out and are, strictly speaking, liable to be sent to the guard house or served still worse every time we do it.

Col. Richardson, Lt. Col. Chipman, Captains Dillman and Bretschneider, (both Germans) of Companys A and E and our first lieutenant (Handy) are about the only well drilled officers in the regiment. Lieut. Handy is one of the best. If he were in the Captain's place it would be no great loss to the Company.

Captain Chas. May was officer of the day today and as usual made very vigorous efforts to clear the camp of lewd women, and with about the usual success.

We had this afternoon a very lively drill and did the best work we have ever done. I acted as left guide as usual and was on the run the greater part of the time for 3 hours. The weather was very warm and the sweat fairly poured off me. We did no firing for want of cartridges. We were constantly on the move mainly on the march in column by companies and by divisions, deploying columns by divisions, changing direction by flank and front, forward and rear, with some forming of squares, and charging.

Colonel Richardson seemed well pleased. He did very little scolding and I saw him smiling several times.

June 2, 1861.

Sham Sickness

Sunday. I have to stay here today with the men and let the other boys go to town. I must try and march the men to church I suppose. It is dull business. Last Sunday, when aided by the first lieutenant I succeeded in marching out 2 men—new recruits who had not yet learned the ways of camp.

There is an alarming amount of sickness in camp, if the men are to be believed at roll call. It is strange how few get to the hospital. We can muster near a 100 men at dinner, but 50 is a large yield for drill. No man ever saw the beats of the bandaged heads and arms, the limping legs, bent backs, wry faces and contortions and distortions which present themselves at morning roll call.

This dodge is getting so threadbare that good soldiers sometimes suffer much pain and inconvenience rather than incur the suspicion of shirking duty.

June 3, 1861.

The Strict Germans

A very quiet day. Battalion drill dull. I wish our first lieutenant had the captain's post. There is some prospect that we shall leave soon.

June 4, 1861.

Since breakfast has been a very rainy day. Benson L. Serg had an altercation with Captain Bretschneider this noon and is under arrest in consequence. Our sergeant was undoubtedly wrong in a military view. The old German officer however needs to learn that there is a wide difference between German and American soldiers. He is a good officer, in many respects one of the best in the regiment, but holds to military rules more strictly than we are as yet accustomed to do.

The company was today divided into squads of 10 privates each and one squad assigned to each corporal for messing and camp duties. Each sergeant except the first, has the general supervision of 2 corporals and their squads. G. H. Ball and M. H. Card, two of the best corporals in the company fall to me. We three have to look after the provision, clothing, washing, equipment, and in short all the wants of the men.

June 5, 1861.

Off For Washington

Just after supper last night orders came to have all our things packed and be in readiness for moving within three hours. Soon after we were informed that we were to march for Washington today. We shall not probably be able to do so. It will take one day longer to get ready.

This is what we have been wishing for and all are glad the order has come. Yet the hour of departure brings with it some sober reflections I will not stop to record them. Any one can guess what they are—home, friends, dangers and hardships to be met, ties and associations broken—and that peculiar feeling which always attends going away.

It is well described by Byron and I shall not try to better his description. He says on leaving the most unpleasant places one looks back occasionally at the steeple. I found it so even when I left Cantonment Blair. I am sure I have not less affection for the good old steamboat Mississippi—the gravelly yard and dry hot ditches of Fort Wayne, or the good people of the pleasant city of Detroit, by most of whom we have been well used and by some with the utmost kindness and hospitality. This has been a busy day. We have been distributing equipment all day. We leave tomorrow at 3 p. m., going by way of Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Baltimore to Washington.

June 6, 1861.

A Hard Trip

Up in the morning early, all my personal effects packed and rolled up in a blanket and slung over my shoulder. These cursed bundles are the greatest drawback on soldiering. They are a worse burden than Christian's was. We had dress parade at 9 a. m. and at 12 noon, they are loading the company baggage on board the propeller Missouri. We are to carry rations for three days, cooked. We had an early dinner and about half past one all embarked on board the Prop. Missouri—more than 1000 in number—which was crowded with 500, and proceeded to the M. C. R. R. dock. There we landed, formed and stood out in the hottest sun I ever saw without shelter for an hour and a half. It was enough to scorch one's ears off, in as much as we had nothing on our heads but little Sardinian caps, not larger than a ladies bonnet. We then marched up to Fort Street, then up Fort Street to Woodward avenue, then up Woodward Avenue a ways, then back to the Russell House. Then we closed in mass, then changed direction by the left flank, then deployed columns, then wheeled by platoons into right column, then marched to Jefferson avenue, up Jefferson two miles, then back to Woodward, a part of the way at double quick, then back to the dock. Another half of an hour during all this time we had heavy bundles on our back which we were carrying for the first time.

I was ready to throw mine down it hurt and pulled so on my shoulders in addition to the weight.

Many of the men could scarce keep their places in the ranks. It was perhaps a good show for others but it was rather tough on us. About 7 p. m. we were stowed (five companies) on board the Missouri. There was a great desire on the part of the boys to shake hands with everybody and bid them goodbye, and the desire on the part of others was equally great. We shook hands with hundreds of persons whom we never saw before. The waiter on the boat cried lustily when we went. We left it in charge of its four watchmen, and of them only. The grass will again have a good opportunity to grow in the yard of Fort Wayne, the most solitary place about Detroit.

The ladies of Detroit and everywhere else have done well by us from the day we started till the present. The men have done well but they have done still better. I have known cases in our own company where the lowest of the sex walked two miles a day and back to bring refreshments to their new found favorites and I know that it was not done for money, for the boys were destitute of it. We obtained, or at least I and several others did, enough good provisions for supper without resorting to rations. We left about 7 p. m. and were soon after followed by the other 5 companies on the Steamer Ocean. We passed the old Mississippi. Two men were standing on the bow who cheered us on our way. The night was pleasant with a brisk breeze.

Seventh Installment

June 7, 1861.

We Stop at Cleveland

I passed rather a poor night. We slept on the bare deck and were very much crowded. I slept 4 or 5 hours but feel rather sleepy today. The wind was fresh enough this noon to make the boat pitch considerable and a good many men are sick. I was not sick but I am sure I was not far from it. I was up at daylight and saw the sunrise for the first time in my recollection when out of sight of land. A dense fog came on soon after sunrise and in consequence we were delayed two hours and arrived at Cleveland about 10. We took rations for the day this morning. I had biscuits and a chunk of cold salt boiled beef for each man. Each had a good cup of warm coffee at Cleveland which refreshed us very much, and nearly all of us obtained more or less provisions. I am not going to eat salt beef and hard bread when I can buy or otherwise obtain better eatables. I saw very little of Cleveland. It was busy and dirty so far as I saw. It is said to be a handsome place.

Hurrah For Michigan!

We here take cars (28 in number) on the Cleveland and Pittsburgh R. R. There are two trains where the road is crooked and one train with two engines where it is straight. There is a sentinel at each door and no one is allowed to leave the cars. The men would lose themselves and everything they have if they could get out. One has already lost his rammer, another his gun, four or five their caps. Our journey through Ohio was a glorious one. Every hat and handkerchief, apron and bonnet along the road was thrown into the air. All manner of shouts and cheers of encouragement—hurrah for Michigan, hurrah for the Union, God bless you, farewell, give 'em h——l, etc.—greeted us at every stop. All the little toils of war were forgotten at once. I observed one thing in particular—to wit: that there are an immense number of pretty women in Ohio. Some of the handsomest I ever saw. Two places in particular are to be remembered. Hudson on the Western; Rasine, 40 or 50 miles I think from Cleveland, perhaps not so far. We were there received by the firing of cannon, music, etc. They furthermore brought provisions of all kinds—bread, biscuits and butter, rich cakes, cheese, dried meat, apples and so forth by the basket and apron full and pails of water cold as ice, and milk in abundance—all gratis, with smiles and blushes in abundance besides.

The place is small, not as large as Kalamazoo I think. It is the site of the Western Reserve College and seems, so far as could be seen, to be a place of great beauty. The other place is Wellsville, a small village on the Ohio river at the foot of the Alleghaney mountains. There is just room enough between the river and mountains for the railroad and one handsome street which constitutes the whole village. It is a place of great beauty and unsurpassed in hospitality. May the prosperity and happiness of both places be ever equal to the generosity of the inhabitants. I shall long remember them.

A Fancy Regiment

Our whole reception was such as only the soldiers of liberty and civilization receive. The whole country where we pass is in a blaze of patriotism. We passed along the borders of Virginia, but as the Stars and Stripes were flying and the people cheered us lustily we perceived little change. It was eleven p. m. when we arrived at Pittsburgh. We changed cars here and stood in the streets 2 hours waiting for coffee and change of cars. The first 7 companies got the coffee—they were piggish and the 300 gallons of coffee provided all disappeared before our turn came.

We left at 1 a. m. and I slept till four. About 9 a. m. we arrived at Altoona where the last companies drank all the coffee desired and the others waited. We bought some provisions and I made out a good breakfast of gingerbread and coffee. At about one p. m. we arrived at Harrisburgh and marched to camp Curtin just out of the city. 4500 Pennsylvania troops were quartered there. They were without uniform and very ragged and dirty, and many of them barefooted. They looked far worse than we ever did at Cantonment Blair. Indeed we are called a fancy regiment—said to be the best looking and best equipped of any that have passed this way. We are no better equipped however than our first regiment Both receive the highest praise for appearance. Michigan is doing nobly. I hope our acts will tell as well as our appearance.

We pitched our tents on the fair ground and were glad to throw ourselves on the ground and get a little rest. We got coffee, hard biscuits and salt beef and took dinner and supper both at once. I bought a cup of milk which with a hard biscuit served me. We had so much to do that it was after 10 when we rolled into blankets.

June 9, 1861.

Guns Loaded and Bayonets Fixed

We were up at 4:00 a. m. to make preparation for a Sunday journey to Washington via Baltimore. The day is beautiful but very warm. We are loaded with all sorts of arms and munitions. We begin to realize that we are approaching the enemies country. Ten rounds of ball cartridges were issued to each man. I distributed and took the precaution to put 20 rounds into my box.

Orders are given how and where to form in case of an attack which is expected at Baltimore. We shall enter the city with loaded guns and fixed bayonets. I do not believe there is any danger but am fully prepared.

We have orders to abstain from eating or drinking anything except what we bring with us after we cross the Maryland line. This is to guard against poison. We had coffee, bread and fresh beef for breakfast.

Marched to the railroad soon after 8:15. This journal is written on the cars a few miles out, just on the bank of the Susquehanna. We are taking in water from a fine spring for the balance of the journey.

If this journal should come to a sudden termination on this fine Sunday afternoon in the streets of Baltimore the finder will please notify Philotus Haydon of Decatur, Michigan, as soon as convenient and greatly oblige.

Charles B. Haydon.

Union Flags Fly In Maryland

One man of Co. K when we were passing through Ohio climbed on top of the cars contrary to express orders of his officers and bumped his head against a bridge. If we had been going faster, he would have been killed. Perhaps he will die as it is.

We have not yet got to Maryland. The cars run so slow a part of the time that the men walk by the side. I am getting duced hungry and with little prospect of anything to eat.

After crossing the Maryland line we saw very little to indicate the change save picket guards of U. S. troops at all bridges, embankments and curves. We see abundance of places where bridges have been burned and the track torn up, but all is now in temporary running order.

Union flags are even more abundant than in the free states and every one greets us with cheers of apparent welcome.

Fifteen miles from the city we halt, get out of the cars and load our guns. I ram down the first ball that I ever intend for a human mark. Cheers for the Union continue unabated. The scenery is beautiful. Many of the residences are the finest I ever saw. Picket guards in large numbers.

Arriving In Baltimore.

We arrive at the city and by the time we are formed it is quite dusk. We have strict orders not to cheer or speak to anyone unless it be to answer civil questions in as few words as possible.

We have two miles to march. The streets are densely crowded on both sides. The children and ladies cheer in great numbers for the union and several wave flags. The men are much more careful what they do.

Cheers for Jeff Davis are heard occasionally from groups of 3 or 4. With very few exceptions we march in perfect silence and in excellent order. There is now and then an insulting remark or threat but considering the crowd their number was very few.

A very pretty girl offered me a bouquet but I declined to step beyond the line to receive it, so she threw it to me and I thanked her and went on. I presumed at first that it was a ruse to decoy me beyond the line and in reach of the men who were standing around but I guess it was not.

One or two attempts were made to trip our men marching on the flanks, but without success. In other cases they took pains to remove obstructions from our way. We pass over the way pursued by the map —— and saw the place where those who were killed fell.

We arrive at the cars and halt without molestation. Many persons crowd around us to ask questions and many to congratulate. Appearances deceive or the Union feeling is strangely predominant.

A Shot for a Stone

Just as we were getting on the cars a man threw a heavy stone striking the first sergeant of the Niles company on the leg, hurting him considerably. He instantly fired and the man fell.

We got into the cars between 9:00 and 10 p. m., unfixed bayonets and unslung our knapsacks and prepared to rest a little.

Just as we were settled into our seats an order was sent through the train to put on our knapsacks and fix bayonets as quietly and quickly as possible which is done at once. We then proceeded quietly and very slowly, the picket guard exploring the way at dangerous points. About 12 there were a few shots fired close by us and men came running past.

We were instantly on the alert. It proved to be a collision between the pickets and the enemy.

Reports are various. Some say that two or three were killed. I think no one fell. We are very tired and hungry and it is almost impossible to keep awake.

I think we could have given the Secessionists a good one if we could have got at them, and I am sure they might have troubled us badly if they had managed properly. Latest reports say that the pickets killed 6 men last night who were advancing to attack us.

I would have disliked to fire in the streets on accout of the women and children. Col. Richardson was laughing in his sleeve all the time after they began to talk about fighting.

June 10, 1861.
At the National Capital

The man who was shot at Baltimore last night has since died. There is skirmishing going on all the time. The city is alive with troops. 85,000 are camped in the vicinity and several thousands are arriving daily.

The heat is intense. Several men have fallen down with sunstrokes. I care very little about marching in hot weather if it were not for my knapsack. I, however, begin to get along with that better than at first.

I visited the Capitol this noon and went all through. I went to the post office building and patent office this afternoon. The regiment marched out at 4 p. m. and paid its respects to the President and Gen. Scott.

I have seen an abundance of interesting things today but they are too numerous to describe. We were to have moved out of town today but the weather was so hot that it was deferred.

I have eaten very little since we left Ohio. I have not got hungry enough yet to eat bacon. We have nothing but bacon, hard bread and coffee, and a good deal of the time not so much as that.

Twenty-fourth Installment

July 23, 1861.
Defeat at Bull Run

I turned out at 7 a. m. Am feeling well, all things considered. I bathed, cleaned up my clothes, and gun, etc. after which I made an excellent breakfast of which I ate too much, laid around the camp till about noon, and then came down to the city. (Washington, D. C.)

Here I ate, and drank beer several times, bought a paper and read the news. Was glad to find our loss less serious than was at first supposed.

About sundown Orderly Crego and I set out to hunt up the camp of the Michigan 2nd, at Arlington Heights, which after a good deal of trouble and three or four miles of travel we found. Our men were most of them lying on the ground, many of them without either blankets or coat.

I bought a coat in the city. I felt pretty well during the day except a general feeling of exhaustion and protracted weariness. Six days of marching and sleeping on their arms and living on bread and water has used us up pretty much and we need a few days to recruit before we move again.

Now that our Commissary is under arrest for neglect of duty, I hope we shall get something to eat. I was so tired and uneasy that during the night I several times sprang up in bed and seized my gun which lay near me and began to prepare for action before I could make up my mind where I was.

July 24, 1861.
Soldiers Better Than Officers

I feel very stiff, sore and lame—generally used up. I still keep on eating and drinking and am getting pretty well filled up and have been sleeping a large part of the day.

I have been thinking over the battle and the consequences and the instruction to be derived, etc. It is now well known that if Genl. Richardson had charged on the battery as he desired with his brigade, none of us would have come out of the infernal gap alive, unless we had been carried out as prisoners.

The brigade numbered about 3500. If we had charged it would have been down a valley about a mile long, partly a cleared field and partly trees and bushes, having high hills on both sides, the tops of which were perhaps a mile apart. The charge would have been for a battery of 6 guns directly in the center of the valley. With a fair chance we could have taken this and held it.

We now know that there was a battery on each side of the valley concealed by projecting hills both of which we must have passed and that there were 2 other batteries further on which would have fairly raked us both before and after we reached the one we were to storm.

The hills on both sides were covered with woods which were filled with from 5000 to 10,000 infantry. We should undoubtedly have been allowed to advance nearly to the battery without much molestation, but should then have been fired upon from all directions and surrounded by more than 3 times our number.

Our defeat on that day was owing to Genl. Tyler's disobedience of orders and ignorance of the enemy's position. The defeat of Sunday was a matter almost of course. The enemy were more than double our number and in one of the most difficult positions to attack which can be conceived.

The enemy can never be induced to fight in fair, open battle. We could whip them to death if they would. They will keep around in masked batteries and sulk behind trees and shoot officers and bayonet wounded men. We must expect severe loss. The next attack needs to be made with more care, with better preparation for a retreat if it be necessary. We should not have retreated on Sunday farther than Centerville.

We need more good skirmishers and sharp shooters and all the men need better guns. The want of a more perfect military establishment is now seen.

There are thousands of good and brave soldiers in the army, but there is a great want of competent commanders. The soldiers are far better than the officers. There is a hard job on hand and we have got to act with circumspection or we shall suffer still greater losses.

I have made up my mind that my chances of coming out of the war alive are less than even.

The want of food I do not deem as serious as drinking mud. That more than anything else I fear will tell on the constitution. Very few men in the Company have or can bear as much fatigue as I.

Be the result what it may, I will not turn back on a good cause. I never have the prospect of a battle but I prepare myself as if I were not returning. I enlisted during the war unless sooner discharged and I mean to stand to my bargain, let the discharge come in what form it may.

Many of the Commissioned Officers will resign including, I think, our Captain. Our men have been lying in the open field all day without tents or shade. They had cold boiled pork and hard biscuit for breakfast and for dinner and supper together with boiled rice and hard bread, and this is all. I had neither plate, spoon nor anything else so I took my rice on a piece of board and ate it with a chip. Pork and bacon I cannot and will not eat in any amount. I have still some money and have had all I wanted to eat today.

On the march there is no chance of buying anything. Everything is consumed and destroyed or removed. The country is abandoned and desolate.

With the best of regulations the march of an invading or retreating army is accompanied with great loss and damage to the country. Virginia will be desolate before the close of the war.

I want to travel the road to Manassas once more and only once. I wish to pass through Manassas Gap or stop there. I never intend to give up till we have been whipped more than twice on the same ground. It can and will be taken and I hope I shall be there.

I feel sullen and mad about the retreat and the more so because it was unnecessary. We might have held Centerville.

All or nearly all that I have written concerning affairs which was stated on report or rumor has proved false. Hereafter I shall write little except what I know to be true. I have seen war in its most unpleasant forms and now have only to hope and wait for something better.

Twenty-fifth Installment

July 25, 1861.

I was detailed with 28 men to assist in cutting trees over back of the river. They were slashed down helter-skelter to prevent or delay the progress of troops. They are an effectual defense for a short time and are of service for delay beside affording an excellent place for skirmishers. It was not my turn to go but Whiting was used up (i. e. lazy) and Stevenson is lame.

The battle of Sunday was a curious one—our men are continually swearing because they did not hold the field and the enemy are swearing because they did not take us prisoners. I believe there were never two armies so deceived in each other. The Massachusetts 12th, I understand, has left the brigade. Our Colonel is too savage for them. I am sorry to see them leave. We shall not get a better in their place.

I like their Lt. Col. very much. He was police justice of Boston before he became a soldier and is a man of rare abilities and will distinguish himself in the service. I am not personally acquainted with him but struck with his appearance wh first saw him.

July 26, 1861.

A very warm day. Pay day- eating and drinking at a terrible A good many of them drunk. I s I shall get to the city tomorro cannot cease to regret and spec on the affairs of Sunday. Our a is large and full of good material, it is loosely put together. Not man in 50 ever saw a battle be this war. Not one in 10 knew simplest elements of military c They are liable to be confused. W rough and tumble fighting and sonal bravery are needed they great, but for steady movement line and on retreat they are not liable.

I did not run in either of the tles except when I was ordered and had not thought of it. Still w I go into another battle I shall many things differently and so shall not do at all.

I begin to feel more like a so and there will not be so many things to look after. The army get beaten into discipline aft while if they are not drilled in in any other way. If there were perienced officers, the men would prove much faster.

Twenty-sixth Installment

July 27, 1861.

I went to Washington today. Ate beefsteak and drank lager beer, and-so-forth. I went to see Congress in session. Heard a good speech in the Senate by Johnson of Tennessee on Secession, in reply to Breckenridge. I listened to him for 2 hours and then went over to the house of representatives and heard a part of an Ohio man's speech.

The men are drinking and gambling too much today. Col. Richardson sent the sutler of the DeKalb Guards off the ground for selling beer in front of our camp. Three dutchmen charged on him with their bayonets, but he upset two and the other took to his legs. Col. Richardson had about a dozen of them arrested and closed up the establishment so far as beer is concerned.

July 28, 1861.

Thirty men were detailed for chopping this morning, but they did very little and returned by noon. There was a sharp shower of rain about six. The day has been very quiet. There was a skirmish between our pickets and the enemy about 4 miles out last night.

July 29th, 1861.

A pretty quiet day, the boys spending their money faster than there is any need of. Our location here is a fine one in many respects. We are nearly opposite Washington of which a good view can be obtained from the hills near by. Just in the rear of us is Genl. Lee's estate. His house and the surroundings make the most beautiful spot I ever saw. He is in the secession army and Gen. Mansfield occupies his house. If I had had his estate I would have stayed at home. The house is not magnificent according to modern style, but is massive, strong and ancient. There is very little of the artificial about the grounds. The beauty consists in the trees, the undulating surface and 3 or 4 of the finest natural springs I ever saw.

The weight of our defeat seems to be settling down pretty severe on Gen. McDowell. In many of our men who are fine fellows now I can see the exact pictures of worthless drunkards five years hence. They are so surely on the road that nothing will stop them.

July 30th, 1861.

A warm day. All quiet in camp during the day, but somewhat noisy at night. It seems almost impossible for a man to go to town without getting drunk. Many of the best men disgrace themselves in this way. Captain Lawson of Company G has been drunk for a week and behaved worse than any of the soldiers. He will lose his commission.

If it were not for the sacrifice that it requires, nothing would suit me better than this soldiering. I bought some butter this morning and have lived well on bread and butter. I can sit down with a small oyster can which I have, full of beer and make a passable meal out of very little. As for liquor I keep clear of it as much as possible. There is a good deal of gambling among the men since they were paid. There is one fine thing about it—that is that the money will soon be gone. Liquor dealers and prostitutes will soon clean their pockets.

July 31st, 1861.

There was an inspection of the regiment at 12 noon. Some close and very necessary inquiries were made about the commissaries department, the sale of provisions, etc.

About 4 p. m., we got orders to move. We packed our knapsacks and marched down the river half a mile and about as much farther up into the country. We have gained by the change in most respects. We are now encamped in a clover field just beside the Arlington road. They are throwing up a breastwork to cover the road and have cut down a fine orchard and all of a man's shade trees to give the guns fair range. We have a very fair view of the city from here. The capitol, all the public buildings, the Smithsonian Institute and Washington monument are in full view.

Early Pioneers of Van Buren County

Written by David Woodman, One of the Pioneers, Fifty Years Ago, and Prepared for the Republican by His Daughter, Mrs. C. D. Richmond.

The Republican will begin next week the printing of a series of articles entitled, "The Early Pioneers," written by David Woodman.

They will be a valuable addition to the existing history of Van Buren county and are well worth preserving.

The work is divided into chapters of about a column each and it will take most of the year to complete the printing.

It was written for Bert Cole when he was editor of the Free Press and Courier. This paper was consolidated with the True Northerner about 30 years ago, and Mr. Cole who resides in Pasadena, California, is nearing his eighty-seventh birthday.

The Republican is indebted to Mr. Woodman's daughter, Mrs. C. D. Richmond, of Tampa, Florida, for the manuscript. It was neatly written by her in long hand from the only copy we know to be in existence. It was a large task for her to assume, but in doing it she will greatly please many of her old time friends as well as the Republican.

Mrs. Richmond says in her letter that accompanies the manuscript,—"At last I am sending you the notes of "The Early Pioneers," written by my father, David Woodman, many years ago. I think it must have been around 49 or 50 years, but am not certain. The dates of the papers, "The Free Press and Courier," was not mentioned in any of the chapters.

"The clippings were saved by an aunt of mine and given to me many years ago, after my father had passed away. There are not many living who have heard of most of the old pioneers mentioned in the notes, but some of the present generation, who are living in the age which was predicted by father in the last chapter of his story, will no doubt be interested."

The chapters will appear each week under the heading, "Early Pioneers of Van Buren County," and will be in such form that they can be easily preserved in a scrapbook.

Chapter III

The Long Indian Trail

Previous to the occupation of Western Michigan by the white people an Indian trail crossed this country from northeast to southwest, crossing the Paw Paw river where the west bridge now is and leading through what is known as the Pe Pe Yah farm, thence through the belt of heavy timber land now the farms of William Lyle and others in that vicinity.

The trail led through to Pokagon and was deeply worn in the soil in many places, showing it had been used for ages as a thoroughfare for the dusky race that used it. On that trail we have seen the red men stealing silently along, followed by their ponies loaded with their squaws, papooses and camp equipage, their dogs bringing up the rear.

The timber in that vicinty was magnificent. There were the great oaks, black walnut, whitewood, butternut, sugar maple and other kinds of timber all standing in its grandeur. I cut a whitewood on land I owned in that vicinity which scaled over 6,000 feet of lumber. John Sherrod sold scores of those splendid trees for one dollar each. Such trees would be worth $50 each now.

Squaws Did the Work

Previous to its purchase and occupation by the whites, this region was one great Indian sugar camp during the sugar making season. They had made sugar there for many years and were loath to leave their old camps. But they had to (marche) go.

It was quite a novelty to visit their camps and see their process of sugar making. They used bark troughs to catch the sap and they gashed the trees without mercy. They evaporated the sugar water in anything that would answer the purpose, pails or kettles holding from four quarts to four gallons each. And they were hung in a compact body in the center of the wigwam and were from ten to forty in number. Under this number of kettles or pails a brisk fire was kept by using white ash wood (they used no other). The smoke escaped through an opening at the apex of the wigwam, which was built out of bark peeled in sheets from trees and this was their dwelling place during the sugar making season.

The squaws did the entire work of sugar making, cutting the wood and bringing it to camp. It was tied up in bundles slung on the back and held in place by a thong passing around the forehead. But some one may wish to know where the "noble red man" was all this time. Well he was either resting (they were brave in this respect) or off on a hunt, and the game he killed he laid at the cabin door, then his work was done.

In their dealings with the whites, it was swap, giving and taking the same measure whether sugar, flour, meat, cranberries, or other commodities. Many years ago one of those noble red men had the misfortune to lose his squaw by death, and being too lazy to hunt, he concluded to try and sponge his living, so he got a friend to write a certificate stating of Pottawattomies and Pokagon was a great chief. He was quite a gentleman and was held in high esteem by all who knew him. He visited the sugar camps before mentioned in the spring of 1836, and died at Pokagon a few years later.

Among the Indians who had sugar camps in the southwest part of this township in the spring of 1836, I remember Pe Pe Yah, White Wolf, Cah Cah and Ash Ka Pe.

Old Shavehead was there also. He was an ugly looking old fellow with a head as void of hair as a pumpkin. He claimed to be 100 years old and a great warrior, claiming to have slain 99 men, and was anxious to make it an even 100 before he died. But he died at one of the sugar camps in the spring of 1837 and his body was carried by my camp wrapped in a blanket and resting upon a section of an old store trough. He was buried on the Pe Pe Yah farm. Others might continue his history if living, but I think they are not. Perhaps his cranium is yet in the possession of some one of our physicians.

The old fellow received a severe punishment at the hands of a Mr. Shaefer on Big Prairie Ronde in an early day. He met Shafer on the road and demanded some provisions he had in his wagon. While seeming to comply with his demand Shafer got within reach of the old rascal and with the butt of his whip, knocked him down and punished him to his own satisfaction.

In the spring of 1836 Joseph Luce and myself opened a sugar camp on land now owned by George or William Lyle, and I made sugar there every year with two exceptions for over thirty years.

Naming Eagle Lake

During the sugar season of 1836 I constructed a canoe at my camp which three of us carried on our backs to Eagle Lake and we were probably the first white men that ever floated on its waters or fished in them. Henry Rhodes and myself had a cold bath there soon after, while fishing one night, our canoe overturning and spilling us, fish and all into the lake.

During that spring a pair of bald eagles built a nest in the forks of a great white-wood which stood on its southern shore and there reared their young. We attempted to dislodge them with rifle shots but failed, hence we called that beatiful sheet of water Eagle Lake, and no one has attempted to steal or change its name as with some other lakes in the township.

Mound Builders

Concerning the mounds and garden beds that were so plentiful here in an early day, history is silent and so is tradition, the Indians having none concerning them. There were several mounds on my farm between 3 and 4 mile lakes. They were about 4 feet high and 2 or 3 rods across. On them were growing oak trees two feet in diameter. There was no sag or depression around them, therefore the earth must have been scraped up from the surface of a large space. We opened one of those mounds when we first came here.

Chapter 4.

At the approach of winter in 1835 there were about 58 families, residents of this county, all but 5 or 6 families coming here during that year. These were divided as follows: Lafayette, 15; Antwerp, 7; Almena, 8; Columbia, 7; Decatur, 6; Hamilton, 5; Porter, 6; and Lawrence, 5. I think there were no settlers in the other townships until 1836, when many more arrived, and several other townships received settlers that year.

Myron Hoskins and wife of Paw Paw are the only couple now living who were married prior to coming here in 1835. Mr. Hoskins assisted in erecting the first frame building, put up in the village. After a few years residence in the county they returned to New York state, and remained there many years. There are three old ladies yet living (widows) who were married previous to coming here in 1835, and they have all passed their four score years.

As there were no provisions here of any kind, for either man or beast, and but few horses, it was quite a task to go to Big Prairie Ronde for all such supplies. After purchasing wheat at $1.50 per bushel it was taken to Flowerfield to be ground, making at least a three days trip. We fed our horses on wheat that winter at $1.50 per bushel, the price of corn and oats being nearly the same. Pork was $30.00 and salt $10.00 per barrel, and could only be procured at St. Joseph.

Food for the Hungry

We think that if any of those early settlers left their appetite behind them, or lost it on the way they found it again soon after their arrival here. But deer were plentiful and the venison excellent. Coons, woodchucks, squirrels, wild geese and ducks were abundant and the lakes and streams, swarmed with fish.

Some who ought to know claimed that coon was excellent, woodchuck palatable, but sand hill crane was no "spring chicken."

Before dams were built across the river below here, sturgeon, suckers and other lake fish came up here and were caught. Sturgeons have been caught where the Briggs pond now is, weighing over 200 pounds. I caught one there that was nearly six feet long. But the river has been dammed, and the fish confined to the lower regions of the river, of course.

The marshes and river bottoms furnished a poor quality of hay until we could raise other fodder. Marsh land was sought after by some, thinking it would prove a bonanza. But afterwards they found themselves mistaken. Marsh hay answered very well as a coarse feed for horses. but it killed many of the cattle which came from the east. It caused dry or bloody murrain, which was seldom cured and the hide of the dead animal was worthless. After we raised grain for milling, and until the completion of the Paw Paw mill in 1838, Comstock was our nearest mill.

Afterwards a mill was built on the east side of the Kalamazoo river where the wagon bridge now is. This mill was run by a screw wheel, the only one of that kind I ever saw. But the old mill has long since gone the way of the early pioneers, yet in our mind's eye" we see the huge water wheel splashing and grinding as it did fifty years ago. Two, and frequently three days were occupied in making the trip.

A Paper Town

In 1836 M. Gunton settled on land now owned by the Christies, south of Prospect lake, whose wife and little boy made occasional trips to Big Prairie for supplies. The boy managed the oxen, while his mother did the trading. They were sometimes gone a week, leaving Gunton to keep bachelor's hall, and make improvements on his land.

Perhaps there may be a few others besides myself who remember John D. Freeman's paper town, which he laid out on the west side of (Freeman) now Prospect lake.

This on paper was very attractive. There was a court house and other public buildings selected, and a steamboat proudly plowing the waters of the lake. Several lots were sold for $150 each, way above what good lots can be bought for in our gem of a village today. But the thing "busted" like the wildcat banks, and the steamboat disappeared like the "Flying Dutchman." This ideal village was to be called Van Buren Center.

D. Woodman.

Chapter V

In May, 1835, Elder J. N. Hinckley, father of the late Asa G. Hinckley, came here from Monroe county, New York, and being a shrewd business man, he sought after a good lumber region. In order to carry out his object he and his nephew, Rodney Hinckley, sought the heights of Prospect Hill. There the latter climbed a tall oak, one of many that crowned the top of the hill at that time, and with the aid of a glass, located the belt of pine timber in the vicinity of what is now Breedsville.

Here the Elder purchased a large tract of land and partially completed a log cabin and then returned to New York. In October he returned here in company with the Breed, Brown, Howard and Taylor families, in all about 25 persons. The party came by water to Detroit, there purchased oxen and wagons and as best they could made their way to Paw Paw.

There were no settlers between here and Black River, so-called at that time, and no wagon road beyond the Monroe place. The party was 2 days in reaching Black river, or Breedsville, then a solitary, unfinished and uninhabited cabin.

After fording the river, they had to pick their way and were obliged to camp in the woods without shelter except their wagons. My father was with the party moving one of the families. After making the family as comfortable as possible in his wagon he sat in a chair holding an umbrella over his head as it rained nearly all night. On his return he came very near being carried down the river, which had become dangerous, caused by the rain of the night before.

Naming Breedsville

A bridge was built across the river at that place, (this side of Monroe's) late in the fall of 1835, Elder Hinckley overseeing the work, myself assisting in it. The county seat was located there at first, as this is near the geographical center of the county. Breedsville was named after Mr. Breed, before mentioned, and the first settlement in the northern part of the county was made under the supervision of Elder Hinckley, and the name of Black river was changed to Breedsville after Mr. Breed settled there.

"Shingle weavers" was a name given those who made shingles, and nearly every settler in that section embarked in that business. A shingle shanty therefore was indispensible and although shingles were cheap—$1 to $1.50 per thousand—they helped "keep the wolf away from the door", until supplies could be received. In case settlers had no pine on their own land, they could find it on Uncle Sam's, or non-resident lands, and they were not very particular which.

It must be remembered that the shingles made in those days were rived or split from blocks, and shaved by hand, and would last twice as long as sawed shingles. The buildings on my old farm are covered with shingles I made myself, one of the buildings being erected 48 years ago, and the roof is good yet. There was a great call for shingles before the days of railroads, from distant parts, as well as from new settlers and they were hauled long distances.

Mr. Breed erected a saw mill at Breedsville in 1836 and Mr. Knowles a tannery in 1838. These were great helps to those isolated settlers as there was then a market for hemlock bark, and lumber soon became an article of traffic.

Having an interest in a pine lot there I lumbered at that place winters (off and on) for 40 years, J. J. Woodman often being with me. We always camped in the woods amid the pines and hemlocks, and occasionally were serenaded by the wolves.

Let no one imagine that the settlement of a new country, especially a heavily timbered one, is mere "child's play". Far from it. And it was doubly so with those who settled in the wild woods of northern Van Buren Co. Their nearest post office or store was Paw Paw, nearest grist mill, Kalamazoo. No roads but temporary ones, whose road beds were mud of uncertain depth, spring and fall at least.

When Mosquitoes Had Their Day

Then there were millions of mosquitoes insisting upon attending the traveler on his way, and while they sang their siren song in his ear, they would extract his life's blood. J. J. and myself went to Breedsville on foot one spring to pile up some lumber. It was swarming time with mosquitoes and they gathered around us until the mass became so dense we could scarcely see or breathe. Finally we adopted the plan of running at full speed down the slopes, thus leaving our tormenters behind.

Wm. Lyle says, when he was cook on a Paw Paw river boat in an early day, the mosquitoes were so thick they would settle in swarms on the meat frying in the pan, and being unable to keep them out, he fried them with the meat, and no fault was found by the boatmen.

It is reported that on a spring day, many years ago, a man was out in the woods somewhere in the vicinity of Breedsville when the mosquitoes gathered around him in such vast numbers that he finally took refuge under a potash kettle which, fortunately, had been left at a sugar camp. The man declared that the disappointed and enraged mosquitoes then drove their bills through the kettle and that he clinched them on the inside with a stone he luckily found under the kettle until the struggling mass actually lifted and carried the kettle away, and during the commotion he escaped.

I presume this man was a cousin of the man who claimed that they sharpened their sheep's noses down in New Hampshire in order that they might be able to feed on the grass that grows among the rocks.

D. Woodman.

Chapter VI

After securing his land, the early pioneer proceeded at once to prepare a habitation, or home for himself and family. Log cabins or houses were not only the fashion but a necessity, for the first few years at least.

The first farm houses erected were small, low, rough structures, many of them might be called shanties, with a half roof, and of course no chamber. A hole dug under the floor, and reached through a trap door, was a cellar. Houses with a double roof had lofts, or chambers which were reached by means of ladders, or perhaps by stairs.

These cabins were of various sizes, up to 16 by 24 feet. Very few were larger. A fireplace built with clay at one end of the building and the chimney built of sticks and clays, stood out in the cold.

The cabin might be divided by a rough partition, blankets, or curtains. Such were the homes of the early pioneers of this county. But practice makes improvements, so the architecture of the cabin improved, and later on really elegant log residences were built.

Putting Up Buildings

As the county was being rapidly settled, putting up or raising houses, or barns was the order of the day, and all hands within a large radius, were frequently called together for that purpose. The process of raising a log house was slow, and the work heavy, and help scarce as was often the case. I have walked nine miles, helped raise a barn, and walked back the same day.

There was scarcely a building put up in this vicinity prior to 1842, that I did not assist in raising. I remember on one occasion, after the body of the building was up and no jug making its appearance, the men left, leaving the plates and rafters lying on the ground. The man secured help and finished the job the next day.

Establishing and opening roads, girdling or deadening the timber, and breaking up the ground, on the openings, or slashing the timber on the timbered land, then clearing it up as rapidly as possible, was the mode of procedure.

Clearing Off Timber

Crops were raised among the logs and log or brush fences were not considered unsightly objects. Logging bees were frequent among the settlers in the heavy timber and thus, with his muscle, axe, oxen, fire, the assistnce of good neighbors and a clear conscience, the pioneer worked his way out of the woods.

On the openings we girdled all the timber before breaking up the land, raised two or three crops, then cleared the land, by burning up the timber except what was needed for fencing. The timber I destroyed in clearing up my farm would be worth more now, if it was there, than the land is worth.

It was what we called timbered openings. The timber was splendid. I have cut seven eleven foot rails from a tree. During the summer of 1846 I girdled 20 acres, broke and sowed it to wheat. The wheat grew tall and lodged badly, so bad that on one part of the field, five men with cradles only cut seven acres in one day. Henry Wilson and Elisha Tyler helped harvest that wheat and perhaps they have not forgotten how lively a nest ot yellow jackets made it for some of the boys who had removed most of their clothing, it being extremely warm.

Improving Machinery

After clearing off the timber, two years later, I seeded the field with clover and an enormous crop was raised. This had to be cut with scythes, raked and handled by hand. The man who could get over one and a half acres per day had to be an expert with a scythe.

Eventually mowing machines made their appearance. Then the hand raking reapers, sulky rakes, horse pitch forks, corn cultivators of various kinds came in their order. These were "God sends" to the toiling overworked pioneers.

The first wheat I raised on my farm I trampled out with oxen on a floor made of boards. The first threshing machine brought into this county, my father ordered from Brookport, N. Y. It was shipped to Detroit, and he hauled the whole concern here on a wagon, being gone eight days.

The machine consisted of a portable horse power cylinder, which threshed out the grain, the straw being raked off by hand. This machine with good luck would thresh 200 bushels of wheat in a day. But it had to be cleaned with a fanning mill afterwards. Then we thought we were "getting out of the woods" and so we were, in a measure, but we were still binding our grain by hand, threshing with horse power, and riding in our lumber wagons.

Finally more perfect machinery succeeded the former imperfect, the old hand raking machine was succeeded by the self raker, and that by the self binder. The horse power machines gave way to steam power until there is scarcely a limit to the capacity of our steam threshers or self binding harvesters.

D. Woodman.

(Chapter VII.)

The process of improving the land called plains or barrens, differed from that of the timbered openings. In place of timber and grubs there were bushes with immense roots, which had continued to grow for ages, the tops being kept down by annual fires.

The ground was full of these obstacles, and it required a powerful team, with an immense plow to eradicate them. Therefore 10, 12, 14 and even 15 yoke of oxen were sometimes used. I have seen 12 yoke of oxen attached to one of the great breakers, that was used in Hamilton and Keeler townships in an early day. What a pity that one of those immense plows had not been preserved, and placed on exhibition at the world's fair. It would not only have "astonished the natives," but people from every nation represented there.

Daniel Webster's old plow exhibited in the New Hampshire section of the Agricultural Department, world's fair, would only have been a baby beside one of our immense breakers. The beam of one of those plows would compare favorably with the beam of one of our old barns. Then the great plow share three or four feet long, kept almost as sharp as a knife. The ponderous coulter, the wheel with its appliances, that gauged the depth of the furrow, the huge clevis, and long heavy chain, that reached forward between the oxen and to which they were attached.

Then the three or four drivers with their long whips, a stalwart man at the handles and the procession was ready to move. When it did move it left its mark, nothing but trees could stop its progress. If the plow became fast, oxen and hand spikes were necessary to liberate it.

After a while the land was harrowed with a great 'V' shaped harrow, the grubs piled up and burned, and in the fall the ground was sown to wheat.

The Land Breakers

Captain Barrett was the earliest and most noted land breaker in the vicinity of Paw Paw. He owned nine yoke of oxen at one time, all were named and well trained in the business of handling the great plows of that day. The captain had a large bell strapped to the neck of one of the oxen which could be heard two miles away, and he claimed it often brought the wearer to his knees, its sound was so heavy.

Of course all breaking teams had to be turned loose at night, and their range was unlimited, therefore large bells were necessary in order to find the oxen the next morning. They might be found one or two miles away, or not found for half a day, as was often the case. To gather up the teams by tramping miles through the wet grass and bushes was no desirable job. Some of the old residents remember the mammoth bent grass that grew extensively on the plains. When small it was relished by stock but soon outgrew its usefulness. Bunches of that kind of grass are occasionally seen each season, but it has lost its former prestige and now it is only an insignficant plant.

At the centennial a bundle of this grass was on exhibition. When an eastern farmer quizzed J. J. in regard to Michigan's great products, especially about their raising ten tons of hay per acre, J. J. took him to this bundle of grass standing twelve feet high. The man then said he would give it up, and admit that Michigan was ahead in the grass line at least.

The Early Pioneers

But about the early pioneers. As I have before stated, that though their first residences were rough and humble, they had to answer the purpose. If they had to climb a ladder to reach the loft in their humble dwellings it was all the same as though they had had winding stairs. If they slept on wildcat bedsteads, their sleep was just as sweet as though they reposed on black walnut. If they warmed their cabins by means of huge fire places and cooked their frugal meals over a blazing fire, or in a dutch or tin baker, the food tasted just as good as if cooked on a sixty dollar range. If their children were rocked in a home made cradle or toted about in a vehicle costing a couple of hours work, they were fully up to the average of those of the present day in intelligence and vigor. If the kitchen had to answer the purpose of sitting room, parlor, and often sleeping room, it was satisfactory, and a necessity.

Our musical instruments were of God's own invention, our wives and children, and their music was the sweetest and most cheering the early settlers or the late settlers ever listened to. Our wives were their own cooks, chamber maids, dress makers, and milliners, and were able to make up all light family clothing. Though they never did bang their hair or a piano, they did bang the broom, mop and other household utensils around in a lively manner.

Yet with all of their inventive genius they never conceived the idea of substituting a platter or a fig leaf for a bonnet surmounting it with a bird or a beast, and a huge sail.

Teachers and Wages

Our first school houses were rough log structures, often located in the dense forests, and the teacher's salary two dollars per week, in summer, and they boarded around, Yet the scholars made good progress in their studies, quite as good as scholars are doing at present, under the tuition of teachers receiving eight or ten dollars for five days service, of five hours each.

Those humble school houses, were also used for places of worship, or for holding township meetings. No doubt the worship of those early pioneers, though their sanctuaries were humble, made them just as acceptable to our Heavenly Father as though from gilded pulpits, $10,000 organs or reverends, horns or fiddles.

The early pioneers stood upon one common level, they were all neighbors, though miles apart, and the latch-string was always out. We had no tramps, cranks, bummers, or loafers in those days. There were no deadly cigarettes to ruin the boys. Although liquor was almost as free as water, there was little drunkenness, no thieving or house breaking, no robbing of hen coops as at the present time.

Salaries of officers, school teachers, the wages of farm help and the price of supplies fo. the family were governed by the prices of the products of the farm. I once sold 100 bushels of wheat for $40.00 and bought a yoke of oxen for the same money. I do not believe there is a farm in this township whose entire products the past year would pay the salary of one county officer, or the profits of no 3 or even 4 farms would pay the salary of some of our lady school teachers. Only think of our selling wheat at 50 cents, wool at 17 cents and other products in proportion, and continue to pay war price salaries which is unjust and uncalled for. It takes 3 or 4 thousand bushels of wheat or 8,000 pounds of wool, to pay the salary of some of our county officers. Now why this disparity, why this inequality? Why not "make one hand wash the other?" Why over burden tax payers unnecessarily and especially the producing class?

Chapter VIII

Conquering A Wilderness

It is well to remember that the early settlers in this vicinity were then with limited means who came here to secure cheap lands, and by the time that was done and a cabin erected their means were exhausted. But the land was theirs. It was not plastered over with mortgages, as many farms are at present.

Hard times they expected, privation they met bravely and cheerfully. They were bound to carve out homes for themselvs and families in this wilderness country.

But the glory of conquering a wilderness belonged not to the man alone. His wife stood bravely by his side, ready to lend a helping hand whenever or however she could. If it was necessary to live in a little log cabin, miles from neighbors, who could only be found by a trail or aid of blazed trees, she was equal to the emergency. If it was necessary for her to walk four or five miles to do shopping, or attend worship, she was always on hand.

But perhaps some one would like to know where the man was all the time. Why did he not hitch the horse to the buggy, that his wife might ride? Why did he not carry her to church or the distant neighbors? Well, he did not for the simple reason he could not. He had no horse and buggy. If he had a yoke of oxen and cart or lumber wagon he was fortunate. But many had not even these conveniences, yet there was love, peace and contentment in the cabin while there was thrift outside.

Mounting The Ladder

The children were as brave and industrious as their parents, and ere long some of them, the young men in particular, left the parental roof to begin for themselves. Many of this class had not a cent to begin with, but by working by the month or doing job work, such as splitting rails, clearing land or grubbing, etc., means were secured to purchase the land. Then keeping "bachelor's hall" was the order of the day with many. While this mode of life was not the most desirable, it was a necessity.

It is a true saying that a child must creep before he can walk, so these young men must commence to climb at the bottom of the ladder. They could not reach the top at a single bound, but must go up round by round. At the foot of the ladder the young pioneer or bachelor built a little cabin necessarily cheap and rude. Its furniture was a mud chimney, a wildcat bedstead, a rough table, a stool, possibly a chair, a kettle, frying pan, tea kettle, dutch oven, a few dishes and bed clothes. This comprised his household outfit.

Then he had his keen axe and knew how to use it. If he owned a yoke of oxen and a cow, he was almost ready to mount the first round of the ladder. Well he is here in the forest. The giant trees seem to defy his bony arm. The old moderator bull frog from some lake or marsh warns him to go out, the catbird says you can't, the partridge says quit, the owl wants to know whoo, hoo, this trespasser is. Finally the blackbird soothes his sorrows by calling him uncle ebert, and the whip-poor-will's sweet notes lull him to sleep.

Thus the days and weeks passed away. The lone man was a kind of Robinson Crusoe. He was monarch of all his surroundings. He was boss and all hands. He was chief cook, house keeper. Chamber maid, wash woman, barber and cobbler, but he was mounting the ladder round by round.

Keeping Bachelor's Hall

Let not the reader, especially the young men of today, imagine there was much fun or "child's play" in keeping bachelor's hall. If he does let him swing the axe all day (except when he is doing his housework) and I opine he will exclaim "May the good Lord deliver us."

I had some experience in keeping bachelor's hall. In 1839 I commenced in the woods which is now my, old farm (it is now John Woodman's farm and is in the third generation) in south west Paw Paw. I made the first beginning south of the Territorial road, west of the Edwin Barnum place, Joseph Luce had in the fall of 1835 located two miles north of where I built my shanty. This was my nearest and only neighbor. I marked the way to my place from the Territorial road by blazing trees, no road being opened or laid out for some years afterwards. I had nothing except my land and axe at that time.

After a while I procured a yoke of oxen, borrowed my father's plow, harrow and cart. Thus I commenced climbing the ladder, I frequently spent a whole week without seeing a human being, yet I never cut myself with an axe, was never injured by a falling tree, never sick, was always able to do two men's work, and in about fifty years succeeded in mounting a few rounds of the ladder.

Perhaps others are nearer the top than I am, or have reached it, and fell, but I am yet climbing the rounds and have endeavored to do what I could to help make the world better.

Chapter IX

The First Fourth of July

The first 4th of July celebration ever held in the county occurred in 1838. It was held in an open space in the woods near where the Court House now stands. Among those present was Harmon Van Antwerp, after whom Antwerp township was named. He was a veteran of the Revolution, 90 years old.

A very interesting feature of the exercises was the presentation of a liberty cap to this old soldier, by Miss Rosanna Gremps (now Mrs. Alonzo Shultz), accompanied by a neat address. I think she was then some 13 years old. The old gentleman was very much pleased with this mark of respect shown him. He was the father of Daniel Van Antwerp, with whom he and his wife came here from York state in June, 1836. The old lady died the next May and was the first adult person who died in the township.

Our First Representative

F. C. Annable was the orator of the day and Rodney Hinckley managed the artillery (anvil). Although there was not as much style or as long a procession as in older settlements, all were brim full of patriotism.

In 1838 the 4th was celebrated in the grove yet standing west of the old Brewer saw mill in Almena. Mr. Annable was the speaker on this occasion, and after the oration it was remarked and seemed to be the sentiment of those present, that he was the man to represent Van Buren county in the legislature. Mr. Annable was accordingly elected in 1842. He was the first representative this county had after it was detached from Cass, although Henry Coleman had at a former election been elected a representative but was not admitted to a seat, it being decided Van Buren county was not entitled to a member.

John McKinney was the first state senator this county ever had. He was elected in 1849.

The First Rifle Company

In 1839, the Paw Paw rifle company was organized with Andrew Longstreet captain, Edwin Mears first lieutenant, David Woodman and W. H. Lee second lieutenants. The commissions of these officers were signed by Stephen T. Mason, governor.

Longstreet was soon after appointed colonel of the 28th regiment. Mears was elected captain and Woodman 1st. lieutenant. The commissions to these offices were issued by William Woodbridge, governor, dated Nov., 1840.

Van Buren county had formerly been attached to Kalamazoo county for military purposes and Chas. A. Stewart was colonel, but under the new organization this country comprised the 28th regiment of the 14th brigade and 7th division of the state militia. B. F. Chadwick was appointed brigadier general of the 14th brigade, thus receiving his military title.

I think myself, A. R. Wildey, John and William Lyle, Urial and Wilson Lee, are the only ones now living who were members of the company. The company numbered 45 men gathered from the several townships in the eastern part of the county. At the outbreak of the Mexican war several members entered the service and the company disbanded.

Harvesting the Wheat

Kalamazoo county, being settled several years earlier than this, and containing several prairies a large quantity of grain was raised there. As we had little harvesting to do at home for a few years, several of us would shoulder our cradles and rakes and march to Big Prairie Ronde in order to earn a few dollars and help gather the harvest.

I worked one harvest for our late townsman, Edmund Lagrave. He was carrying on the widow Daniels' farm at Schoolcraft and had 95 acres of wheat all in a body. A harvesting machine which cut threshed, cleaned and bagged the wheat as it passed along, was operating in that field. It cut a swath eight feet wide, and was hauled by 12 horses. It was not a perfect machine, however, and it did not pay to run it. Andrew Y. Moore, of Kalamazoo, was the inventor of the machine. He went to California in an early day, and it was through his genius that the great harvesters now in use there were perfected. He died in Fresno county not long since, 90 years old.

During the harvest of 1837, I worked for Col. McKinstry, father of our former pension agent, who at that time resided at Schoolcraft. We always received $1.50 per day for work.

Transportation

Wheat and oats grew strong and yielded large crops on the prairie. 40 bushels of wheat and 90 to 100 of oats was not uncommon. Corn did not do well on the new prairie land. After supplying the home market, large quantities of grain had to find a market at St. Joseph on the lake. This market or shipping point was reached by teams and the St. Joseph and Paw Paw rivers.

In 1833 the territorial government, had authorized the construction of roads connecting Schoolcraft, Little Prairie Ronde, Gun Prairie and other points with the forks of the Paw Paw river, near the Agard place, and considerable grain was hauled there from the above named places, then boated down the river, St. Joseph river flat boats coming after the freight.

In the fall of 1835, Elder Hinckley bought a boat and the goods of the settlers of that year was shipped around the lakes and up the river as far as the Monroe place. Later on Lawrence was the head of navigation.

In 1840 I. W. Willard built two flat boats here for transporting flour from here to St. Joseph. The capacity of each boat was about 400 barrels. The boats were the Daniel Buckley, A. R. Wildey, Master, and the Wave in charge of W. H. Halbut. Many of our citizens can remember seeing these boats loaded with flour at the main street bridge. I saw them depart on their winding way the first time they sailed. The boats were assisted on their way by letting the water out of the ponds.

As one views that little stream now they would hardly think such boat loads of flour had ever passed there. Mr. Willard had ox carts on the road hauling flour. From two to four yoke to each wagon making a trip in four days.

Before the Central R. R. was built I frequently hauled my wheat to St. Joseph, at first with oxen, and afterwards with horses. The lowest price I ever sold for was 60 cents. One winter I took 17 barrels of flour down there, could not sell it, had it shipped in the spring and along in the summer received $29 for it. The wheat netted me 34 cents per bushel. That was worse than the price of our high tariff wheat of today. One fall I fatted 22 hogs on corn and sold the lot dressed for $2.50 per hundred.

Chapter X

First Township Meeting

Lafayette became a separate township March 11th, 1837, and the first township meeting was held at Dodge's tavern on the first Monday in April following. There were 27 votes cast and 21 offices filled. Seventeen out of the 27 voters were elected to office.

The following freemen voted: Joseph Luce, R. Currier, E. L. Barrett, Peter Gremps, D. O. Dodge, William Eckler, E. Jones, John Barber, A. Buys, John Hughes, E. Mears, L. H. Warner, J. R. Pugsley, Edwin Barnum, D. Thorp, J. Barnes, D. Barber, A. G. Hinckley, H. Gray, C. G. Harrington, R. Hinckley, John Lyle, E. Shultz, T. B. Colton, William Prater, Lorenzo Cate, M. Haskins.

J. H. Simmons was elected to three offices, and two other voters to two offices each. All the voters in the township except ten were office holders. The offices almost went begging. One supervisor, one township clerk, four justics of the peace, three highway commissioners, three school inspectors, three assessors, four constables and two directors of the poor managed to keep the ten private citizens straight and attend to the onerous duties of their several offices.

Myron Hoskins of this place (Paw Paw) and C. G. Harrington of Lawton, are the only ones now living, who voted at that election.

The First Burying Ground

At the second township meeting held April 2nd, 1838, 32 votes were cast, then nearly twice as many voters as officers. At this meeting money was raised to purchase and fence 1½ acres of land for a burial ground, (the old grounds in the north part of the village). This was a timely move, for before the year closed it was needed.

The wife of D. O. Dodge died in 1837, and was the first one who died in the village. She was first buried in the tavern garden, but after the cemetery was prepared, her remains were removed there. All who died in this vicinity for several years were buried in this cemetery. But after other grounds were established, large numbers were removed. At present the old cemetery is a lonely uninviting place.

C. G. Harrington of Lawton is the only one now living whose name appeared on the poll list of those voting at the spring election of 1838. Myron Hoskins had previously moved to Breedsville.

The first white child born in Paw Paw was Simeon Buys, son of Archibold Buys, who then resided near the springs on what is now the north part of J. J. Woodman's land lying near the village. Simeon Buys is yet and I believe has all his life been a resident of this township.

The First School

In the summer of 1836, Melissa Warner taught school in a little shanty located on the west side of the river. 15 or 20 pupils attending. During that summer a school house was built on Gremps street near where John Sherman now resides. The following winter Lorenzo Cate taught school in the new house. This was the first winter school in the village or county. The next winter Frederick Lord was the teacher. Then Doctor Moffit from Battle Creek.

Among the pupils who attended the first three winter schools were the Woodmans, Grempses, Lyles, Hinckleys, Burnetts, Buys, Longwells, Baldwins and others, myself being one of the pupils.

That school house was a very useful building, being used for religious purposes, court house, elections, lyceums, political meetings, etc.

Courts and Judges

June 7th, 1837, the first circuit court convened in this school house, Judge Ransom of Kalamazoo, presiding, W. H. Reder and J. R. Monroe being associate judges.

The law at that time required a grand jury to be in attendance and one was present composed of the following persons: Peter Gremps, foreman; J. H. Simmons, Joseph Woodman, Rodney Hinckley, Joshua Bangs, Edwin Barnum, John Reynolds, Dexter Gibbs, Joseph Luce, Asa G. Hinckley and E. L. Barrett. There was no business for the grand jury or court at its first session. At the December term, following, one suit was tried, and a verdict of $16.42 rendered for the plaintiff.

The judges which have presided over our circuit court since its organization are Ransom, Green, Whipple, Pratt, Graves, Woodruff, Littlejohn, Brown, Comstock, Hawes, Mills and Buck.

A county court was established here in 1846. A. W. Broughton being the first judge. But that court was soon abolished, and the law requiring the useless associate judges of the circuit repealed.

J. H. Simmons was the first judge of probate, Samuel Gunton, sheriff, D. O. Dodge, treasurer, N. B. Starkweather, clerk and J. H. Simmons, register of deeds. Gunton soon resigned the office of sheriff and Andrew Longstreet was elected in his place. Dodge, treasurer, also resigned and Joshua Bangs was elected to fill the vacancy. I was present at the first circuit court held in the county, and have been present at one or more terms of court held by each of the several judges.

(Chapter XI)

Lost in the Woods

Sometime during the winter of 1836 and '37, Edwin Mears, then a resident of the village, with 2 or three others, went north looking for land. It was somewhere in what is now Waverly township.

During the day Mears became separated from the others, and despite all of his efforts he could neither find them nor his way homeward. In fact, he was lost in the forest. A person in such a condition seems to lose all reason and will disregard unmistakable signs and facts and follow his own will and judgment. This seems to have been the case with Mears. He wandered westward between the Paw Paw and Black rivers, for four days without food or fire.

He claimed he passed the nights curled up in some hollow tree and that he saw a panther pass his retreat one night. He waded streams and must have crossed the Breedsville road in his wanderings.

The fourth day at night he reached Monroe's shanty several miles this side of South Haven where he was found by a party of searchers. He had become nearly wild, his boots were frozen to his feet. But eventually he recovered. His rifle was found by Indians some years later.

The Wild Cat Banks

The fall of 1837 was very sickly, chills and fever in an aggravated form prevailed to an alarming extent and physicians not knowing how to manage it, many died. In fact there were not well ones enough to care for the sick.

During the season of 1838 that visionary scheme known as the wild cat banking system went into operation under a law enacted by the legislature in December previous. The law was so liberal and securities so easily obtained and success so apparent that banks were organized or on the eve of being organized in nearly every village in the state. Even our little village of Paw Paw had its bank almost ready to issue bills when the bubble burst and like the milk maid whose "glowing hopes expired" when she spilt her milk, so the pioneer (would be bankers) visions of wealth disappeared like the shadowy rainbow.

But everything was booming for a while, everything brought round prices and even the boys had their pockets full of money.

Traveling 100 Years Ago

Another visionary scheme of our state was the $5,000,000 loan with which it proposed to build three lines of railroads through the state. How we succeeded in that enterprise is understood by our people.

I had the privilege of riding over that section of the Michigan Central R. R. between Detroit and Ann Arbor when owned by the state in 1841. The rails were strap iron, bolted to a timber, which was fastened to the ties. Occasionally the end of some of these strap rails would become loose, and bend upwards (they were called snakes' heads) and crash they would come up through the car.

I was on my way to Vermont at the time referred to on a visit to the place of my birth and boyhood. I left Paw Paw in October by stage to Ann Arbor. Then by rail to Detroit occupying 36 hours. Then by boat to Buffalo, in 36 hours more. Then by a line boat on the Erie canal to Troy Junction in seven days, fare one cent per mile, all expenses included. Then up the northern canal to Whitehall, thence up lake Champlain to Burlington, Vermont. Then by stage to Caledonia county in that state. A 13 day journey.

I could have saved some time by taking a packet boat on the canal. But traveling at one cent per mile, was cheaper than living at home, provided time was not taken into account. With our present railroad facilities, the same place can be reached in about 16 hours.

I returned home in November over the same routes, occupying about the same time only we rode about 40 miles on a rail, that is, one of the through braces upon which the body of the coach rested broke and we thrust a rail under it, and so bumped along until we reached Jackson.

The Frog Pond in Paw Paw

The middle of November 1843, winter set in and except two weeks in January following it was good sleighing until along into April.

We went to town meeting in a sleigh. I, at the time, voted in Antwerp. The sleighing was excellent with 18 inches of snow on the ground. It melted rapidly soon after, but was not all gone until past the middle of the month. Many of the settlers were short of feed and were obliged to browse their cattle by cutting down elm and basswood trees. Old straw stack bottoms were dug out of the snow for the poor beasts to eat.

Deer were wonderfully tame but very poor and they would come and browse with the cattle. Many of our citizens can remember when a frog pond several rods across, existed between the present Paw Paw M. E. Church and parsonage. Its waters were not 20 or 10 feet deep as is reported, but 3 or 4, deep enough for a home for the festive bull frogs whose music had to be accepted by the early pioneers as a substitute for a brass band.

Many now living remember when that pond was filled up and how John Littlejohn, a brother of the judge, assisted in the work by rallying and leading the citizens in the good work, and many pieces of bad road in the county were repaired through his influence. He had formerly been a Presbyterian clergyman in western New York and was very eloquent and influential. He inaugurated a temperance movement here which permeated the entire region round about, hundreds signed the pledge until a roll 20 feet long was completed. He held a temperance camp meeting in a grove near Nauvoo and a great crowd attended. "The Old Oaken Bucket" and "The Cottage on the Hill" were the favorite songs. I hardly think the courthouse has, since those meetings, ever contained such enthusiastic audiences.

D. Woodman.

(Chapter XII)

First in the County

The first deed on record in this county bears the date of November 30th, 1831. The first deed recorded after the county was detached from Cass was April 7th, 1837. The first mortgage was dated October 13, 1835. The first marriage on record was George S. Reynolds to Rebecca Luke, July 24, 1836, by D. O. Dodge, justice of the peace.

In 1839 there were only seven townships in this county and the total valuation of property, real and personal as assessed, was $473,791.

The first time party lines were drawn was in the presidential campaign of 1840, when General Harrison defeated Martin Van Buren. This was called the hard cider and log cabin campaign. I cast my first vote at the spring election of 1839 and voted for Van Buren for president in 1840, and have voted at every presidential election since, except in 1852, when in California.

Only occasionally do we find a man who voted here in 1840. The two great parties of that day were called Democratic and Whig. This was 20 years before the Republican party was born.

From 1837 to 1852, 95 wolves were killed in the county. The greatest number killed in any one year was 24 in 1839. Bounties to the amount of $923 were paid for their scalps.

A panther was seen in the swamp this side of Lawrence in the summer of 1835, but I think none were ever killed in the county. Bears were quite numerous in southwest Paw Paw one season. Some were killed in the vicinity of Three and Four Mile lakes.

In the fall of 1851 the county was swarming with black squirrels. They appeared to be migrating south. They destroyed much corn near the woods. A good gunner could kill as many in half a day as he could carry. But killing them did not seem to diminish their numbers. Since that time they have entirely disappeared.

County Buildings

The first jail was built in 1839 near where the Alonzo Shutz residence now is. It was built of hewn logs two stories high, was about 20 by 30 feet and the upper story was occupied by the sheriff as a residence. The cost of the structure was $574. Richardson, Avery and Williamson, masons, had the job.

I once startled 15 deer that were lying in a fallen tree top, where the jail was afterwards built. It was not often that so many were seen together. In August, 1844, the court house was completed. Henry W. Rhodes did the mason work and Godfrey and Churchill did the other work. The building cost $4,000.

In 1856 our present jail was completed. It was built by the citizens of Paw Paw as a compromise upon the removal of the county seat question.

Our county poor farm was purchased in 1866. 173 acres at $40 per acre. Our fire-proof building was erected in 1875 at a cost of $4,000. The citizens of Paw Paw contributed one-half of that amount.

The first paper published in the county was the Paw Paw Democrat, in 1843. Its existence was very brief. In 1845 the Paw Paw Free Press was established, and it has been continued under different names and by various parties ever since.

First Citizens of Paw Paw

The first lawyer in the county was A. W. Broughton, who settled in Hamilton in 1839. He was the first prosecuting attorney in the county and received $50.00 for his first year's service.

Frederick Lord was the first lawyer who settled in Paw Paw. He was prosecuting attorney for 1844 and 1845. He was county judge for two years and county treasurer one term.

The first physician who settled in the village was Dr. Levi H. Warner, who came here with his family in the fall of 1835. The first religious meeting ever held in the county (as far as we know) was held in a slab shanty in Paw Paw in April, 1835, by Junia Warner, Jr., a Methodist preacher (father of Elam and Jerome Warner) who were here looking for land. During that fall a Methodist class was organized here with 18 members. All of those have passed away.

The first church built in the village of Paw Paw, or the county, was the old M. E. church in 1844, on the place where the present church now stands. I think Williamson Mason was the first carpenter who settled here. C. G. Harrington of Lawton was the first shoemaker; Craig Buys the first blacksmith; George Smith the first tailor; a man by the name of Baker was the first cooper; Calvin Hawley the first foundry man; J. H. Simmons the first cabinet maker and J. W. Ball the first undertaker.

County Fairs

The first murder committed in the county was in 1853 near Breedsville by a man named Reynolds. I think the man killed was a Mr. Lewis, whose home Reynolds had invaded. The murderer was sent to Jackson for life and died there several years later. Murders are now so frequent in this county that they attract little interest and are accepted as a matter of course.

The Van Buren County Agricultural Society was organized in 1850 with J. R. Monroe as president. The first fair was held in the court house square, the stock being tied to trees, and the court room was used as floral hall. In 1852 the second fair was held on the same grounds. In 1853 it was held at Lawrence. The next year on ground owned by Peter Gremps, south of the Sherman pond and west of the old Lawton road. In 1870 the ground west of the river, now occupied by the Cleveland Bay Horse Company, was purchased and nicely fitted up. Fairs were held there with various successes for many years, but like many other county societies it succumbed to the debt it was carrying, and passed into other hands.

The Van Buren County Pioneer Association was organized in 1872 with J. R. Monroe president. Mr. Monroe was president until his death in 1877. Then Eaton Branch until his death. J. J. Woodman is and has been for several years president. (This was a good many years ago.) The annual meeting of this association is to be held at South Haven June 6th and we hope and expect to see present on that occasion all the old pioneers who can possibly attend. Also the younger people, children, grandchildren and great grandchildren of the old pioneers.

D. Woodman.

Van Buren County's First Settler

The first white settler of Van Buren county was Dolphin Morris of Decatur. He was born in Loudoun county in the northerly point of Virginia, August 16, 1798. His father was poor and he was, early in life, thrown on his own resources, and turned his attention to agricltudre. Being sober and industrious he had no trouble in leasing land on shares, and in a few years had laid by a small fortune for that day and age.

March 27, 1823, at the age of 24, he married Nancy Beaver, 18. Three children were born to them there, Samuel, Zarilda and Amos.

In July, 1828, Dolphin, and Samuel Morris, his father, came to the almost unbroken territory of Michigan to see the country. On the first of November of the same year the father and sons, Dolphin, Samuel, John and James, with their families and earthly possessions, started for Michigan to make their future homes.

They arrived at the home of Joseph Gardner, a relative, at Pokagon on the first day of December and remained there for the winter.

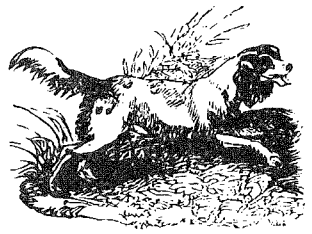
During that winter Dolphin traveled over the country and located land on the south half of section 35, township of Decatur, on the north side of Little Prairie Ronde.

In February he returned to his location and cut the logs for a cabin which he built, and on the 20th of March, 1829, his family moved in.

Here was born, August 4, 1830, Lewis Creighton Morris, the first white child born in the county, but the little fellow lived only until the 20th of December of the same year.

Elias Morris was born May 11, 1832, and he had the distinction for many years of being the oldest living white child born in the county. He died in the village of Decatur near the turn of the century.

Dolphin Morris was one of the original stockholders of the First National Bank of Paw Paw which was organized in 1865.



Chapter XIII

First Settlers

I will now try to give the time of settlement of the several townships in the county, the names of a few of the first settlers, by families and the name of the first supervisor, etc., as far as I am able.

Antwerp was organized as a township in 1837. It was settled in 1835, by the families of Joseph Woodman, Joel Tomlinson, Jesse Abbe, Joshua and Theophilus Bangs, and John Cooper. During 1836 Phillip Moon, John Hunt, Samuel Wells, Anthony Cory, the Harwicks, the Weldons, Van Antwerps, Longstreets, Fitches, Markillies, Wells Gray, John McKinney, Williams, Holmes, Lyon, Lull, Gates, Taylor, Bingham and Surdam settled in the township. The latter is yet living there and Mrs. John Hunt is now residing in Kalamazoo. I believe the last two named persons are the only ones now living who were married and settled in the township during the year of 1836.

The first postmaster was Rezin Holmes, whose residence was on the Territorial road on the east line of the township and county. The first supervisor was M. L. Fitch.

Arlington-Almena

Arlington became a separate organization in 1842. The first settler was William Taylor, followed by Heaths, Harris, Briggs, Bridges, Hard, Dykman, McGeorge, Ives, Stevens, Hogmires, Cochran and others.

In 1839 there were seven taxpayers in the township. In 1844 there were 23. Major Heath was the first supervisor. In an early day there was a postoffice on the Breedsville road in the township and I think the postmaster's name was Gage.

Almena's first inhabitant was Derosier, a Canadian Frenchman. He had a squaw for a wife and they squatted near the swamp, on the Indian trail that led from Grand Rapids to Chicago in 1833.

He was an Indian trader, trapper, a guide and interpreter. This was a camping place for the Indians who traveled over the trail in an early day. Moussean, also a Canadian Frenchman, with a deaf mute squaw for a wife, was a companion of Derosier. Many of our citizens can remember those notables. I think they both died in the fifties.

Jonas Barber was the first actual settler in the spring of 1835, followed by Elder Junia Warner, Jr., his father Junia, Horace Bonfoey, Asahel S. Downing, the Anables, Barnums, Newcombs, Eagers, Abbotts, Burns, Benton, Plunck, Turner, Tonney, Fisk, Mills, Currier, Stevens, Showerman, Markillie, Stoughton, and many others.

In 1836 C. M. Morrill, Livermore, Currier and Brown for some years afterward operated a saw mill, later known as the Dodge mill, Mr. Dodge buying out the firm.

The voters in the town in 1843 numbered 18; in 1844, 34, and in 1845, 54. Charles M. Morrill was the first supervisor. Lawrence Brewer was the first postmaster south of the swamp and Doc. Babbitt north of the swamp.

Bloomingdale-Bangor

Bloomingdale was organized in 1845 but did not become a separate township until 1849. The first settlers in 1837 were the three Myers brothers, their mother and two sisters. Later Ashbell Herron, Robinson, Peck, Hogmire, Humphrey, Smith, Brotherston, Scott, Thayer, Todd, Frary, Lane, Cooleys, Havens, Greaves, Howard, Killefer and others too numerous to mention.

At the first township election in 1845, 17 votes were polled. Elisha C. Cox was the first supervisor and Henry Killefer the first postmaster.

Bangor became a separate township in 1837 with Charles U. Cross as the first settler, followed soon after by John Smith and John Southard. Then Caleb Northrup, Mansel M. Briggs, Daniel Taylor and family and Perry Northrop.

In 1839 there were 8 taxpayers in the township, and the taxes were $22.62. In 1845 the taxpayers numbered 22, among whom were the Kemp brothers, Bancroft, Potter, J. Ball, Charles and Daniel Taylor, Wood, Hoppin, Brown, W. H. Hurlbert.

Daniel Van Auken settled in the township in 1846, Aaron, his father, came the same year, and made his son's house his home. In April, 1850, he became lost in the woods. Though hundreds of men searched for days he could not be found.

The following summer his remains were found at the outlet of Mud lake where he had wandered and was drowned. John Van Auken, a pioneer of 1845 resides on his farm opposite where his brother Daniel formerly lived.

Dean, Ripley, Craft, Kingston, Watkins, Thomas, Williams, Charles and others were early settlers. Mansel M. Briggs was the first supervisor. The first postmaster was Joseph H. Nyman, one of the most enterprising citizens of Bangor village.

Columbia-Covert

Columbia was organized in 1845. The first settlement in 1835 by Elder Hinckley, Silas Breed, Wm. N. Taylor, Samuel Watson, J. N. Howard, Amos S. Brown and William A. Babbitt. In 1837 Knowles, Bridges, Cochrane, D. Manley, and Myron Haskins. Other settlers were the Barbers, Smith, Sawtell, Chappell, Richards, Pike, Bugbee and Moore. Peter Smith was the first supervisor and John Collins was the first postmaster. Taxpayers in 1845 were 24.

Covert's name was changed from Deerfield in 1876. Earliest settlement in 1845 by Benoni Young, Mathias Farnum, Peters, Dobbyn, Fish, Beal, Lampson, McConnell and others. The Packards so well known in the county came later. William A. Dell was the first supervisor. In 1856 there were 20 taxpayers in the township. I cannot say who the first postmaster was.

Chapter XIV

Decatur Township 98 Years Old

Decatur became a separate township in 1845, Porter being detached from it that year. It has the distinction of receiving the first white settler in Van Buren county.

Dolphin Morris, and family from Ohio settled in what is now Decatur township in April, 1829, and for two years they were the only white settlers in the county.

Mr. Morris' log cabin had a historic record. Beneath its roof occurred the first birth and death. In it was preached the first sermon, and in it the first school was taught in the county.

Elias Morris was born in 1832, and now residing in Cass county, is the oldest living person born in the county. Dolphin Morris continued a resident of Decatur until his death in 1870. Many of us well remember the genial countenance of uncle Dolphin, who was frequently seen in our village in an early day.

He was one of the stockholders that organized the first National Bank and for three years prior to his death was one of its directors.

I threshed for Dolphin and Samuel Morris, LeGrand Anderson and A. B. Copley in about 1845, with the little machine mentioned in a former article. Mr. Copley at that time was living with his mother and sisters on the prairie in Cass county. It was on the Dolphin Morris place where his son Henry and wife were so dastardly and cruelly murdered in September, 1879.

In 1836 the residents of southern Decatur were Dolphin and Samuel Morris, LeGrand Anderson, George Tittle, John Eckenberger, H. Swift, Daniel Curry, the Van Hises, Thomases, Scott and others. The northern part of the township had very few settlers until the Central R. R. reached there in 1848. Previous to that time it was our favorite hunting and fishing resort.

Decatur village is and has been since its settlement, a business center, market, and shipping place for the products of the surrounding country. Its citizens have developed much "push" in making Decatur what it is.

In 1844 Stephen Kinney was supervisor. Previous to that date the records of the township are missing. George Sherwood, appointed in 1852, was the first postmaster.

Geneva Township

Geneva did not become a separate township until 1854 being for some years previous a part of Columbia. At the spring election of that year 22 votes were cast. Clark Pierce settled there in 1842, and for two years was the only settler in the township. The next settlers were Eaton, Eastman, Miner, Chappell, Hoag, Hogmire, Bennett, Tubbs, Watson, Davey, Bates, Welch, Lane, Kelley, Phillips, Brooks, Knowles, Shaefer, Lull, and others.

In 1847 Marvin Hannahs of Albion built a saw mill, and the next year a tannery on Black river, and the place was called Jerico for many years afterwards. Nathan Tubbs was the first supervisor.

Hartford

Hartford became a separate township in 1840. The first permanent settler was Fernando Olds, and he moved into his log cabin on January 25, 1837. His brothers, Hezekiah and John came in soon after and Ira and Harry later. Then the Conklins, B. A. Olney, James Spinning, Horace Dowel, the Wilcox family, Johnson, Thomas, the Ruggles family; later the Delongs, Taylors, Fabius Miles and others. Mr. Miles was well known in this county. He built a saw mill on the Paw Paw river, he commenced it in 1844, and continued in the mill business until 1860.

He was a member of the lower house of the Michigan legislature in 1858. The first supervisor was Joseph Ruggles. The first postmaster was James Griffin. The postoffice was established in 1855.

Hamilton

Hamilton. The first land entry in this township was made by Robert Nesbitt, April, 1835. He soon after erected a saw mill on Brush creek, and afterwards a grist mill. James, brother of Robert Nesbitt, settled in the township the same year. Many of us remember his tragic death in his well in 1849.

The Johnsons, Barney, Lumbards, Geers, McClintock, Howell, Hale, Wakefield, Bartlett, Henry Coleman, Marcus Merryman, the Fields, Osborn, Barneys, Philotus Haydon, Captain Hendryx, A. W. Broughton and others were early settlers in the township. Several of the persons mentioned were conspicuous citizens as pioneers as well as politicians.

Henry Coleman was the first postmaster. In the old Brown tavern the office was kept, also a store from 1838 to about 1848.

Keeler became a full fledged township by the detachment of Hartford in 1840. The first to come into the township was John and James Nesbitt, in the summer of 1824. The next summer they sold to W. H. Keeler, who became a settler there in the spring of 1839. Tobias Byers was the first permanent settler.

The Keelers, Hills, Theodore Phelps, Wm. Earl, Dodge, the Fosters, Hungerfords, Sixes, all settled in the township in 1836 or 1837. James Hill was the first supervisor, W. H. Keeler was the first postmaster. The postoffice was kept at the Keeler place until 1856, then moved to Keeler village.

Chapter XV

South Haven

South Haven was one of the seven townships into which Lafayette was divided in March, 1837. It then contained the territory of Bangor, Columbia, Geneva and Deerfield (now Covert).

The first to explore the region where South Haven now is, was J. R. Monroe and he built a house there in 1833. He was a bachelor then and a family by the name of Thomas occupied the house for a time. Then a family named Fink lived there until 1836, then Henry Monroe, a brother of J. R., occupied the house for a short time.

I think it was in 1836 that J. R. Monroe and C. U. Cross laid out a road from Paw Paw to South Haven. The road ran as direct from one place to the other as practicable, crossing the river where it now does, and leading in a northwesterly direction regardless of section lines.

John Reynolds, a Mr. Brooks, and another man had a job of cutting the timber in the roadway for some miles beyond what is now the old Monroe farm. I called on the choppers soon after they commenced their job in the winter of 1836-7. They occupied a "dug out" in the side of a hill all under ground except the front. They had a little stove but no windows in their little cabin, or rather cave. But they were stalwart men and knew how to wield the axe. A grind stone was near at hand, upon which the bright steel was ground and polished.

Such axes and their wielders are few at the present time. But the political axes, ax-men and cranksmen are so numerous at present that they fairly tumble over one another in order to get at the machine. Among their supplies for the inner man was an even half bushel of pork and beans they had just laid siege to. That was the way job or pioneer work was done here 58 years ago. That road was opened and used for several miles, and years, but was afterwards changed to section lines.

First Settlers

In 1838 Daniel Pierce came from Schoolcraft to South Haven with the first horse team that was ever driven there. He was quite a trapper, securing thirteen wolf scalps in 1838, receiving for each a bounty of $13.00. He said he had seen 17 Indian canoes at the mouth of the river at one time.

Late one fall, I think in 1838, a schooner was wrecked at the mouth of the river. Part of its cargo was apples. Some of them were brought here and though they had been frozen, they were a treat to us. In 1841 an effort was made to open a mail route from South Haven to Schoolcraft, but after one trial it was given up as no postmaster could be found at the Haven.

In the spring of 1845, Clark Pierce and family moved into Monroe's cabin and in July following moved into a frame house which had recently been erected. This was the first frame house west of Bangor.

In 1849, the fourth of July was celebrated at South Haven by Clark Pierce, a Mr. Wood, and C. B. Cross with their families, who came down from what is now Geneva.

Marvin Hannahs of Albion sent Capt. J. R. Hendryx and Joseph Sturgis to South Haven in 1852 to manage his business. Mr. Hannahs platted the village that year. Alpha and Nelson Tubbs came there in 1852. S. B. Morehouse and Doctor Hathaway settled there in 1845.

In the fall of 1852, A. S. Dyckman was sent by Everett B. Dykman from Schoolcraft on a trip of exploration down the Black River, the result of which was the purchase of a tract of land by the two Dyckmans of Schoolcraft.

A. V. Pantlind and C. H. Morrill of Paw Paw, Barney H. Dyckman, Rudolph Densmore, J. H. Davis, Marshall Hale, Samuel P. Wilson, Rodney Hinckley, Peter Davis, Uzziah Conger, W. H. Hurlburt, Wm. Dyckman and others were early settlers in the township.

Our genial friend Liberty H. Bailey settled in Arlington in 1842, residing there eleven years, then moved to South Haven. He is one of the great fruit growers of that magnificent fruit belt. Joseph Sturgis was the first postmaster appointed in 1855, but was soon succeeded by S. B. Morehouse. The first supervisor was Perrin N. Northrup. The first school was taught by Miss Ella Barnes in the summer of 1852, seven pupils attending.

Waverly

Waverly was originally a part of the township of Clinch which was the name of one of the seven townships into which Van Buren county was divided in 1837. In 1842 Clinch was divided into two townships, the western one was named Waverly, and the eastern part Almena. At the first election in Waverly after the division in 1842, there were but 13 voters, almost two offices to each voter. Very likely the office sought the man rather than the man the office as at present.

Bloomingdale was set off from Waverly in 1845. In the fall of 1836 M. H., M. M., R. J. and W. H. H. Myers, all brothers, their mother and two sisters located in Clinch. After the township was divided a part of the family became residents of Waverly and a part residents of Bloomingdale. In 1839 Loren Hurlburt and Jacob Finch settled in the south part of Waverly. Isaac Brown, Zera Taylor, Regin Bell and William Murch settled in the township the same year. Philo Herron, Almon B. and Anson Covey located in Waverly in 1841. John Scott located in the north part of the township in 1843. At first he was obliged to bring grists to Paw Paw on his back, crossing the river on a fallen tree sometimes after dark.

Joseph Cox became a settler in 1843. In 1852 he started for California but died in Nebraska and was buried on the plains. Byron Bangs of Paw Paw, son of Theopolis Bangs, died about the same time, and near the same place. They died of small pox. We passed the tent where they died in that then wilderness country.

The Armstrongs settled in Waverly in 1844 and Isaac Spaulding, Peter Valleau and John Reed came the same year. Westcott, Thayer, Marble, Newcomb, Carr, O. A. Breck, the Shaws and Rogers families, J. L. Fox and Benjamin Smith were also early settlers in the township. In 1852 there were 30 voters in the township.

The School House War

The famous school house war occurred in 1854, caused by the attempt to locate a site for a school house in district No. 8. After four changes of the site and the erecting and pulling down of one frame, engendering much bad blood (though none was shed) the matter was finally settled.

William Heald built a saw mill in 1861 at now Glendale, which was afterwards owned by S. H. Jones who is a resident of our village.

The great huckleberry swamp was the resort of the merry berry pickers, Indians as well as white from the region around about. Wading in the water and watching for massassaugers, fighting flies, hornets and mosquitoes, lunching on green cucumbers and cold victuals, lugging berries a mile or more to where the teams were left, then driving ten or a dozen miles to reach home, might be a fair sample of pioneer life. The first supervisor was M. A. Myers. The postoffice first called Lement was established in 1868 with William D. Lane as postmaster.

Chapter XVI

Lawrence Township

Lawrence township was organized in 1837, and included Hartford and Arlington. Hartford was set off in 1840 and Arlington in 1841. In June, 1835, Stephen Fountain made a beginning on the west shore of Freeman's, afterwards Christie's, and now Prospect Lake. Fountain was a bachelor and a noted boatman on the Paw Paw river during the years of 1835 and 1836, but disappeared soon after.

John Allen founded the village of Mason, afterwards Brush Creek, and now Lawrence, in June of the same year, but he never was a resident of the county.

John R. Haynes, Thomas Camp, George and John Reynolds, James Grey, Eaton Branch, and possibly a few others were Lawrence settlers in 1835. Israel Branch, Orrin Sutton, Horace Stimpson and Joseph Haynes settled in the township in 1836.

Honored Pioneer Settler

J. R. Monroe, one of Van Buren county's most eminent and honored citizens settled permanently in Lawrence in 1837, though he had been a resident of Michigan most of the time since 1826, being engaged with General Cass in locating western lands. He continued to reside in Lawrence after his settlement there, until his death in 1876.

I remember calling at Mr. Monroe's little log cabin one cold day during the winter of 1837. His cabin stood near a little brook that crossed the road a little southeast of where the old homestead now stands. Mr. Monroe had recently married and was enthusiastic over the future, when he would have a commodious residence and a family around him. How fully his anticipations were realized, the premises and family of that old pioneer plainly show. Today after fifty-seven years, that little brook seems as young and sprightly as ever while my venerable pioneer sister, Mrs. Monroe and myself and a few others are left as witnesses of early pioneer life and events of nearly sixty years ago.

First Settlers of Lawrence

Urial T. Barnes settled on the farm now occupied by his son, A. U. Barnes, in 1838. A. H., Theodore and N. H. Phelps, H. P. Barnum, R. B. Danks, Nelson and Harvey Marshall, Peter, David and James Dopp, Roderic Irish, Barney and Daniel Evans, Warner Van Vleet, Gen. Chadwick and a few others were early settlers in the township.

The Lawrence postoffice was established in 1837 with Horace Stimson postmaster. John R. Haynes was the first supervisor, elected in April, 1837. Lawrence was the head of navigation on the crooked Paw Paw for several years prior to the completion of the Michigan Central railroad in 1848. J. R. Haynes built a warehouse there and a large amount of business was carried on with St. Joseph by means of the river.

I first visited the place during the fall of 1835. John R. Baker of Paw Paw, after becoming the owner of considerable property in Brush Creek, had the name changed to Lawrence after the name of the township. It is said that on one occasion he directed a stranger to Chadwick's mill, who had inquired for Brush Creek, explaining afterwards that he would teach him not to call his bright little village by the ugly name of Brush Creek.

That old mill is still known as Chadwick's mill. The general said it was called "Chad's old mill" or "old Chad's mill," according to one's fancy.

First Settlers in Pine Grove in 1839

Pine Grove, by an act of the legislature became a separate organization in 1849. There were 27 taxpayers in the township at that time, and the amount of taxes levied that year was $19.07.

The first settlers within the boundaries of the township were Joseph H. Hawks in 1839, and a man named Stone in 1840. No other permanent settlement was made until 1847.

In 1848 Messrs Morrill and Dyckman erected a saw mill known as the old Pine Grove mills. In 1849 besides Morrill and Dyckman, D. C. Lockman, C. B. Palmer, E. Taylor, P. T. Valleaw, J. Waterman, E. B. D. Hicks, U. Stearns, I. and F. Southward, F. T. Bowen, Pettibone, Wolcott, Brewer, Love, Clark, Greenwood, Frary, Brown and others settled in the township.

William B. Clement erected a saw mill in the township in 1851 and in 1852 the Wise family settled there. The Pine Grove mills postoffice was established in 1857, David D. Wise, postmaster. C. M. Morrill was the first supervisor elected in April, 1849.

Pine Grove derived its name from the fact that pine timber grew there extensively and for many years lumbering was extensively carried on there.

The Kalamazoo and South Haven railroad was completed to Pine Grove mills station in 1870. The township was bonded for $12,000 which was contested in the courts as illegal, but in the end the township had to pay $26,000 principal, interest and costs.

Porter Township

Porter township was originally a portion of Decatur from which it was set off in 1845. Both Porter and Decatur were named after those marvelous heroes whose names they bear. The first township meeting was held in April, 1845, when 45 votes were cast.

Abner Mack bought land and made a beginning in the township in 1833, but soon moved away when Milton Van Dusen occupied the place. James who with his wife and seven unmarried children, a married son and a son-in-law, settled in the township that year. Nelson and Sanford Corey both young men, George Wilson and Mathew Lewis, settled in the township in 1836.

The Mungers, Alexander, Moses, Monroe, Maxam, Wilson, Longcoys, Harpers, Locks, Bradt, Markle, VanSickle, Gould, Weldon and Gibson were all among the early settlers in the township.

Judge Monroe was for many years County Poor Commissioner, and his residence was known as the poormaster's house. One day while the judge was at work in a ditch, a tramp or traveling pauper came along with the inquiry, "Where is the poor master's house?" and upon the judge pointing it out, without revealing himself, continued with a look of curiosity, "Do you work for him?" "Yes," replied the judge. "And what does he give you for working?" "Oh, he gives me just what he has himself," was the judge's answer. "Pork and beans, potatoes, Johnny cake and old clothes." "Well," says the tramp, "if that's all a fellow can expect I'll not stop with the old hedgehog," and away he went in the search of more congenial quarters.

Asa Hinckley

Asa S. Hinckley, a pioneer of 1835, who first settled on the George Breck farm west of the village, whose widow 88 years of age now resides in our village, and whose sons, Lyman and Henry, now old pioneers reside in west Paw Paw, was a man of sterling integrity and firm as the everlasting hills in his convictions of right and wrong.

In his younger days he sometimes took something to warm him when cold and cool him when warm. But as he grew older he also became wiser, in fact he struck against liquor of all kinds and in all places. He would not sell a hoop pole if it was to be used upon a whiskey barrel, nor a bushel of corn for the manufacture of whiskey.

On one occasion a man with a bottle of the stuff in his pocket started to ride home with Mr. Hinckley. He spied the bottle and stopping his team, said, "My horses can't haul that whiskey. They won't move another step until that bottle gets out." The man got out with his bottle, then the team moved quietly along. If the men of today had the 'sand' that Mr. Hinckley possessed, the great crying evil of our day would cease.

Canoe Voyage of Gen. Cass

A clipping from an old newspaper giving an account of General Cass's canoe voyage in 1821 might be interesting to your readers, so I will give it to you. It is from a copy of the Geneva Gazette of October 3rd, 1821. The entire sheet is about the size of one page of an ordinary paper, and it was published weekly by Joseph Bogart at $2.50 a year.

As a curious coincidence I may mention that seven columns are devoted to the constitutional convention then in session in Albany. The leading man was Martin Van Buren. A number of merchants advertise their goods, and I noted that iron is seven cents a pound and nails ten cents.

"Sweeny's luck office" advertises lottery tickets, the lowest prize being $12.00, while the highest is $30,000. Philip Church offers land for sale in Nunda and Angelica, and payment can be made in farm produce.

The most remarkable thing, however, in this ancient sheet is the way in which Gen. Cass went to Chicago to hold a treaty with the Indians, and this I believe to be the most wonderful canoe voyage in American history.

Let the reader trace on the map, the following route from Toledo to Chicago, which is thus given in the Geneva Gazette.

"Gen. Cass on his route to Chicago ascended the Maumee to Fort Wayne; from there his canoe was carried over a portage of about nine miles to the head of the Wabash. This river he descended to the Ohio and then descended the Ohio to the Mississippi. The latter he ascended to the mouth of the Illinois, one of whose tributaries approaches within ten miles of Chicago."

The reader will see that in order to avoid a land journey of 300 miles through a wilderness, a circuitous course of five times that distance was endured. In this manner the government agent reached Chicago, where he held a council with the Indians.

The direct journey can be made now in as many hours as it then took weeks, and during the extraordinary canoeing the party probably lived on fish and game. The route took them past St. Louis, and yet this was then the easiest and safest way of reaching their destination.

If General Cass had kept a diary of that journey it would be one of the most interesting things of the kind in our history.

Chapter XVII

The Landlord of Lafayette

In my notes on the early settlement of the several townships in the county, I omitted Lafayette, or Paw Paw. Having, near the commencement of my articles, noted many of its early events, I will relate a few incidents connected with the early settlement of the county.

Jesse Abbe opened a tavern in a log house he erected in the summer of 1835. It stood on the south side of the road near the little pond west of the Morgan L. Fitch farm in Antwerp. He was a very devout and conscientious old gentleman, honest as the day was long, and "well, I declare," was a common expression with him.

One night a traveler asked for accommodations over night stating that he had no money but would pay him on his return. Stay, of course you can stay, and pay me when you can. I've had lots of such customers and have never turned any of them away.

The stranger stayed over night, and several days later he called at the tavern and asked Mr. Abbe if he did not remember of his staying with him and not paying his bill. "I don't remember," said Abbe, "Lots of folks have done the same thing. If you stopped here pay me what you please."

After receiving his money he said, "Hurrah for an honest man. Such a thing has never happened before since I've kept this tavern and I have trusted a great many people."

At one time a neighbor came to borrow the old man's oxen. "Haven't any oxen," said Mr. Abbe. "Why, there they stand," exclaimed the neighbor. "Oh!" said the old man, "those are not my oxen. They belong to the Lord, but I suppose if you want to borrow them the Lord will have no objection."

Calling on Mr. Hunt while working in a field of corn, he said, "Neighbor Hunt, this is a fine field of corn, but you don't deserve it for you don't pray enough." "Very well," replied Mr. Hunt, "You pray and I will hoe and we will see which will raise the best corn."

The old man had a lad in his employ who had rather rest than work and he would suggest that they go into the grove for a season of prayer. The old man, pleased with the pious growth of the youth's mind would leave his work and pray with the lad, never dreaming that the young scamp was imposing upon him.

Wherever he might be going or whatever he might be doing when the prayerful spirit overtook him he would stop and pray zealously for a long time, his horse standing by.

In a little shanty not far away was where Mr. Abbe's religious worship was held on Sundays. Mr. Abbe called the place his "little Heaven." As he always went barefoot in summer he would carry his shoes and put them on his feet at the door of his sanctuary.

He once cut some red cedar posts on government land, and on being asked whose they were, exclaimed, "Well I declare, you've got me now."

Marries Bazel Harrison's Son

The first marriage in Antwerp was one of Mr. Abbe's daughters to a son of Judge Bazel Harrison, of Prairie Ronde. My father, then a justice performed the ceremony.

Judge Harrison was one of the first settlers on the Prairie, a kind-hearted old gentleman, greatly respected by all who knew him. He was the ideal in Cooper's story of the Bee Hunter. He died at the great age of 103 years.

My father was something of a hunter in his early days, having on one occasion caught a bear by the hind leg, threw him and cut his throat with his jack knife. That happened more than eighty years ago in the old Green Mountain state.

He once strategically captured a depredator upon his corn field. It was in an early day on the farm where he resided that a wild hog, an old sow, would scale his fence and feast upon his corn always in the night time. She jumped the fence at one particular place, so a deep pit was dug inside of the fence, and covered with some loose material as a blind. The next night the old marauder leaped the fence as usual and landed in the pit. She was lassoed, hoisted out, put in a strong high pen, but she could not be tamed or fattened.

I have had some experience with wild hogs and consider them untamable, hence I almost conclude that the devil which entered into the swine on the shore of Galilee did not perish with the swine but migrated to other swine and yet abides in them.

My father, though he killed the bear and captured the devil's strong hold, (the swine) never was a mighty deer hunter as the sequel will show. He did go hunting once and when a deer came near and stopped he raised his rifle but it refused to speak and away went the deer, upon investigation the hunter discovered he had forgotten to cock his gun.

No doubt many a deer owed its escape to similar incidents or the hunter, being suddenly attacked with "buck fever" at the excitement caused by the sudden appearance of the beautiful deer, would fire wide of the mark, and bounding away would go his venison. —D. Woodman

Chapter XVIII

I. W. Willard, A Paw Paw Character

I. W. Willard, so well known in this county, was very eccentric and often sarcastic, uttering his words in a peculiar tone of voice which made them doubly so. He had a way of his own to do things which he persisted in, often to his damage and discomfiture. His employes soon learned that his word was law in managing his business and all they had to do was to follow his directions.

In 1842 Willard owned the land north of Main street where Ed. Gilman, S. Cox and others now reside. I think he broke the land that summer, his men boarding at my father's. When joking him about being a bachelor, he declared that if he could find a widow with nine children he would marry her, if she would consent. But it seemed the opportunity never occurred, as he lived and died a bachelor.

At one time he said he intended to build a church but neither politics nor religion should be preached in it. But the church was never erected, though he did build a kind of a "tower of Babel" on the summit of Prospect Hill which was confounded and grounded not long afterwards.

A man he had hired on his arrival to commence work found Mr. Willard in his lumber yard. He said to the man "Have you a jack knife?" The man said "No." Willard handed him his knife and said, "Now get a stick and sit down on that lumber and whittle until I come round." The man did as directed without asking any questions being, no doubt, well pleased with this way of commencing his work.

On one occasion his men were loading flour on one of his boats at the west bridge. They were letting the barrels roll down carefully on a kind of a ladder, when Willard came along and said, "Boys, why don't you let 'em go?" The men replied, "the barrels will smash if we do." "I tell you, let 'em flicker," said Willard. One was let go and it did smash sure enough. "You were right, go ahead as you were," remarked Willard, and away he went.

He happened to be in his saw mill one day when his sawyer suddenly shut the gate, stopping the saw. Willard wanted to know why he did so. The reply was, "The spring of the log was pinching the saw, liable to spoil it." "I tell you hoist the gate," said Willard. It was done and the saw was doubled up in an instant. Without saying a word he went up town procured another saw and with the remark "there, put that in," went his way.

At one time when he was farming somewhat extensively, a farmer from Illinois was stopping here for a few days. Willard, while driving him around in his buggy showing him his farm, etc., said, "I have 40 acres of corn on the ground." The man remarked that was not much corn as he had 600 acres on his farm in Illinois. Willard stopped his horse and said, "Get out of my buggy," and he did. That was I. W. Willard, pure and simple.

At one time he had a man trying to plow on his land along the river. The ground being soft in the furrow, the oxen could not travel. "Lick 'em," said Willard. "I won't do it," was the reply, "the oxen are not to blame. But if you will furnish a cart I will plow your ground." "I'd like to know how in the devil you are going to plow with a cart," was Willard's reply. But he furnished the cart, and his man attached the plow beam to the apex of the cart near the off wheel, thus enabling the oxen to walk on the unbroken ground, and in that way his ground was plowed.

We remember he established a fish pond on the flats back of the hotel barn many years ago. He had an Irishman in his employ at that time whom he managed to give a "souse" in his pond. He had placed a plank over the water so arranged that it would give way with the heft of a man. Soon after when at work there he directed his man to go out on the plank for something which he did, when down into the water he went. Willard seemed to enjoy the joke very much. Not long after he was caught in a similar trap, set by his man. He crawled out of the water and went his way without uttering a word, nor did he laugh this time.

Mr. Willard was a very generous hearted man and liked to do things for people, but did not like them to thank him for any of his donations. One time he had a pig which he butchered, and cutting it in halves, he took it to a poor widow woman. He carried in one half, and she was so effusive in her thanks that he would not leave her the other half as he had intended to do if she had taken the first half and said nothing. That was his way.

Mr. Willard died in April, 1870, and was buried on a mound he had prepared for that purpose and at great expense. It is on one of the highest points in Prospect Hill cemetery. The mound is some six rods across and seven or eight feet high. In the center stands a plain granite shaft about 8 feet high. Near this monument, solitary and alone, lies the body of I. W. Willard. The mound has a driveway around it on the outside of which is a row or hedge of evergreens. Perhaps it is a fitting place for an eccentric confirmed old bachelor. May his soul rest in peace.

Chapter XIX

Clearing and Cropping the Land

In 1825 my father purchased a parcel of new land among the hills in the northern part of old Vermont, and there my experience as a farmer commenced, which I followed for 60 years. That was before the advent of labor saving machinery for farm or household work.

Our first clearing was three acres near the house; we called it a 'flat', because it was level, and in that rough country it was quite a field to be level.

My first work was assisting in clearing the land, chopping fire wood, preparing oven wood for heating the brick oven, hoeing in rye or oats, and grass seed on the hill sides, which were too steep to plow.

Small grains were all reaped with sickles and all had to be reaped down the hills as it always leaned that way. These steep hillsides were not valuable for anything but pastures after they were cleared.

Large crops of potatoes were raised on the tillable land, from which starch and whiskey were manufactured.

Spring wheat did fairly well on new land. My father sowed five acres one spring and he had 100 bushels. We reaped it with sickles, threshed it with flails and cleaned it with a hand fan. No other farmer raised as much wheat in the township that year.

I remember one summer we were short of bread stuff, and father went three miles and mowed grass for a farmer, receiving for his day's work a bushel of corn, which he brought home on his back. We had no horses at that time, our team work on the farm being done with oxen. The ox cart, wooden plow with an iron point, the old harrow, scythes, sickles, hand rakes, blacksmith-made forks, hoes, axes, shovels, etc., were the implements with which farm work was done.

Schools and Churches

Elliptic springs for carriages had not come into use. The one horse chaise, wide track wagon and concord coach were the vehicles used for pleasure or business on the road.

I have been to mill many times (after we had a horse) carrying on its back a bushel of wheat or corn, but the practice of putting a stone in one end of the bag to make the load balance, had been discarded before that time.

Our common schools were hives of industry and all expenses were paid by rate bills. A school of 60 or 75 scholars was well managed by one teacher who wrote copies, made pens of goose quills, kept the schools in session six hours each day, 22 days for a month, and received for his services from 20 to 30 dollars per month; built his own fires and boarded around.

The meeting house where I attended religious services was a large one story building built during the war of 1812, with pews about 5 feet square, seats on three sides and a door with a lock on it next to the aisle. Each corner pew was set apart for the poor and the pulpit was elevated 8 or 10 feet above the floor. The doctrine of election or fore-ordination, total depravity and miraculous conversions was taught. Sunday schools and missionary work was yet in the future.

Horseback riding was fashionable and a young man and his girl were frequently seen riding the same horse, the girl sitting on a pillow behind her escort.

Walking was considered a healthy and therefore a necessary exercise.

Few were the young ladies, or older ones who could not walk 5 or 6 miles with ease. A marriage license was not required, but the law required that the bans should be announced from the pulpits of all the churches in the vicinity three weeks previous to the time of the intended marriage. During that time any one having any objections could make them to the parson who was to officiate, who decided upon the validity of the objection. If the objections were overruled then the marriage could take place as intended.

Improving Farm Machinery

When I was a boy in Vermont, the first threshing machine I remember of seeing (except flails) was called a hedge hog. It was a huge log filled with projecting spokes, the inner end fastened to an upright post, while to the other end a team was attached which rolled the thing around in a circle, over the grain placed upon the floor. The straw was raked off and the grain cleaned with a hand fan or a rude fanning mill.

I have seen threshing machines propelled by man power consisting of a shaft carrying a large band wheel which drove a small cylinder. On each end of the main shaft was a crank worked by one or two men.

The next machine in use was the stationary power, after whose pattern the railroad elevators were constructed. The frame or bent which supported the horse power had to be very strong and heavy, requiring 30 or 40 men to raise, yet this huge concern was moved from place to place. It would thresh about 100 bushels a day.

Afterwards came the portable machines which could be moved upon wagons. These had to be lifted from the wagons and staked down before use. To these machines a fanning apparatus was attached but no straw carrier. An 8 horse power machine of this kind would thresh and partially clean from 200 to 300 bushels per day.

After a while the mounted power and thresher with separator and straw carrier came, then we were ready to exclaim "eureka."

But we had not found it, though when we see the traction engine hauling the whole paraphernalia of a threshing machine, march into a farmer's field or yard and thresh and nicely clean one or two thousand bushels of grain in a day and nicely stack the straw, we may almost conclude we have arrived at perfection in the threshing business.

Predictions of the Future.

But not so; progression is the order of the day. Electricity is already being harnessed to machinery and is fast superseding steam as a motive power. The scheme of utilizing the lightning that flashes athwart the sky is being discussed by electricians and it is possible the lightning from the sky may be controlled and compelled to drive machinery.

The time will come not long in the future when the great Niagara will not thunder uselessly but will produce lightning that will propel railway trains, street cars, lake and canal boats, light the cities and perhaps haul the farmers' plow and reaper; thrash his grain and propel the family carriage all through the country road about.

Great air ships will be propelled through space by electricity, carrying passengers from place to place with safety. I believe the child is now living who will see all these predictions verified, and more too.

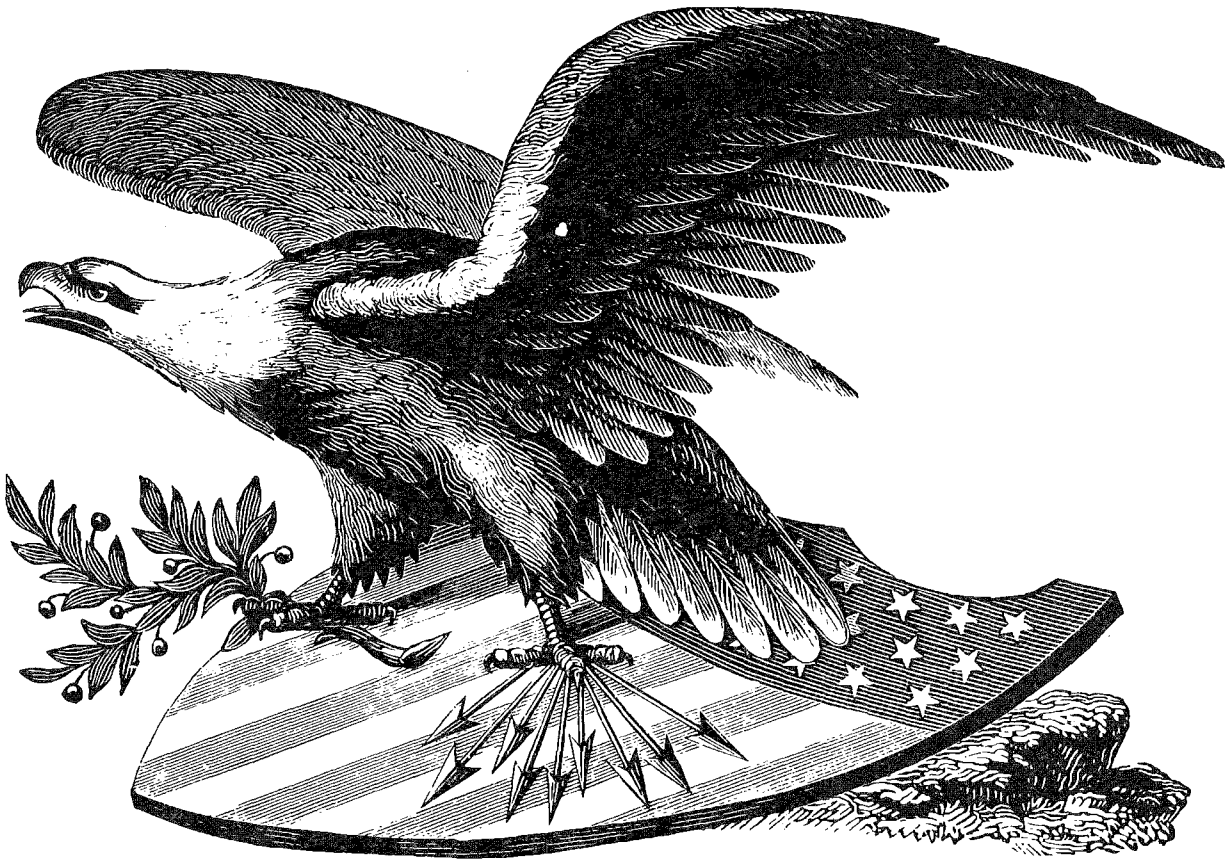
The end.



Stephen Decatur and His Time

By Harry Garrett

CHAPTER I

In 1813 a township in Mifflin Co., Pa., was named Decatur, one of the first communities in the U.S. to be named in honor of our country's greatest hero — Stephen Decatur. There are now fourteen states with a city or town by the name of Decatur.

John Valentine, a former resident of Decatur, Illinois, desired to find out all he could about the man for whom his city was named, and so, set about collecting material with the result, that he acquired an interesting assortment of prints, papers and books on the life and time of Stephen Decatur. He gave this collection to the James Milliken University of Decatur, Illinois — now housed in the University library.

The contents of this collection fall into four groups, which, beside telling us about the man, also tells us about the world in which he lived.

GROUP I — PICTURES
3 steel engravings
(a) Young Mid-shipman
(b) Seasoned officer
(c) Mature man — conclusion of his career

GROUP II — AUTOGRAPHED LETTERS
(a) Letter from Stephen Decatur to the Secretary of Navy
(b) Letter from Susan Decatur, Stephen's wife
(c) Letter written by James Barren to his friend James Brown

GROUP III — NEWSPAPERS
Some published in 1811 to 1812 (25 to 30 papers). Example — The Weekly Register, Baltimore, Sat. Nov. 30, 1811
"...I wish no herald
No other speaker of my living actions
To keep my honor from corrupting
But such an honest chronicler"
Shakespeare – Henry VIII
Printed and published by H. Niles, Water St., near The Merchants Coffee House — $5.00 per annum

GROUP IV — BOOKS
Among the biographies of Stephen Decatur are the following:
(a) The Life and Character of Stephen Decatur (By S. Putnam Waldo — 1821)
(b) Life of Stephen Decatur — (By Mackenzie — 1846)
(c) Decatur (By Irvin Anthony — 1821)

Often times a man's greatness diminishes with the years, but Stephen Decatur shines with a splendid luster in the biography of 1831 — one hundred ten years later.

GROUP IV — HISTORICAL BOOKS
(a) Naval Biography (By Isaac Baily — 1815)
(b) History of the U.S. Navy (By James Fennimore Cooper)
(c) Histroy of the War of 1812 (By Theo. Roosevelt)

This completes our storehouse of facts scattered through the collection like loose beads, which I will gather up and string together on the colorful thread of the life of Stephen Decatur.

II.

BOYHOOD

"Ann," asked Stephen Decatur the elder of his wife one day, "What do you think of my taking young Stephen with me on my next voyage?" Then when he saw the look of anxiety in her blue Irish eyes, he hastily continued: "You know he has never been very strong, always listless and pale. New interests may give him life and warm sea air may put color in his cheeks."

"Yes," his wife replied, "but—"

"I know," broke in her husband, "You are thinking of the lure of the sea and what it may mean."

"Yes," and the mother's voice trembled, "I have always hoped that our boy might be the first Decatur not to follow the sea. You know his grandfather was a lieutenant in the French Navy, and you were a captain in the American."

"And our Stephen," playfully interrupted her husband, "might become a commodore!"

Stephen soon had his wife in good spirits and when the discussion ended it was settled that the boy was to accompany his father on his next trading voyage.

Ann Decatur was very lonely with her husband and son far away. She hoped with all her heart that her child would return well and strong untouched by the charm of the sea. But she was always conscious of the spirit of adventure and the love for ships that had always been in the blood of the Decaturs. She had often heard the story of Etienne (French for Stephen) Decatur, young Stephen's grandfather who had left his native city of La Rochelle, France to seek adventure in the New World. He had settled in Newport, R. I, and had married a Newport girl.

Shortly after the birth of Stephen II, the family moved to Philadelphia. There Stephen grew up and entered the Merchant Marine. She thought of the happy days of her courtship and marriage to Stephen and also the dark days of the War of the Revolution. When war had come Stephen had left the Merchant Marine for the Navy where he had served as captain of the warship Delaware and later of the Philadelphia. She remembered the day that he had come home on a leave of absence and said that it wasn't safe for her in Philadelphia, that he had found an obscure cottage on the east coast of Maryland and that they must go there at once. Then her heartbeat quickened as she thought of the days that followed, for it was there in Worcester County, Maryland that her son Stephen III, our hero, was born on January 5, 1779. Now her remembrances became more tranquil, for after the war had ended, her husband had returned to the Merchant Marine and had established his own trading company, thus giving him more time to spend in his counting house, making only occasional voyages across the sea. It was on one of these occasional voyages that he had taken young Stephen while she kept her lonely vigil on the shore.

Stephen came back much improved in health. There was a smart spring in his step and a bright gleam in his eyes. He had sailed under sunny skies where warm sea air swept across the deck; visited enchanted lands; seen strange peoples; measured distances by days and cities by their splendor. The sea had been his playground and ships his playthings.

Now that he had grown into a strong boy it was high time to seriously consider his schooling. His mother hoped that he might become a minister. He was sent to an Episcopal School but he found no pleasure in the class room and his ambition was not for the pulpit.

When he had finished his schooling he entered the counting house of his father's business. Still he was not satisfied. His hands longed to fashion a full rigged ship and his heart heard only the distant call of the sea.

Then one day a way to the sea opened up. Joshua Humphries, a designer of merchant vessels and warships (it was he who designed the Constitution) and owner of the country's largest shipyards offered him a position. It was an opportunity he had hoped for and he gladly accepted. His duties at first were to carry orders to the workmen but his natural talent and love of ships brought him rapid advancement and he soon occupied a place of responsibility.

Stephen's love for the sea and his zeal for ships attracted the attention of influential friends who recommended to John Adams to appoint him midshipman.

Stephen's mother had held fast to a slender thread of hope that her son might sometime give up all thoughts of the sea, even when she saw him drawn closer and closer to it. Then one day she stood face to face with the man who would cut that thread. John Adams had come to talk to her about the appointment. It was no easy task to take a mother's son from her and send him to sea on a dangerous career. But John Adams was a wise and understanding man. He talked to her kindly and sympathetically until finally she gave her consent with a brave smile but a fearful heart.

That day Stephen Decatur's boyhood ended. He stood on the threshhold of a brilliant career full of adventures and dangers which he met fearlessly and heroically.

CORRECTIONS

We regret that mistakes should have crept into the first chapter of Mr. Garrett's interesting story of Commodore Decatur. This letter from him names them and those who are saving the series for their scrap books are requested to make the corrections at once.

I am well pleased with the nice job you did in arranging the first installment of "Stephen Decatur." The heads and sub-heads stood out as I would have them.

However there are a few corrections in the text that might be made in case someone wants to keep the article for reference. I don't know if you consider it worthwhile to make them or not. I will give them to you and you can insert a paragraph if you see fit.

Group II—The name "Mottinean" should be Cottinean.

Group III—Under Treasury, "Receipts for 1911" should read "Receipts for 1811."

Group IV—"The Life and Character of Stephen Decatur by S. Putman Waldo—1921" should read 1821.

A few lines further down, "the biography of 1831" should read the biography of 1821.

In the last paragraph, "I will gather up the things together," should read I will gather up and string together.

Sincerely,
Harry Garrett.

RENOWN

"Man overboard!" rang across the deck of the frigate United States. A young midshipman sprang over the rail to the rescue. For this expendable deed he was made a lieutenant. Thus did Stephen Decatur, for it was he who made the rescue, mount the first rung of the ladder of fame.

When peace came after the Revolutionary War, Congress decided that there was no further need of a navy. Accordingly all warships were ordered to be turned into merchant vessels or put up for sale. In June, the last one was sold. The young country was then without a navy to protect its growing merchant marine. Consequently its ships were plundered by every country that sailed a warship. Congress finally became aroused and on March 27, 1794, authorized the construction of six frigates, the largest type warship then built, of which three were completed, the United States, the Constellation, and the Constitution—the first three warships of our modern navy. It was on one of these, the United States, that Stephen Decatur first sailed as a midshipman and on which as we have seen, he received his first advancement.

American shipping continued to be plundered by the sea powers of Europe, France being the chief offender. She even seized ships lying in home ports. The only way to stop this aggression was to build a strong navy. So on April 30, 1798, Congress created the Navy Department with Benjamin Stoddard as the first Secretary of the Navy.

The naval force continued to be strengthened. Merchant vessels were bought and armed. New warships were built. The U. S. warship Delaware commanded by Lieutenant Decatur's father, captured the French schooner, LaCroyable, the first capture made by a ship of the new navy.

Soon America had enough warships to convoy its ships of trade. France began to respect the new navy. In battle its officers were fierce and daring; in victory they were kind and considerate. A French captain who had captured an American ship addressed its captain as follows:

"Captaine you see dat I now use you ver' well, Le Diable! I ver' much fear dat I be take myself by some dem Americaine ship, and I pray Captaine, do tell de Americaine officers dat I treat a you ver' well, so dat dey may treat me ver' well ven I be prisoner, too."

In 1801, after two years of this undeclared war with France, peace was made. The new navy had been successfully launched and Lieutenant Decatur had proved his qualification for greater service to his country in the years that lay ahead.

No sooner had the French menace been disposed of, when trouble developed in a new quarter—the Barbary States on the north coast of Africa. For years they had preyed on European trade and now they began seizing American ships.

America didn't propose to stand for it. A squadron under Commodore Dale was sent to the Barbary Coast. Lieutenant Decatur was assigned to the Essex and his address to his men when they sailed cogently shows his fearlessness and patriotism:

"We are now about to embark upon an expedition which may terminate in our sudden deaths, or perpetual slavery, or our immortal glory. The event is left for futurity to determine. The first quality of a good seaman is personal courage, the second obedience to orders, the third fortitude under suffering; to these may be added an ardent love of country. I need say no more—I am confident you possess them all."

This was the first American squadron ever to enter the Mediterranean. It arrived off the Barbary Coast and blockaded the port of Tripoli.

Commodore Dale was recalled and a second squadron was sent under Commodore Truxtum, with Lieutenant Decatur on the frigate New York. A strict disciplinarian, he was appointed to instruct and discipline the under officers and seamen.

After a brief absence, he returned to America and was given command of the brig Argus, his first ship as commanding officer. He sailed in the Argus for the Mediterranean where, upon his arrival he was transferred to the command of the U. S. Warship Enterprise, joining Commodore Preble who had been sent over with a third squadron.

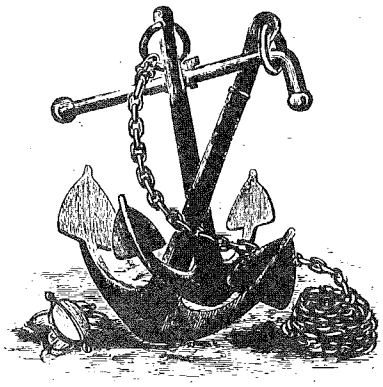
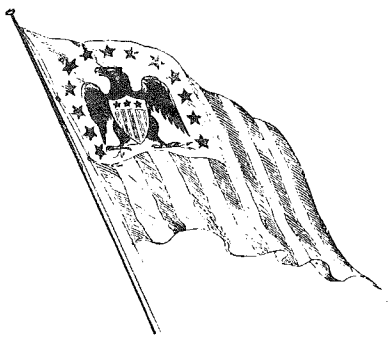
While operating with this squadron, there occurred an incident that brought renown to the navy and made Lieut. Decatur a hero. The American frigate Philadelphia had foundered on a rock near the port of Tripoli, and the Tripolitans had towed it into the harbor, repaired it and added it to their navy. It now lay at anchor a quarter of a mile from the Bashaw's palace. Lieut. Decatur conceived the bold plan to enter the harbor at night and destroy it. The plan was approved, and with seventy tars he set out on his dangerous mission. He quietly slipped into the harbor full of enemy warships and under the guns of the forts on shore reached the Philadelphia, boarded her, over powered the crew, set fire to the ship and escaped without the loss of a man. The story of his brave deed swept round the world. Lord Nelson proclaimed it "the most daring act of the age." For this deed he was made captain at the age of twenty five.

The war with Tripoli went on. Captain Decatur was given command of a division of six gun boats, carrying six guns and two hundred forty men. With this small force he attacked a Tripolitan division of nineteen gun boats with fifty seven guns and seven hundred sixty men. The enemy was severely beaten, but Captain Decatur nearly lost his life. His brother James, who was a midshipman, had been treacherously slain by a Turk. Captain Decatur was determined to avenge him. In a single boat with nine men he charged the whole enemy line, found his brother's slayer, a powerful Turk, who charged him with a heavy iron-spiked pole. Captain Decatur broke his sword, and wounded in arm and breast, fell to the deck with his adversary. Another of the enemy had raised his sword to strike when one of Decatur's men, Reuben James, who had lost both arms, interposed his body between the lifted sword and Decatur's head, and saved his captain's life. In the meantime Captain Decatur had managed to get hold of his pistol and shot the Turk just as he was drawing his dagger.

With Tripoli now effectively blockaded and every Tripolitan ship that put to sea either destroyed or captured, the Bashaw was ready to negotiate. In June 1805, peace was signed ending further molestation by the Barbary powers of shipping the world over. The Pope at that time said: "America has done more for Christendom against the barbarians than all the powers of Europe combined."

Physical courage and bravery brought Stephen Decatur renown.





Death of Charles M. Rawson

1857-1943

Charles M. Rawson died Friday, January 29, at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon. He had been in failing health for a couple of years, but the immediate cause of his death was a fall on the walk in front of his house in which he broke his arm. That was three weeks ago and he was unable to recover from the shock of it.

At the time of his retirement from business about a year ago he was dean of the street. He had followed the bakery and restaurant business all his life and had operated the Kandy Kitchen adjoining the Republican office nearly forty years. He built the building and kept it open to the public as long as his health would permit. In his more active years it was one of the busiest places on the street. Charlie's sandwiches were unbeatable.

Charles M. Rawson was born in New York December 13, 1857, making him 85 years old on his last birthday. His father, Silas M. Rawson, moved his family to Decatur about the year 1860, and left them to answer Lincolns call for soldiers in the Civil War. He served through the war as a veterinary, and following the war was an active citizen of this village until his death at the age of 87.

Charles remembered when the brick were piled out in the street for the building of the three-story building now owned by L. G. Stewart and occupied by Gale's hardware. That was in 1863. He had a brother Frank who died when a young man, but is well remembered by the few who knew Decatur in the sixties and seventies. He also had a brother Albert who became a well to do resident of the city of Chicago and died a few years ago..

Mr. Rawson was first married to Etta Foster of Sturgis and they were parents of one son, Lyle, who died in 1918. He married Catherine Mahoney in 1908 and she passed away in 1937. During his last sickness he has received the best of care in his own home from his brother-in-law, Thomas Mahoney, and Mrs. Mahoney.

Funeral services were held in Holy Family church Monday morning at 9:30, Father Philip J. Cook officiating, and burial was in Lakeside cemetery.

THIS WEEK

The Republican wishes its readers a happy, prosperous, glorious and hilarious 1943.

We do not mean to send out all of these joyous wishes in the beginning,—on New Year's Day. We are not unmindful of the tremendous job our nation still has ahead of it, and of the great sacrifices our boys in the service still must make for home and country. We cannot be over joyous with conditions as they are.

But in the above wish is implied the prayer that 1943 will see the end of this cruel war by the utter defeat of those dictator ruled countries that would destroy the peace and progress of the world.

With the restoration of peace WITH victory there will come in every town, city and gathering place in the United States such an outburst of joyousness as was never before seen by our liberty loving inhabitants.

And the boys will be coming home, yes, the boys will be coming home. From every point of the compass, from every camp in the Union, from the farthest ends of the earth, the boys will be coming home. Will it not then be a glorious 1943, will we not shout till we're hoarse, and wave the flag till our strength, but not our enthusiasm, gives out?

And we will sing in our joy the song of that grand old band leader, Patrick Gilmore,—

When Johnny comes marching home again,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
We'll give him a hearty welcome then,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
The men will cheer, the boys will shout,
The ladies they will all turn out,
And we'll all feel gay
When Johnny comes marching home.

The old church bell will peel with joy,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
To welcome home our darling boy,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
The village lads and lassies say
With roses they will strew the way,
And we'll all feel gay
When Johnny comes marching home.

Get ready for the jubilee,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
We'll give the hero three times three,
Hurrah! Hurrah!
The laurel wreath is ready now
To place upon his loyal brow
And we'll all feel gay
When Johnny comes marching home.

IN MERRIE OLD ENGLAND

Thomas Mahoney received last week a letter from his nephew, Capt. Dr. Thomas Howland, and it came from "Merrie Old England."

Capt. Howland had just landed overseas in a small country town called Sudbury. He wrote that the living quarters are adequate, the food is good and there is plenty of it.

For various reasons he cannot tell when, where and how he arrived in England nor is he able to tell anything he has seen there.

He says, "Will write later and discuss jolly old England a bit."

MARY McCAY

The McCay Family of Early Decatur Days

Mrs. Anne McCay Boggs has given the Republican the story of the McCay family, in response to a request for it in the paper of May 25. We are grateful to be able to record it and make it a part of the history of Decatur. From its beginning before the Civil War to the present time this village has turned out many citizens who have gone out into the world and made records creditable to their home town. None of them have accomplished more and under greater handicap than John and Mary McCay. Their sister, who has favored the Republican with this record, has done as well and was saved from the affliction of blindness. Our thanks go to Mrs. Boggs for her fine letter which will be especially pleasing to the considerable number of people at home and in all parts of the United States who, like herself, keep in touch with the home of their childhood and youth through the Decatur paper.

Mrs. Boggs was a graduate of the Decatur High school in the class of 1883.

Ogden Livingston Mills, a prominent lawyer of New York, served a number of terms in congress, was a captain in the first World War with the American Expeditionary Force in France, was treasurer of the National Red Cross, under Secretary of the Treasury under President Hoover from 1927 to 1932 and Secretary of the Treasury from 1932 until President Roosevelt took over on the 4th of March, 1933. He succeeded to the Secretaryship when Andrew Mellon was sent to London as U. S. Ambassador to Great Britain.

New York, June 24, 1944.

My dear Mr. Moulton:

I have read your comments on the Anthony Mc'K'ay family in the Republican of May 25.

I am Anne McCay Boggs, widow of the late Wm. J. Boggs, an attorney, Secretary to the late Congressman and Secretary of the Treasury, Ogden L. Mills.

We lived in New York and Washington. My brother and sister John and Mary McCay were not born blind. Wrong treatment resulted in blindness—quack doctors in those days. However, when traveling in Iowa, a doctor operated on one of John's eyes with the result that he had quite a bit of light—very useful. Sister's eyes were destroyed. She could see only lightning.

They were graduates of the Michigan School for the Blind, where they studied music — piano and voice. Brother had a great sense of humor.

They decided to give concerts and entertainments.

Miss Keables of Decaur, who studied piano in Conservatory of Music, Chicago, was greatly interested and many evenings invited them to her home to give them the benefit of her training. She and her friend, Miss Davis, vocalist, and John and Mary gave a concert in the Town Hall.

I had a good voice and we were advised and it was intended that I be trained for the stage and travel with my brother and sister.

After graduating from high school I went with brother and sister to Wisconsin. Many were the happy memories of Wisconsin. Among them, in Racine, a gentleman came to our hotel and said: "I knew your father in Marshall, Michigan, and I want you to spend Christmas at my home." (Father had been in the grocery business in Marshall.) He sent his sleigh for us Christmas eve. It was such a pleasure as we could not go home.

They placed in all the front windows of their pretty home large lighted candles. There were banks of snow outside. I never forgot that scene.

In Madison, after singing to a capacity house, we were entertaining the Nuns in their Convent, when a telegram came announcing Father's death. No train until morning.

We came in on the Kalamazoo accommodation, accompanied by two cousins from Chicago. There was a crowd at the station, and as we arose, the lovable Mrs. Thomas, on the train bent over and kissed us.

Dr. Baker met John and hurried away with him. Friends from out of town took Mary and myself.

I remember that Father sold table linen for a time, purchasing from Marshall, Field and Co., Chicago. The bag was light colored, firm and heavy material, the same went over the shoulder for support. Mrs. Thomas, wife of the hardware man, was one of his town patrons.

Father had 80 acres of land in Cass county and 80 acres adjoining the Canning farm. He gave the rest of his life, several years, to his farm next to the good Canning family, where he sold timber, cultivated the land and raised vegetables, etc.

While there one day in March he fell ill. His faithful dog ran to the road and barked for help. Men passing in their wagons got out and followed the dog and found Father and took him home. He died the next day. The Catholic Chapel was not large enough to accommodate all who came to his funeral.

Then Mother was all alone, so it was decided that I study shorthand. Mother sold her farm and went with me to Oswego, New York, where I studied under Prof. Tanner for six months. John and Mary entertained there and in that territory.

So many happy remembrances of Decatur. John and Mary were singing in Joliet, Ill., where John secured for me a position with a prominent law firm. I was their law stenographer and reported all their law cases in the courts. Mother sold her home and we moved to Joliet.

May I tell you, Mr. Moulton, that our home in the lane south of the school was a six room cottage—four rooms downstairs and two rooms and hall upstairs. 3 outside doors, and a 150 foot lot.

Several years ago I was out West, stopped off in Decatur and walked with a friend past the same house in the lane. We had a happy musical home. Father and Mother sang ballads in the home circle.

Father taught us that "money does not make the man." I called to see dear Dr. Rose in his office. He said: "Anna, if John comes back, I'll pack the Town Hall for him." He had a broad smile as he recalled some of John's jokes.

John and Mary lived in New York and traveled in the New England states, where they were well received and made many lasting friendships. I have many, many Press notices. A Boston paper said:
"They are so gracefulthey are fit to appear in any society."

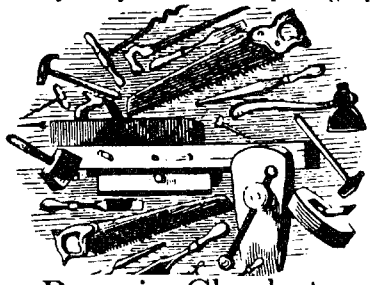
They were in pretty evening dress. They sold their photographs in concerts. Recently, I've been sending what is left where they would be appreciated. A lady in Marshall, Michigan, wrote me::

"I heard them when I was a young girl. They were so handsome, full of talent and gentility that I never forgot them. And now after all these years I should contact you and have for my very own their photographs.



Born in Charleston

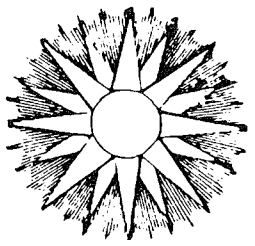
The story of the picture of the Warner school pupils in 1882 printed last week brought memories of his childhood days to Guy Calbetzor.

Harry, Albert, Oliver and Steve Calbetzor attended the Warner school in Volinia when they were children, in 1882.

Guy Calbetzor was born in 1877 and did not begin school there until the next year. Charlie Warner was his first teacher.

The Calbetzors lived in Charleston, on the corner in the center of the town. The building was formerly the hotel, think it was known as the Tittle house. Reuben Calbetzor bought it and his family lived there ten years or more.

Reuben Calbetzor was a carpenter. He came up here from Ohio with his folks and his father is buried in Crane cemetery. Reuben was in the Civil war and after the war came back to the old home. He built the pretty farm house at the end of the road where Ezra Rutherford lives. He tore down the Charleston school house and helped build the Warner school house.



JAP COLONY IN DECATUR

Becker and Company, in negotiation with the War Relocation authority and the war food administration, have brought Japanese to Decatur to relieve the labor shortage.

Ninety-nine of them arrived the sixth of September and will stay until the harvesting of celery is completed. They came direct from McGehee, Arkansas, a relocation center where they have been under government supervision since the first of September, 1942.

They were evacuated from California by order of the Western defense command. The older ones born in Japan are aliens and the younger ones, born in this country are citizens, and citizens and aliens alike were evacuated. A native of Japan is prohibited by law from applying for citizenship.

Some of the members of this colony were residents and property owners in California when the war broke out, and some are the heads of families who have sons in the service.

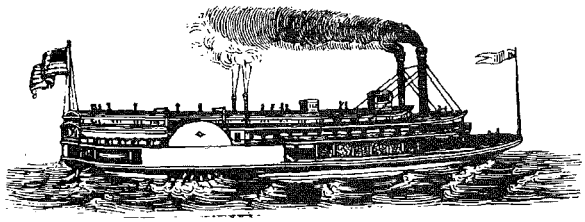
Paul Shimada is manager of the camp. He was born in America and is an American citizen. He has been in Michigan over a year and in East Lansing nine months working at the MSC. He is also a share cropper on land in Davidson and Clarksville. He has two brothers in the service, one at Camp Forest, Tenn., and the other at Fort Snelling, Minn.

Shimada has been active in community affairs and has served as a member of the Boy Scouts of America fifteen years. He is 27 years old, unmarried and is classified as 2/c for army service, which means that he is rated as essential for agriculture and deferred.

He has been an Eagle Scout 12 years and served in all capacities of leadership. While in Arkansas he was a district scout commissioner for the Relocation center.

While there he helped to organize the community activities and recreation for 8,500 people and later served as junior administrator assistant to the chief of community services. Dr. J. V. Hunter was the chief of community services. He was formerly a missionary in Japan and is well known among church leaders as an active worker in the peace movement. Dr. Hunter is to speak at a peace conference in East Lansing some time this fall.

The Japanese colony at the Becker farm has contributed $50 to the Decatur war fund drive now in progress. Decatur's quota is $1,700.



TRAGEDY OF THE LADY ELGIN

By James Chamberlain
615 East 2nd Street
Fort Worth, 3 Texas

The tragedy of the Lady Elgin, as were so many events of the middle of the nineteenth century, was closely related to the disputes between the North and the South over the issue of slavery.

In 1854 Joshua Glover, an escaped slave was captured in Racine, Wis., but was freed by the enraged populace of that city and sent by means of the underground railway to Canada. These and other similar events had produced widespread excitement throughout the state and caused many acts of violence. The state authorities including the courts defied the Federal authorities in enforcing the Fugitive Slave Law, and would free runaway slaves whenever it came within their power to do so.

Now in Milwaukee's Irish ward, commonly known as the Bloody 3rd, and Democratic almost to a man, there was a military company known as the Union Guards. When Governor Randall, a states rights Republican, asked the captain of the Union Guards what he and the Guards would do if called upon by the state officers to aid in enforcing state edicts in opposition to the Federal authorities as regards the Fugitive Slave Law, the captain replied that we would stand by the Flag of the United States. Whereupon the Adjutant General of Wisconsin took away the arms from the company and disbanded it.

But the Union Guards, being Irish, resolved not to take it lying down, and resolved to buy their own equipment. So on September 6, 1860, they engaged the steamer Lady Elgin for an excursion to Chicago to attend a Democratic rally, hoping to realize enough money from the passengers' fares to buy equipment for the company.

It was on the return trip near the vicinity of Waukegon that a Chicago bound lumber schooner, Augusta, bore down upon the Lady Elgin. A storm had risen and the excursion boat was steaming against the wind showing bright lights which were clearly visible at a considerable distance. For some unknown reason the captain of the Augusta did not alter his course, but crashed the excursion boat amidships, then drew away and continued to Chicago without trying to learn of the extent of the damage he had inflicted, or to render aid.

Most of the 385 persons aboard the steamer went down with her or were thrown into the lake, many grabbing pieces of wreckage to keep afloat. Many people came from Evanston and other surrounding towns and watched the people struggling for their lives in the water.

The hero of the disaster was Edward Spencer, who made 16 trips from shore and saved 17 people but was finally overcome by his exertions. His last words were, "Did I do my best?" A grateful university erected a bronze monument to commemorate his heroism. 287 out of 385 persons aboard the steamer perished.

Late in the fall of 1860 the Augusta sailed into the port of Milwaukee to spend the winter, to be repainted and to be renamed the Captain Cook. The friends of the victims of the Lady Elgin tragedy resolved to destroy the schooner. The owners of the Augusta, on hearing of this resolve, immediately left Milwaukee with the schooner and sailed several years as a tramp boat on the Atlantic ocean.

O. Humphries, one of the owners of the schooner, had taken his wife and young daughter on board with him when he left Milwaukee, but returned with his family to Milwaukee in the spring of 1861. Years passed. His daughter grew to womanhood and married a captain of a lake boat.

One day he asked her to go to the pier at Milwaukee to meet an old friend. When she arrived at the pier, she saw the old Captain Cook with a fresh coat of paint. Meantime if any surviving friends of the victims were in Milwaukee, they had forgotten their enmity.

I surmise that the steamer was named Lady Elgin in honor of Lady Elgin, wife of Lord Elgin, Governor General of Canada at that time.

Your friend, Jim.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT

Mrs. Ira Cole has furnished another account of the tragedy of the Lady Elgin which she had filed in her scrap book. It was taken from the Kalamazoo Gazette of September 8, 1943, the anniversary of the sinking of the steamer. The Gazette story which was sent the paper from South Haven, implies that the date was 1861 but we are quite sure that the date 1860 as given by the writer of the above store is correct. In fact the Pioneer History of Michigan verifies the date of 1860.

The story submitted by Mrs. Cole:

South Haven.—What was considered the greatest loss of life in the history of shipping on the Great Lakes occurred 82 years ago September 8th, when "The Lady Elgin," a sidewheel schooner, went down in Lake Michigan with a loss of 300 of its 400 passengers.

The ship sank off Winnetka, Ill., after colliding with the schooner Augusta, conveying a cargo of lumber from a Michigan port to Chicago. The Augusta, which did not sink, was repaired and used for many years as a lake carrier. The ship, however, carried another name after the accident.

The sinking of the Lady Elgin was the subject of poems, long ago forgotten, and popular ballads. One of them written by a Chicago printer and entitled "Lost on the the Lady Elgin," was heard in theatres and music halls over a long period of years.

Adelbert Doebert, the last survivor of the disaster, died in Milwaukee in 1921, aged 89 years.

SURVIVED A RUNAWAY

Charlie Sibley is too much for the old horse yet, and we are glad of that, but he is getting along in the years where he ought not to be taking chances. This note explains the situation:

I am not kicking up my heels much yet, since recent accident, but walk about with crutch, and can move arm.

Old horse ran away, throwing me out of wagon, wheels passed over right arm and leg. Thankful no bones were broken. Dr. Greenman called me a super-man. Must be as nothing seems to finish me. C. B. Sibley.

Visit Home Town of Their Youth

Two well-groomed midde-aged men called on the editor Sunday afternoon and put it up to him to identify them. With a little coaching from them it was done and a pleasant visit followed. In fact, the visit was so pleasant that the time slipped away rapidly in the comfortable room inside, but not so rapidly to their wives waiting in the cold in the car, and they came in to join in the talk over old times.

The men were Lester Bungart of Grand Rapids and Charles H. Herrington of Kalamazoo. As young boys they lived a couple of miles west of this village. That was forty to fifty years ago.

Older residents will remember John Bungart and his family. They lived where Charlie Mumaugh now resides, and it was then the Frank Selby farm. The children were Del., Pete, Lillie, Ed., and Lester. The death of the parents occurred but a short time apart and the children moved away in 1901. The father was killed in a train accident when they lived on South George street in this village.

When Charlie Herrington was a school boy his family lived on the Linderman farm just outside the village limits, and they moved away 45 years ago.

The visitors drove out to the places where the men once lived, and met several old residents who remembered them. They greatly enjoyed the trip and said they would come again. Lester Bungart thinks so much of this home of his youthful years that he decided to keep in touch with it by subscribing to the Republican.

CAPTAIN HAYDON'S CIVIL WAR DIARY

Sgt. Harold Zaehringer
Barrack 113, Sect. 1,
111th AAF Base Unit,
Langley Field, Virginia
17 June 1944.

Arba N. Moulton, Editor,
The Decatur Republican,
Decatur, Michigan.
Dear sir:

I am interested in a feature of your paper called "The Civil War Diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon." What I should like to know is where you are obtaining the material: that is, do you take it from a book that has been previously published or have you the original manuscript?

If it is from a book I should like to know when, where, and by whom it was published; if it is from a manuscript I should like to know how I can get back issues of your paper in order to have the complete diary—if that is possible.

Perhaps you would be interested in knowing how I first happened on your paper. I work in the same office as Dick Bailey who is, as you know, from Decatur, and a regular subscriber to your newspaper. From time to time I see his paper—whenever it gets out of his pocket which is rare—and it was during one of my glancings that I saw this diary.

If you can answer my questions without too much trouble, I should appreciate it greatly and shall look for an answer at your convenience.

Yours respectfully,
Harold F. Zaehringer.

—Answer—

Because of the increasing interest in Captain Haydon's diary and because of similar inquiries which are made from time to time, we are answering Sergeant Zaehringer's letter through this column.

They are small pocket diaries, each one numbered and dated. They are 3¾ x 6 inches in size with yellow sheepskin covers. The plain ruled paper is yellow with age, but the clear writing, partly with pen and partly with pencil, is all legible. Some of it is rather dim but so far we have been able to read every word of it.

When it is realized that they were written day by day, in the camp or on the field, while dodging the enemy or preparing for battle, and that they were begun 83 years ago last April it must be recognized that they are a valuable addition to the history of the Great Civil War.

Had we realized their worth at the beginning, we would have struck off each week at least 100 copies, but as it is there are no back copies except the Republican's files.

The Diary has been running now 55 weeks, a little over a year, and we are not yet half way through it.

The first installment of the Diary was published in the Republican May 27, 1943, and an installment has been printed every week but one to the present time.

In the introduction to the series was printed the following explanation,—

Charles B. Haydon was a son of Philotus and Mary Adelaide Broughton Haydon and was born in Brandon, Vermont, in 1834. The father came to Michigan and located his homestead in 1836, and the wife and little son came on the following year. The homestead is located in Hamilton township, 7 miles west of Decatur, and is still in the Haydon name being the home of the soldier's niece, Miss Ione Haydon.

Charles attended school in the country and studied two years in the University of Michigan, from 1855 to 1857.

A RELIC OF 1844

By R. T. Treen

In the window of the Decatur Republican I have put on display a Whig political campaign badge worn 100 years ago. This is probably the only one this side of the Allegheny mountains, and possibly the only one in existence.

In those days it was more generally the custom for men to wear their party campaign badge than at present, and torchlight processions would march through the streets shouting their campaign slogan—which in this case was,

"Hurrah! Hurrah! the country's risen
For Henry Clay and Frelinghuysen."

In the previous campaign in 1840 the Whigs nominated Wm. Henry Harrison, fondly called "Old Tippecanoe," who was born in a log cabin, hence the log cabin on the badge, for Harrison was the father of the Whig party and the campaign slogan was, "Tippecanoe and Tyler Too." The badge says,—"For Old Tippecanoe in 1840."

My father and grandfather were both Whigs, and as a boy I heard many reminiscences of those early days.

They had two main political parties, the Whigs and the Democrats, also a third party calling themselves the Liberty party. They were the radical wing of the Whig party, their issue being the abolition of slavery, which was a big controversial issue in those days, and the Whigs were opposed to the further extension of slave territory, but soft pedaled on abolition, which explains the slogan, "No Annexation of Texas."

In 1844 the Democrats nominated James K. Polk for president and the Whigs Henry Clay. The Liberty party nominated James G. Birney. Henry Clay was not elected as he only carried 11 states with 105 electoral votes, while Polk carried 15 states with 170 electoral votes. Birney did not carry any.

It is interesting to note, that out of 2,636,311 popular vote of the two main parties Polk's majority was only 38,175.

New York, and most of the northern states were strongly Whig, but Birney polled enough Whig votes to throw the state of New York, and the election to Polk. New York's 36 votes would have given the election to Clay.

Perhaps a little review of the political history of that period will interest those who rushed through American history in their schooling. The Whig slogan of "No Annexation of Texas," may not be understood by many.

At that time all our present territory of Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Nevada, Wyoming and California belong to Mexico. In 1835 the Americans drove the Mexicans out of what is now Texas and formed a republic. The southern states, and the Democrats in particular wanted to annex Texas, as it would strengthen their vote in the congress and give them additional slave territory.

The Whigs opposed the annexation of Texas and nearly all the northern states were strongly Whig, and opposed to any new territory that would increase the power of the Democrats and extend slavery. One result of Polk's election was the annexation of Texas the following year, Dec. 29, 1845.

Without going into details, the war with Mexico was one of the results, and in the settlement the U. S. took all our present western territory mentioned above, and much against Mexico's protests established the southern boundary along the Rio Grande.

In the settlement the U. S. paid Mexico 15 million dollars in cash, and assumed 3 million dollars of debts due from Mexico to United States citizens.

Just for a moment stop to think what our country would be today if all our vast western territory with its enormous resources had remained to Mexico or fallen to some foreign power—say Japan. Yet the Whigs and other conservative elements of that day bitterly opposed, not only the annexation of Texas, but the acquisition of all that territory, claiming it worthless.

F. W. Fifield of Early Decatur Days

The big hill 2½ miles south of Decatur over which the New Swamp road takes the traveler into Volinia township and Cass county is commonly called Fifield hill after the man who lived at the foot of it in the eighties and nineties.

Before it was known as the Fifield hill it was Chavileer hill, named for the equally prominent farmer who lived in the same place a generation before him. Fifty years hence it may be known as the Loeser or Masura hill or some other name for a leading citizen of the community, or it may again take on the name of the first settler.

Francis W. Fifield lived in the 3 story house at the foot of this hill only ten years, but so indelibly did he impress his character upon the community that his name is still familiar to most of the people of Van Buren and Cass counties.

Last fall Elmer Adams, then secretary of the Decatur Masonic lodge, was asked for information about Mr. Fifield and the letter was turned over to his grandson and name sake, Frank W. Lanning.

This letter from the inquirer is self-explanatory:

Birmingham, Mich.
September 26, 1944.

Mr. Frank W. Lanning,
Decatur, Mich.

Dear Mr. Lanning:

For a number of years I have been working on a history of the Masonic Lodges in Oakland County, Mich., and biographies of the charter members of these Lodges.

Francis or Frank W. Fifield was a charter member of Waterford Lodge No. 98, and on May 26, 1885 became a member of Decatur Lodge, No. 99.

I have gathered some information about him as follows:

He was born in Ogden, N. Y., April 10, 1821. He was a farmer and stock raiser by occupation and came to Michigan in 1838 settling at Waterford, where he lived until about 1883 when he removed to Decatur. He was a school inspector of Waterford for 23 years, Justice of the Peace for 12 years, Supervisor 9 years, State Representative from Pontiac 1863-65 and worshipful master of his Lodge for 22 years.

I have just found that he is buried in Four Towns Cemetery at Waterford. The date on the monument is 12-2-1893. There are also the following:

Joan: Mar. 12, 1820—July 25, 1909; Newell: April 24, 1849—Oct. 24, 1859; Frank, Jr.: June 24, 1855—October 22, 1856; Antoinette: July 14, 1847—June 24, 1850; Samuel: January 1, 1845—October 9, 1845.

Is this the list of all of the children? How did he happen to settle in Decatur? Any other information that you can give me will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,
Charles Fey, R. 3,
Birmingham, Mich.

P. S. Brother Elmer Adams, Secretary of Decatur Lodge gave me what information he had since your grandfather came to Decatur, also your name for which I thank him.

Mr. Fifield lived in Waterford, Oakland county, 45 years. He attained prominence there, serving his county as a representative in the state legislature during the Civil War. At the age of 62 he left his old associates and came over to Decatur. His grandson could not answer the writer's question as to his reason for moving, but he evidently saw better prospects in this newer country.

In 1864 Mr. Fifield embarked in the mercantile business in Waterford, which he carried on with excellent success until his removal to Decatur. At one time he owned 4 schooners on Lake Huron and was largely interested in navigation. The farm he owned south of town consisted of 360 acres. It is interesting to note that the Masonic lodge to which he belonged in Waterford is No. 98 and the Decatur lodge to which he transferred is No. 99.

Jefferson, a Great American

By James Chamberlain

The month of April was the birth month of what I deem the two most outstanding examples of the plus and minus characters in modern history.

The English language has no expression that would adequately fit that arch demon, Hitler. His vile actions defy definition. He has taught the Germans that they are a superior race, and that he is the supreme earthly being. Substituting Hitler for Bonaparte, I quote Jefferson, "The day will come when a just posterity will give to their hero the only preeminence he has earned—that of being the greatest of the destroyers of the human race." What year of his military life has not consigned a million of human beings to death, to poverty and wretchedness? What field in Europe may not raise a monument to the murders, the burnings, the desolation, the famines and miseries it has witnessed from him?

The antithesis of this indescribable evil is the author of much that we are fighting to preserve "American life and ideals." He taught that there is no superior race, all men are born free and equal.

Lincoln said, "The principles of Jefferson are the definitions and axioms of a free society, and yet they are denied and evaded with no small show of success," and again "Soberly it is no child's play to save the principles of Jefferson from total overthrow in this nation."

These facts are many times multiplied in our country today and will be further emphasized in the post-war period. Although Jefferson was the antithesis of Hitler, Jefferson had his conquests, but they were conquests of truth over error, of reason over prejudice, of wisdom over violence. Victories of the mind. Triumphs of patriotism and philanthropy.

Jefferson's plus activities were varied. He was an architect, scholar, inventor, scientist, statesman, politician, lawyer and philosopher, but above all he was a friend of his fellow man—a friend in the sense described by a boy: "A friend is a fellow that knows all about you and likes you for all of that."

Jefferson's hobby was liberty and he worked and wrote to establish freedom for the masses in every possible form. Worldly honors rested very lightly on his shoulders as is shown by his own epitaph in which he mentioned no position of public trust, not even that he served two terms as president and refused a third term. "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom and Father of the University of Virginia."

Our departure from the principles and the complexities of our post war problems should make every American try to steer his course of conduct according to the map charted by Jefferson and I most solemnly urge my fellow men to go to the libraries, get some books of Jefferson's life and

I was talking with that fellow who bought the Cap. Beebe house and I told him I thought Cap. Beebe built that house. He was living in it when I came here in 1870 and it certainly is a well built house.

I remember Cap. Beebe, why certainly. I think he was a Civil War soldier. I derived that opinion because he was always called Cap. He was a big heavy-set man anyway, if that has anything to do with it. Cap. Beebe was once the postmaster of Decatur in an early day. I think he was. He had a boy, Scott Beebe, I think he grew up to be a lawyer here, I got that impression, but maybe I am mistaken. I never knew him personally.

Malita says that Max Morlan is getting better so that he can do quite a little. He had a stroke but I've forgotten when, several years ago I guess.

Walter came to town last Thursday morning. Mrs. Harley Smith (Malita) brought him. The walk from his house on Wheeler street to Main street is getting a little too long for him. He said his head ached most awfully, to be polite in his remarks about it.

When Walter left he said, "I'll be down again between now and Christmas. He was greatly pleased to receive a message of good cheer from Mrs. Kimble of California, who was his neighbor in Decatur many years ago.

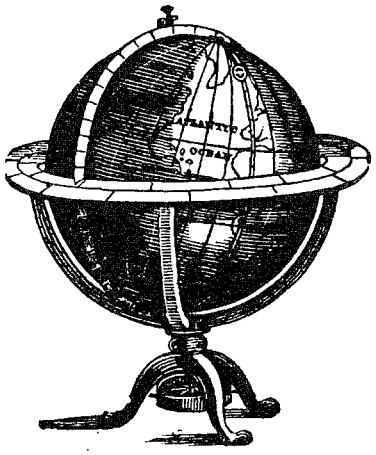
The Beebe house was known for many years as the Squier house, and then as the Upfield house. It is now the Wolff house. With its fine location on a high elevation, and setting well back from the road it is one of the picturesque places of the village.



Christian Scientists Contribute Much To War Effort

During the three months ending December 31, 1943, the Christian Science War Relief Committee, with headquarters in Boston, shipped 123,825 garments to England, Russia, French Relief, and Greek Relief, and to Czech Refugees in Canada, bringing the total number of garments distributed since September, 1940, to 1,611,916. During the last three months 74,108 garments have been distributed to our armed forces, making a total of 233,634 since January, 1942. The needs are constantly increasing as with the extension of our war fronts and the opening up of occupied zones, more refugees are pouring into our distribution centers. Often these refugees have only the clothing with which they escaped.

A new addition to the war relief work has been the preparation and supplying of "Survivor Kits" to escort ships. These kits contain all that a rescued man needs,—a suit, underclothes, shoes, shirt, sweater, etc. Local committees collect the garments and send them to Boston where the kits are made up and supplied to convoys.

Camp Welfare work is carried on by 132 Christian Science Wartime Ministers, and over 350 volunteer workers, who look after the spiritual needs of the men and women in the camps both at home and in the war zones.

Eighteen Christian Science chaplains have been commissioned by the Government, at least ten of whom are serving abroad. One of these has been decorated for extraordinary bravery under fire, when he brought in two wonuded soldiers from the battle front.

BAD LUCK IN SLY FAMILY

530 Huron street,
Niles, Michigan.
March 25, 1944.

Dear Friend,

Enclosed you will find a money order for $4 for mine and Lute's Decatur paper. A streak of bad luck has overtaken the Sly family. Last week Eleanor had the intestinal flu, and yesterday a boy slammed the school door on Evelyn and knocked her out. It cut her leg so badly the doctor took 5 stitches in it. And last night I had a bad ketch in my back so I had to go to the doctor for a treatment, and I have to go back at 10 o'clock this morning.

We are going to have a fine Victory garden this year. We have an acre of ground and are making the best garden we can.

I hear from Lute about once a week. He is well and happy, but he would like to be at home again.

Well, Arba, this is a typical day for March, and as it is almost time for me to go to the doctor's I will close, and please send Lute's paper to the same place.

I see by the paper about how many boys Van Buren county sent out. Niles sent out 450 and only 10 were turned down. I for one will be glad when this conflict is over.

I said to Luther, shall I send the money in for the Decatur paper? He said, "Sure, we can't get along without that paper." On Thursday evening after he gets home he don't want to do anything until afer he reads it from cover to cover.

Yours truly,
Mr. and Mrs. Luther Sly.

Their son Lute is in the Navy. He has been in a year or more. He was home on furlough a few months ago and came to Decatur for a visit. He likes the military life. His address is,—

Luther A. Sly, H A 2/c, USMC

SOJOURNER TRUTH AND THE QUAKERS

Marcellus, Mich.,
March 27, 1944.

Dear Mr. Moulton:

Your reference last week to Sojorner Truth calls to my mind a number of incidents in her life that I learned while living in Battle Creek.

My sister, Mae Rose Schoetzow, my husband and I were in Oak Hill cemetery in Battle Creek in 1935, attempting to locate the graves of our Quaker relatives who were removed from the old Quaker cemetery on Fremont street to Oak Hill in 1891 and 1892. We saw that the grave of Sojourner Truth is in the same block as that of the C. W. Post mausoleum. Her grave is diagonally across the intersection of E. Center street and 5th street, from the Warriner lot where Quaker relatives of my father, Ray T. Streeter, are buried. Two Atkinson aunts and an uncle married into the Warriner family.

Sojourner Truth first identified herself with the Quaker meeting in Battle Creek because of their common cause, abolition of slavery. She had a lovely singing voice and it irked her greatly because the Quakers with their almost silent meetings, did not allow her to sing and speak as much as she wished. After a while she joined a Free Methodist church just outside the city on old Harmonia road. There she was free to sing and speak to her heart's content.

At present the Sojourner Truth stone is a shaft about four feet high and perhaps ten by ten inches in size. However, a fund has been accumulating for some time to erect a monument to her memory, for which the last I knew nearly a thousand dollars had been collected.

The Quaker organization was always known as a meeting and their church a meeting house. The Quakers of Battle Creek worked diligently in the cause of Abolition and aided many a slave escaping to Canada via the "underground" railway route.

My mother's grandmother, Mary Anne (Dennis) Mallory, of Maple Grove, Barry county, was a cousin of Erastus Hussey, long a most prominent and foremost worker in the cause in Battle Creek. He secreted many runaway slaves by day to send them on to the next "station" at night. A daughter of Mary Anne (Dennis) Mallory, Mrs. Isaac Mott, and her husband were active in the movement, and their home at Pontiac, Ill., was a "station" on the route that eventually came up through Calvin and Volinia townships in Cass county, thence to Schoolcraft, Climax, Battle Creek, and Canada. Many exciting events occurred along the way from the southern states to the shores of Canada on the Detroit river and the lakes.

In reference to the removal of Quaker graves to Oak Hill cemetery in 1891 and 1892, they leased their grounds on Fremont street, where their meeting house and burying ground were located, to the city of Battle Creek for 99 years for a city park. In this removal of graves, there were three relatives of my father, his grandfather, Thomas Atkinson, his mother Rebecca (Atkinson) Streeter, and his baby brother, Caleb H. Streeter.

Thomas Atkinson, his daughter Rebecca Streeter and her little son, now rest in one grave under the old fashioned stone of Thomas Atkinson, who died in 1866.

Mary E. Willison has aptly written:

Poor little old church of the Friends, should the spirit move you to speak,

What tales of these people you'd tell,
how valiant they were but how meek.
Do you see those sober-garbed folk, divided, the left and the right.
Who would scorn to indulge in contention, yet championed the truth against might?
With what silence, on the straight bench, they awaited the word from above,
Each soul with the Lord, in communion, received his own message of love.
They were meek, ah yes, before God,
I their humble obedience extol—
Yet, no power, even though of the state, could command the dictates of the soul.
Now their noble example is vain unless, we, with a purpose sincere,
Seek the word of the Lord in our day and act with a conscience as clear.
Little church, though your windows are dark, and your doors are blackened with age,
Yet a glory shines round you, about you, as I turn back your history's page.

A POEM TO DAD

Mrs. Wm. Parish copied this poem from a letter written by Ivan to his father, Will Parish. She added in a postscript, "I thought you would like something from Ivan, he doesn't write often." We are indeed glad to have the poem and to print something from this Decatur boy in the service. Ivan isn't such a young boy. He has seen about 30 summers, but he is one of the boys nevertheless. His fond thoughts of his father prove that. Little do we realize what the boys are thinking when out among strangers and foreigners on the field of battle.

The stars at night shine down upon them when they sleep in the open, and darkness encompasses them in the lonely tents. There they lie till sleep relieves them of thoughts of sadnes and homesickness. You miss the boys,—you from whose homes they have gone, but you may little realize how much they miss you.

Sad and lonely thoughts are difficult to overcome, but we can help the boys to overcome them with cheerful letters and light remembrances, and we can buy a bond occasionally to help insure their quick return.

Ivan Parish has been in the army nearly two years and he may often wonder if he will ever see Decatur and the folks at home again. This is what he wrote:

Dear Dad:

Here is a piece of poetry you may think a lot of and seeing I am off duty tonight I am sending it to you. It's my sentiment.

SAY, DAD!

I'm thinking of the years back there,
When we were a happy companionable pair,
Though this year we are farther than ever apart,
Remember this, Dad, there's part of my heart
Back there with you. That part will stay
Until I return and claim it some day.
With a pat on the back and a handclasp firm,
You wished me good luck and a speedy return.
Smiling was tough as you told me goodbye,
And I knew right then that for you I'd try
My darnest and work so that I could be
The kind of a man that you saw in me.
But, Dad, if only your far away son
Could do just half of the things you've done
He'd be so proud for he knows it's true
That there's no finer man in the world than you,
And nothing would make that son more glad
Than to be able to see you and say, "Hi, Dad!"

I send to every one my best love.
From your son overseas,
Pvt. Ivan W. Parish.

I found the following verses in an old book, the author's name is not given—

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

In Genesis the world was made;
In Exodus the march is told;
Leviticus contains the law;
In Numbers are the tribes enrolled.
In Deuteronomy again
We're urged to keep God's law alone;
And the five books of Moses make
The oldest writings that are known.

Brave Joshua to Canaan leads;
In Judges oft the Jews rebel;
We read of David's name in Ruth,
And First and Second Samuel.
How bad the Hebrew state became;
In First and Second Chronicles
Another history of the same
In Ezra captive Jews return.

And Nehemiah builds the wall;
Queen Esther saves her race from death,
The books, "historical" we call.

In Job we read of patient faith;
The Psalms and David's song of praise;
The Proverbs are to make us wise;
Ecclesiastes next portrays
How fleeting earthly pleasures are;
The Song of Solomon is all
About the love of Christ; and these Five books "devotional" we call.

Isaiah tells of Christ to come
While Jeremiah tells of woe;
And in his Lamentations mourns
The Holy City's overthrow.
Ezekiel speaks of mysteries,
And Daniel foretells Kings of old;
Hosea calls men to repent
In Joel blessings are foretold.

I will send the rest of the verses next week. —Nellie Truesdell.

LOYOLA HOSPITAL IN ENGLAND

Captain Thomas Howland, son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howland of Decatur, is a member of a hospital unit intsalled in a village in the Midlands, England, and a reporter for the Chicago Sun writes of it as follows:

The deer park of a magnificent sixteenth century estate here in the heart of England's richest dairy country has become a virtual Chicago suburb. It is the site of the U. S. Army general hospital sponsored by Loyola University of Chicago. The unit's personnel includes more than 300 Chicagoans.

The thousand bed hospital is located 100 miles northwest of London where no air raid alerts have been ordered for more than two years. The hospital staff numbers 57 officers of whom our Dr. Howland is one, 5 Red Cross girls, scores of nurses and several hundred enlisted men, most of whom are from Chicago.

The hospital may be moved into Europe after the invasion is well under way.

Dr. Thomas Howland sent this poem from England to his wife in Chicago and she sent a copy of it to his parents in Decatur,—

Lines To An Absent Husband

My dear, the house is spick and span
Since you are gone, untidy man.
No necktie dangling from a chair,
No muddy footprints on the stair;
My ash trays, I am proud to state,
Are every one immaculate;
And when I dash upstairs to scrub,
There is no ring around the tub,
No socks left lying on the floor,
No shorts hung on the bathroom door.
This is the way a house should be,
I've always said—but, well you see,
The clock has stopped; I can't persuade it
To run the way you always made it.
The door to the garage will not work,
The percolator will not perc.
My kitchen knives are dull as care
Without your expert touch, and there
Is no one to praise my lemon pies
Or comfort me with soothing lies,
Such as "Of course you're not too fat!
Sweetheart I like you just like that."
A house, I find though spick and span
Is not much fun without a Man.

Gordon Graham, Super-Killer of Japs, Commissioned In Field

By Harold Sharpsteen
in Kalamazoo Gazette

There was no special ado around the Michigan Central depot the morning of May 5, 1941, when Gordon H. Graham, window trimmer's assistant, boarded a train with other Kalamazoo selectees, bound for Fort Custer to enter the U. S. army.

There was no welcoming committee on hand to greet him the other day when he returned home after an absence of 34 months... just his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Lyle L. Graham, 3007 West Michigan avenue.

But you couldn't blame people for not venturing out of doors the day he arrived home, unless necessity demanded it of them, for it was a bleak, miserable March day. One of the most gloriously wonderful, bleak, miserable March days Gordon Graham says he ever experienced in his life.

He was home again, all in one piece.

To those who chanced to notice him at all, as he greeted his dad and then smothered his mom with kisses, he was just another youth home on leave from somewhere or other... and just a second lieutenant at that, to those who may not have known that second lieutenants still head the list of U. S. line officers killed in action in this war.

They had no way of knowing they were looking at another of Kalamazoo's fever-drained, bullet-marked survivors of the famed 32nd Division's bloody New Guinea campaigns, or that this boyish, good looking second lieutenant had won his bars for repeated conspicuous action under fire.

They did not know that after all line officers of his company had been killed or wounded during a bitter day's fighting that he was one of the acting buck sergeants who rallied their battered attack forces and finally shot and slugged their way through Japanese defense lines to capture the strategic, pill-boxed village of Buna.

Nicknamed 'Flash Gordon'

"Flash Gordon," men of his platoon nicknamed him that day, and the name stuck.

Bystanders at the depot had no way of knowing they were witnessing the homecoming of a Kalamazoo youth who was one of seven men in his platoon still standing on their feet when the Japs finally gave up at Sananda Point.

They could not see the scar of a shrapnel wound his neat-fitting uniform hid from view.

There was no way for them to know that after months spent in hospitals in Australia, recuperating from shrapnel wounds, six recurrent attacks of malaria and injuries to his back, he was finally invalided back to the states and was now a convalescent patient at the army's Percy Jones general hospital at Battle Creek.

To them, this trim-looking, clear-eyed youth was probably a specialist of some sort, certainly not the Sgt. "Flash Gordon" who on December 10, 1942 ambushed and killed four Jap marines with one clip from his M-I rifle. Maybe it would be best not to tell them everything.

Perhaps it would be better if they never knew how during his first days under fire on New Guinea he was afraid he would never be able to go through with it. How he wept, and fired his rifle blindly into tree trunks trying to bolster up his morale at the sight of buckling knees and cries of pain from his pals as they crumpled to the ground and lay still.

It was probably best that his parents should never know that the day finally came when he would laugh and curse the first Jap sniper he shot out of a tree during the drive on Buna. How gradually he learned to hate and to kill, as he saw comrades of long-standing fall beside him.

"I wasn't such a bad sort of a kid, as kids go," said "Flash" as he looked back in pleasant retrospect upon his school days in Kalamazoo. "I wasn't what you would call churchy, but I managed to keep out of mischief.

'Live Close to God'

"Most of the boys in my company were like me. It must be generally true with American boys fighting on all world fronts today."

But, sooner or later, he says, the grim realities of war change a youth's former views on life. He grows into manhood over night. When you go through hell, day after day, you see and do things that just can not be put into words. You've got to actually see it to feel it, he says.

You don't think of the horrors of war, as such. As soon as you have lost a few close friends, you find yourself getting fighting mad. You become saturated with an almost insane desire to get at the enemy and tear him to pieces.

You feel that to live you must kill. You eat and sleep with that thought foremost in your mind. It stays with you, day after day, night after night, he says.

Months later, in July of 1943, when troops were being organized in Australia to renew the attack in Northern New Guinea, Gordon was among the first of surviving 32nd Division veterans to be selected to face the Japs again.

He was the same Gordon Graham, who only a few years before, used to drop his eyes and blush a little whenever passing classmates from Kalamazoo Central happened to catch him red-handed changing costumes on the bloodless manikins that graced Gilmore Brothers big display windows.

"Yet, in the midst of it all, soldiers at the front live close to God," says Gordon. "God comes to men in the foxholes and they pray for divine help to carry them safely over the rough spots.

"Men in the front lines pray because they feel the need for praying. Catholics, Protestants and Jews alike. They all pray. And they make no bones about it.

"Maybe they will curse a blue streak in one breath and pray with their next," he went on, "but you are apt to do a lot of strange things when you are lying there clutching the ground, hoping to God they will miss you."

Wounded and Sick

Except for receiving shrapnel wounds in his neck, a victim of recurrent attacks of malaria fever, tropical ulcers and foot fungus, the Kalamazoo youth likes to think he went through the Southern and Northern New Guinea campaigns "without a scratch."

Then, during his convalescent days in Australia, hundreds of miles from any battle front, the fates of war played a queer trick on him. While sitting on his cot in a tent, he was struck in the back by a heavy wedge of wood which tore through his tent siding. Outside men had been dynamiting tree stumps in a nearby clearing.

The injury sent him back to the hospital for another 10 days.

Lt. Graham went to Australia with the 32nd Division as a rifleman replacement in Milwaukee's K company of the 127th Infantry Regiment.

He entered the lines in the Buna sector, November 29, 1942 when his regiment went in to relieve units of the 126th and 128th Infantry Regiments.

"I didn't recognize any Kalamazoo boys as they came out of the lines. They were a tired and haggard bunch and most of them had grown full beards," the youth said.

Six days later, during the attack on Buna village, he took over command of his rifle platoon when all of its officers were lost. He was one of the non-coms of K and L companies that finally broke through and captured the village. He also took part in the capture of Buna Mission and was still with his regiment fhen Sananda Point fell, one of seven men of his original platoon left to be flown back over the Owen Stanley mountains to Port Moresby when it was all over.

"One Jap pill-box, covered by a half dozen snipers sitting in nearby tree tops can sometimes hold up an entire company of infantry for days," the Kalamazoo youth said.

Snipers and Pill-Boxes

"We usually advanced into the jungles in squads of 12. Our first job was to hunt out the snipers. Whenever we encountered a sniper, we usually found a pill-box somewhere nearby.

"The tough part of it was, they just sat still and waited for us to do the closing in. We had to attract their fire first, before we could locate their camouflaged positions.

"Jap pill-boxes usually stuck out of the ground about three feet, but they were covered with sandbags and logs, and hidden by leaves and branches. The firing slit was about eight inches high and three to four feet in length.

"Trying to locate and destroy one of those things in the thick jungle underbrush was no picnic.

"Troops fighting in Northern New Guinea today are receiving support from both Australian and American heavy artillery units. That support was lacking during the early campaigns in the south," Lt. Graham said. "It gives the ground forces a lot more confidence.

"But, the fighting is rugged, nevertheless, and it is an entirely different type of combat because the troops are fighting in mountainous country and in areas where the Japs are well established."

Nearly a year after he had helped capture Buna, Lt. Graham, stricken with malaria during the northern campaign, was sent back to the village to enter a U. S. evacuation hospital. He found the former jungle-locked area alive with activity, with warehouses and supply depots in full operation and the area lined with improved highways and airstrips.

Lt. Graham left Australia December 23, 1943 and spent Christmas and New Year's at sea.

Following several weeks in the army's Hammond general hospital at Modesta, Calif., he was transferred to Winter general hospital at Topeka, Kansas. Last week he was transferred to Percy Jones.

"We never can forget while old songs ring,
The friends who clamor for remembering."

This was an old song my parents used to sing, and we children liked it. I have never seen it in print, and if any of the readers know it, will they please let us know. I fancy it was an old "York state" song. My brother Fred and I recalled it not long ago and I think we have it all just as our parents sang it.

WATER CRESSES

I am a dairy farmer to Bedfordshire I came
To see some friends on Cambernell.
Joe Morgan is my name,
On a dairy farm in Dunstinville I live when I'm at home,
And if ever I get safe back again,
From there I never shall roam.

It was on the first of April when I arrived in town,
And being quite a stranger, I wandered up and down.
'Till I lost myself entirely;
I cannot tell you where,
It was on a very quiet street
On the corner of the square.

When a neatly dressed young lady
Came tripping down that way,
As long as I remember I'll ne'er forget the day.
So politely I addressed her in a very pleasing way:
"I want to go to Cambernell, can you direct the way?"

"O yes, sir; O yes, sir," she speedily replied,
"Take the turning to the left and go down the other side."
"O yes, sir; O yes, sir," she speedily replied,
"Take the turning to the left and go down the other side."

Her voice, it was the sweetest I ever yet did hear;
Her hands were like the lilies, oh, so very white and clear,
She had some early onions and a half a pint of beer,
Some pickles and a bunch of water cresses.

I bowed and I thanked her as I walked by her side.
I thought how very nice she'd look as a dairy farmer's bride;
So I hinted matrimony half in earnest, half in joke,
I hinted matrimony and these very words I spoke.

"I've a farm of forty acres with horses cattle and goose
On my dairy farm in Dunstinville; I've butter, milk and cheese,
Come marry me, my mistress, have fairlady of all these,
We will spend our days with loving and caresses."

She replied with a smile, "A kiss, sir if you choose
Your offer is so generous I scarely can refuse.
So give me your directions and I will without delay
Prepare for matrimony, to love, honor and obey.

"I've a wedding dress to buy and some little bills to pay."
I handed her ten dollars all expenses to defray,
She promised she would marry me upon the first of May,
And she left me with a bunch of water cresses.

The next day I got a letter. I read it with surprise,
"Kind sir, for disappointing you I must apologize,
But before you ask a stranger into partnership for life,
Be sure that she's a maiden, or a widow, not a wife.

"I've a husband of my own and his name is Willie Gray,
And when we can afford it your money we'll repay,
To think that I would marry you upon the first of May Oh you must have been as green as water cresses."

PICTURES OF LONG AGO

The young and middle aged people who are the life of Decatur today might be surprised if they knew how many others there are in distant places who have now grown old, but in their youth were the life of Decatur of their time.

These people of the past generations have a love for this, their old home town, as keen as those who live here now. Perhaps their affection for it has grown with the years.

It is a great pleasure to keep in touch with them through the home town newspaper and the occasional letters from them are highly prized.

Charley Secord, the writer of the letter printed here, must have left Decatur all of 40 years ago and we do not remember when we last saw him, but if he were to step into the office today unannounced we could call him by name on the second. It was back in the eighties that we remember him best,—a grocery clerk for L. G. Stewart. How did he ever get so far away from the old home town? "Gord only knows, Chile, Gord only knows."

Charley, better sit down and write us an autobiography of yourself. We know some of your old friends, still Decaturites, who would like to read it, and we would both like to print and to read it.

This letter was received last week:

Dear friend Arba:

Another year has passed, and I see by the little slip that it is time to start another year of The Decatur Republican on its way to California.

Like to hear the news from dear old Decatur, although most of the names are strange to me, but some are familiar to me.

In looking through my photo album a while back, I came on the picture of the foreman and assistant foreman of the first hook and ladder fire truck of Decatur. Earl Simpson was foreman, and yours truly, Chas. W. Secord, was assistant foreman. This was back in 1887 or 1888. I also have another picture of one of the members, Lew Fletcher, I think it is.

All success to you and the Republican, I am

Sincerely yours,
Chas. W. Secord.

Letters to the Lions Club from Boys in the Service

To Edward Buys,
President of the Club,—

Just a word to thank you for the buck and the good Christmas letter. Understand you have a new addition to your family. My congratulations. Say hello to your Dad for me.

Army Air Forces,
Christmas Eve., 1943.

I want to take this opportunity to thank you for the Christmas present and card. I think they couldn't be better.

Each Lion had a chance to get his little bit in to let the fellows know how he feels. I hope you all had a swell Christmas and also a fat one.

Well, I had better sign off and get back to work. Have to keep them flying, or rather in condition to fly, if the weather ever clears up.

Remaining just another Decaturite in the service, Bob. Taylor.

I would like to thank the Lions club for the Christmas present and the swell card. That card is sure a good one. All of the things the people at home have done for the fellows in the service proves to me there is no better home town than Decatur.

The weather here is very different from that at home. The ground here is bare. It is hard to believe that there is snow at home. I have some studying to do yet, so will close.

Thanks again, Bob Cary.

Christmas Day, 1943.

I have received your gift and letter and really appreciate them very much. Your gift goes a long way with a soldier. I think you have a splendid organization and are doing a lot of good work. Just keep it up and you will put Decatur on top.

Decatur is the swellest place to live and has the nicest people, and I believe the hundreds of Decatur soldiers will agree with me.

Thanks, Izzy.

United States Army,

Dear Mr. President,

Your gift was a very pleasant surprise. Decatur is certainly a model home town. There are a lot of small towns around here, but somehow we seem to ring the bell more often.

Thanks to the Class "B" boys. My best regards to all you Lions and wolves.

Sincerely,
Oscar Adams,

Your Christmas gift and letter are not only greatly appreciated but the thoughtfulness of your organization gave me a feeling that, although we can't be home for the holidays, everyone is thinking of us. Got a lot of laughs out of those names. A "G. I." couldn't have done better.

Edward Lapekas,

DOWN MAIN STREET

AAF Bombardier School,
San Angelo, Texas.

Gentlemen,

Thanks much for your Christmas remembrance. I know that it makes you all feel pretty darn good to get in touch with so many home town fellows in times such as these. Your magazine that came with the gift was like a short trip down Main street, and don't think it wasn't enjoyed.

I'm looking forward to a short trip down Main street sometime in March, but the Army will probably change its mind again.

Yours,
Reynolds Woolfe, Av/C.
San Angelo, Texas.

IN A SWELL SPOT

You certainly surprised me with the letter from the Lions club, but when I opened it and saw the greetings and present I was doubly surprised. I want to thank you and am sure all the fellows will enjoy the greetings as much as I.

I happen to be in a pretty swell spot here in Peru. I have the opportunity to go deep sea fishing, trolling for tuna and canyon climbing, and I hear there are deer somewhere in this vicinity, but they are much smaller than Michigan deer.

I went deer hunting a couple of times in Michigan and had pretty good luck. Maybe I can get one here sometime.

Sincerely,
S/Sgt. Orville Bissett,
New Orleans, La.

I wish to thank the Lions Club for the Christmas gift. It seems so good to be remembered by those back home.

Don.

I want to thank all the members of the Lions club for the very fine Christmas present which was put to good use. Here is wishing every member a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

Amos tells of wrath and Edom
Obadiah's sent to warn;
While Jonah shows that Christ should die,
And Micah where He should be born.
In Nahum Ninevah is seen;
In Habakkuk Chaldea's' guilt.
In Zephaniah Judah's sin
In Haggai the Temple's built.
Zachariah speaks of Christ,
And Malachi, of John, His sign.
The prophets number seventeen
And all the books are thirty-nine.

Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and John,
Tell what Christ did in every place;
Acts show what the Apostles did,
And Romans how we're saved by grace,
Corinthians instruct the church,
Galatians show us faith alone,
Ephesans true love; and in
Philippians God's grace is shown.
Colossians tells us more of Christ,
And Thessalonians of the end;
In Timothy and Titus both
Are rules for pastors to attend.

Philemon Christian friendship shows;
Then Hebrew clearly tells us how all
The Jewish law prefigured Christ;
And these epistles are by Paul.
James shows that faith by works must live,
And Peter urges steadfastness,
While John exhorts to Christian love
For those who have it God will bless.
Jude shows the end of evil men,
And Revelations tell of heaven,
This ends the whole New Testament
And all the books are twenty-seven.

—Nellie Truesdell.

THE DIFFICULT

The easy things require no skill
And very little thought,
While difficulties overcome
Shows man has truly wrought;
So one should train himself to do
The things most difficult,
And by so doing in due time
He'll reap the best result.

IN DELIGHTFUL SAN DIEGO

(This is the first letter from Bernard Dine. Bernard drew the Marines and a location supposed to be as good as can be found in the United States. But his good letter says he likes Michigan best. So do we all of us.)

Dear Arba:

Have been in the Marine Corps here at San Diego for three weeks now so thought I would drop you a line to let you know everything is fine with me and to say hello to friends in Decatur. Received two Republicans so far. Very glad for them, they bring Decatur just a little closer.

This is a very large base but for our first eight weeks of boot training we are so restricted that I haven't had a chance to really look it over. As for this California climate, I guess it must be right that it never rains out here, but on some days it gets awfully misty. Of course the Californians call it fog. I'll take good old Michigan any day.

The training course they put us through is rather rough and rugged. Everything is so speeded up and they try to put so many men thru so fast that it is hard to grasp everything they try to teach us. Besides our marching and drilling we have lectures and demonstrations on various weapons, types of warfare, etc. Have been taking notes and trying to learn the main points, but eight weeks is a short time in which to learn everything about the Marine Corps. It was hard at first to adjust myself from civilian to military life, but now I have the general idea how this outfit is run and what they expect of us.

Get to meet a lot of people from all states and see a lot of amusing things. Of course, we have a certain amount of "Private Hargroves." We have a special name for them which I won't mention now. They always seem to do the wrong things at the wrong time and get fouled up in general.

Here in "boot" we have a pretty stiff schedule. As my time is rather limited, will close.

48 YEARS AGO IN DECATUR

(From the files of the Decatur Independent.)

Fred Stern is gone. No relatives are left here and it devolved upon Mr. and Mrs. Harry McWilliams to dispose of as best they can the few old keepsakes to which he had clung for many years.

Among them were a pile of Decatur Republicans dating back to the time of its re-establishment on the first of January, 1897. These files are all in the possession of the office, but Mrs. McWilliams contributed two copies of a previous date that will be added to our collection. They are copies of the Decatur Independent from which are taken a few items that will interest some of the town's older residents.

Decatur, Thursday, Oct. 3, 1895.

Mrs. Harrington was quite sick the fore part of the week.

Emil Stern spent a part of last Saturday visiting in Lawton.

Dr. Chas. Maxwell of Paw Paw was in town a little while Tuesday.

Don't forget the date of the Hamilton township fair, October 16 and 17.

Mrs. Hattie Bonebright of Constantine is visiting Walter Russell and family.

Mrs. Geo. McOmber has returned from the east where she has been spending the summer.

Wheat is coming in quite fast at this market and it begins to look a little like old times again here.

The sudden change in the weather last week made everybody hustle and get their stoves in order.

Harry Smith went to Dowagiac Monday morning where he secured a position as clerk there.

The citizens of Kalamazoo are hustling for another paper mill which contemplates locating there.

Herman Cohn came home from Chicago on Tuesday. He intends to do some repairing on his house before his wife arrives.

Orange Hayes made the Independent office a present of some of his very fine tomatoes last Thurdsay. Many thanks, Orange.

Daniel Poole cut down a morning glory vine Tuesday morning that measured 25 feet long. A vine of that length is a rare occurrence.

Vanderbilt's special went through here last Tuesday morning. It covered the distance between Kalamazoo and this station in 26 minutes.

Roul Cheney of Hamilton and Miss Maud Hall of Decatur were married September 28 at the residence of E. F. Baxter by E. F. Baxter, Esq.

The G. A. R. have rented the hall over Criffield and Dewey's clothing store, formerly occupied by the K. of P. lodge and will move their paraphernalia January first.

Going, going, going, sold to Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Hathaway, a fine girl baby and now James Shockley is grandpa. Do you wonder Jim is so smiling?

Dr. Rose is having his house on West Delaware street raised and remodeled and is living in the Keables house on St. Mary's street until his residence is ready for him to live in again.

Frank White is numbered on the sick list this week and Mr. Bailey from Kalamazoo is working for him. He is a good workman and should you care to have any work done in his line he is sure to please you.

There are hundreds of bushels of tomatoes that are going to waste here on account of no way in which to make use of them. If there was only a canning factory here it would take care of all those tomatoes that are rotting on their owners' hands.

OUR BOYS IN THE SERVICE

LIFE IN AUSTRALIA

Cpl. Allan Copley Writes of Australian Travel and People

. SOMEWHERE IN NEW GUINEA .

Dear Folks:

Am writing this in the dark as it is one way to occupy one's time at night. Night falls by 8 and dawn isn't until after 7 in the morning, so that leaves you practically half the day to live in the dark. May put our lights in but so far have had to be pretty careful about lights because of the Japs and their planes. No use taking useless chances of course.

I know I enjoyed Sydney primarily because of its size, with the large number of places to go and things to see.

I must have inherited a love for train travel as I just love to be on the things, even the little old smoky things they have in Queensland. Their trains look exactly like the ones in that Currier and Ives print that the Locomotive Division of G.M. has been running in their ads.

Of course they are compartmented, which I think is a good idea. You certainly can move in and out of the trains much more easily than the way we build them, and it's quite necessary that you be able to, as around Brisbane they use the steam trains for travel to the suburbs. Sydney has their electric trains with about half a dozen stations underground in the center of the city and you really get around in a hurry there.

Brisbane's trains are much faster on pickup than any steam trains ot ours, partly due I suppose to their light-weight construction. But they're pretty slow when it comes to any distance. Took a train about 25 miles and the conductor said we'd be there soon, as it was only a run of an hour and 40 minutes. That's all of an average of 15 miles per hour. Even enjoyed the train trip to Sydney which required nearly 20 hours and all that time sitting up as no berths were available either time I went. Most of the fellows just stood the trip in order to get to the big city.

The second time I went down I looked out the window and saw half a dozen tracks on either side and supposed we were nearing our destination. So I woke up all the other fellows as I wanted them to be sure not to miss what I considered a bit of excellent scenery in the Hawksbury river district.

Well, pretty soon the many tracks dwindled down to two and the lights began to be farther apart. It was some hours before we finally got there and discovered that the big city we had passed thru had been Newcastle, their coal town. Oh darn! there goes the air raid warning but my helmet is back in my tent and there's no slit trench here by the office, so guess I might as well keep on typing.

Quite a few natives going thru the last few days. The poor things are so unhealthy looking for the most part.. Some of the women are shy and try to hide their breasts with whatever burden they are carrying and the women really carry a burden. Men seem to help at times and tonight at supper time one man was carrying a youngster whose foot was sore. Shortly after that, however, a lone couple came by, the woman having over her back one net sack holding 2 bushels and another bag holding another bushel, both apparently just hung by a cord around the front of her neck and at the apex of this camel's burden was a baby hanging on to her hair for dear life.

Bags were full of garden truck and cocoanuts and couldn't have been a very smooth riding affair. Behind was the pap walking slowly along, being kind enough to let wifey set her own pace, and carrying nothing but his walking stick. Sure some need for emancipation of women among them, but I suppose that the custom of letting the females do so much of the work is so ingrained that even the women would resent any attempt at change. Guess they wear the pants at times though, because some of our boys last year went over to a native village by boat. The native had to give up his whole day to transporting them and entertaining them in his home so before they set sail he told them that he didn't like to do it but his wife had made him promise to charge them half a pound each, as he wouldn't be able to work in the garden that day on account of taking them.

Sea was fine today but didn't have the time to spare to stay in very long. Surf was not as rough as usual and the breakers didn't break until very close to shore so that you could go out a few yards and just ride them up and down, watching of course for any big ones that might break too soon and swamp you. Don't seem to have any trouble with poisonous objects as they do in Florida and haven't heard of anyone being taken by a shark. One fellow was drowned the other day because he went out too far and couldn't get back in.

There's the all clear so can turn on my flashlight to see where I am. We pass part of the time each night by singing together after we get in bed.

Love, Al.

Memories of Other Days

By James Chamberlain.

You can see, Jim, by the way the Republican is printing the extra sheet again that we are getting back to normal. Those two extra pages are just the amount needed to give space for the good letters that keep coming in and play such an important part in making the home town paper of live interest to nearly every person who ever lived here. Not only is it interesting to former residents but a growing number of subscribers who never knew Decatur are getting pleasure from reading it.

So send along the story, "It Happened in Texas," any time, Jim. As Admiral Dewey said at the battle of Manila Bay, "Fire when you're ready, Gridley."

The old song, "Lost on the Lady Elgin," goes back to our boyhood days, and the tragic loss of the steamer was then familiar to west Michigan people. Am unable to find its record but think it went down in Lake Michigan in 1856. Can someone furnish the story about it?

Forth Worth, 3, Texas,
Aug. 16, 1944.

As I was born February 29, 1872, I think my name should be placed in your list of "72-ers." What say you?

I am glad friend Tom decided to aaecpt the book about Texas as I think he will get some pleasure as well as information from its perusal.

To set him right as to my identity I will state that at the time that I picked the currants and gooseberries my folks lived in what we called the Sandford house on East Beers street, just north of what later was the Carl Willison saw mill.

I wonder if anyone remembers how we youngsters used to chew slippery elm from the logs around that mill? Fred Reece's folks lived the first house west of us. Perhaps some one else derives pleasure at gazing at pictures that hang from memory's walls. To me the big joy lies in retrospect. What a glorious diversion in reminiscing! What a blessing to have lived a long life and to have known so many of the good and noble people of the past who have been instruments in the dispensing of happiness.

When we remember the old days with some old friend we forget the present with its woes. We drift along the tide of remembrance. Old faces, old scenes, old incidents, old triumphs and old failures pass through our minds in quick succession.

Often a chance thought awakens a flood of recollections as did your mention of Norman E. (Ed.) Webster. One of the brightest pictures that hang on my memory's walls is that of Ed. Webster as a small lad among a group of grown-up boys and girls in the high school while I was way down in the lower grades. My eyes as a I gazed at what I considered a boy wonder in the greatest possible awe must have resembled Eddie Cantor's in his film pictures.

At about that time one of our school songs was, "Lost on the Lady Elgin." I believe a reader requested that song, so I am enclosing a copy of it as also that of another requested song. I can get the name of author and book containing most of the requested songs , but all of the books are not in the library list and as you understand books are on the ration list it is not possible to get all books as the books that are out are returned to the library I will try to get a copy of each of the other songs.

The Texas political situation remains badly mixed up. Both factions of the so-called Democratic party seemed to have discarded many of Jefferson's fundamental principles, notably that of majority rule. No one knows how the so-called "Regular" electors will vote if they are elected.

I, as well as you, know about the shortage of help so I will not burden you in your present labor shortage with an installment of "It Happened in Texas," but will begin it as soon as you can get back to normal conditions.

I remain as ever,
Your friend, Jim.

LOST ON THE LADY ELGIN

By H. C. Work

Up from the poor man's cottage—
Forth from the mansion door;
Sweeping across the waters,
And echoing 'long the shore
Caught by the morning breezes—
Borne on the evening gale
Cometh a voice of mourning
A sad and solemn wail.

Chorus

Lost on the Lady Elgin—
Sleeping to wake no more,
Numbered in that three hundred,
Who failed to reach the shore.

Oh 'tis the cry of the children—
Weeping for parents gone,
Children who slept at evening,
But orphans woke at dawn,
Sisters for brothers weeping—
Husbands for missing wives
Such are the ties dissevered
With those three hundred lives.

Staunch was the noble steamer—
Precious the freight she bore;
Gaily she loosed her cables,
A few short hours before.
Grandly she swept our harbor—
Joyfully rang her bell;
Little thought we, ere morning,
'Twould toll so sad a knell.

I was very much interested in Mr. Moulton's account of seeing Sojourner Truth, and wonder if he and some of the Republican readers would like to hear more about her. The year of her birth was uncertain, but I find this regarding her ancestry. Her mother's parents came from the coast of Guinea, and her paternal grandmother was a Mohawk squaw.

She had a book which she called "Book of Life" and in it different people she met wrote their names and sometimes a short message. Following are a few of the names:

"For Aunty Sojourner Truth—
A. Lincoln, Oct. 29, 1864."
"U. S. Grant, March 31, 1870."
"Amy Post, May 31, 1871."
"Z. Chandler, Michigan."
"Elizabeth Cady Stanton, May 4, '70."
"Go on Sojourner, God speed you.
J. A. B. Stone, Kalamazoo, Mich.
"Blessings on thee my good friend.
Wendell Phillips.
"Walter Brown, 53 Broadway, New York, Jan. 17, 1868."

With weary hand yet steadfast will,
In old age as in youth
Thy Master found thee sowing still
The good seed of His truth.
Rev. E. Marble, Schoolcraft, Mich.

Once after a meeting in Ohio a man came up to her and said, "Old woman, do you think your talk about slavery does any good? I don't care any more for your talk than I do for the bite of a flea." "Perhaps not," she replied, "but, the Lord willing, I'll keep you scratching."

One night there was a great meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston. Douglas was one of the chief speakers. He was eloquent as usual but there was a note of pessimism. "No justice," he said, "in America, the only salvation for the negro was in his own right arm. At the close of the meeting Sojourner Truth rose and said, "Frederick, is God dead?" The effect was electrical. The sentiment of the gathering changed from doubt to assurance. —Nellie Truesdell.

The Kentucky Raid

By James Chamberlain

The oldest Negro church in Michigan is located in Calvin township, Cass county, which was also the scene of one of the most important events of the state's history. Seventy-five per cent of Calvin township are Negroes, all the township offices are held by Negroes, descendants of escaped slaves.

The Quakers who settled the community had a station of the Underground Railroad. The friendliness of the Quakers led many of the escaped slaves to settle there, rather than to continue their journey into Canada. This practice eventually led to the notorious "Kentucky Raid."

Learning that their slaves were settling in this district, thirteen Kentucky farmers crossed Indiana in 1847 and invaded Michigan in covered wagons, pretending to be salesmen for a new washing machine firm. The number of the men and their actions aroused suspicion to such a degree that local agents for the Underground Railroad accused the strangers of slave hunting and warned them to get out of Michigan.

The raiders went across into Indiana but turned back at Bristol, reentered Cass county, and began rounding up slaves. The Negroes' cries attracted a crowd of about 300 Quakers who surrounded the raiders and ordered them to release the Negroes. The Kentuckians drew their guns and refused to release the captives.

The posse of the Underground Railroad was also armed, and bloodshed was averted only by the Quakers' creed of non-violence. The leaders of the Quakers induced the raiders to release the Negroes and leave, but later the raiders sought restitution and damage suits were filed against the Quakers' leaders in the Federal District Court in Detroit.

The cases dragged until 1850 when a decision was rendered against the Kentuckians. Being greatly embittered, they carried their complaint to Congress and by persistent lobbying were instrumental in obtaining passage of the obnoxious Fugitive Slave Law, which added to the growing bitterness between the North and the South.

The Fugitive Slave Act was the prime cause of the death of the Whig party, resulted in the birth of the Republican party and put Abraham Lincoln in a position to act his role as Emancipator.

This event I regard as highly important as not only being close to the Decatur community, but as showing the loving nature of the Quakers, the friends who are friends without thought of monetary consideration. Lastly because of its vast effect upon our country, I believe it should have a place in the history of our country.

Pearl Brown Writes of Decatur and Her Work

We take considerable pleasure in printing this letter from Pearl Brown of Ann Arbor. Old timers, who lived in Decatur and knew its people of 40 to 60 years ago will never forget the Brown sisters, and all have a good word for them. You had to be a part of the town when they were growing up here to be able to properly appraise their nice qualities.

If we remember correctly they had their ancestry in New Guinea. Their skin is very dark, but their smiles are as bright and their souls as white as any white person, and we use the word in the sense that "White has always been the emblem of purity."

The Brown sisters were Alice and Pearl and Dorothy. Dorothy was the youngest, and what a cute little tyke she was! She was never known by any other name than 'Dot' and she was always doing something clever to bring a laugh.

Their father, as Pearl writes, had the care of Dr. Rose's beautiful horses, and for years was his driver. Few people take better care of their children than Nelson Brown did of those horses.

But the father lived his course and died, and when the mother followed him to the heavenly home beyond, the little home on the corner of St. Mary's and John streets was sold and the girls found a haven in Ann Arbor. Pearl doesn't say, but we believe they have been there all of forty years. Dorothy was the only one to marry, and what is more unsual, she became a minister. For some years she has been afflicted with blindness, but that does not affect her activity or cheerfulness.

The girls never lost their love of Decatur. Every year they have tried to get back here to feast their eyes on the scenes of their childhood and visit with the few still living here whom they knew as children.

Pearl and Dorothy came in May this year, but Alice was not well enough to stand the trip.

We missed seeing the girls when they were here last year and it warmed our heart when Pearl said, "I would have cried if I hadn't seen you this time." That is the way they feel toward all their Decatur friends of old. Grateful, friendly, kindly, lovable, girls they are,—women now although they are still remembered as girls. Pearl's hair is a striking gray.

She was so full of the happy remembrances recalled by a drive around the village that we asked her when she had time, to write about them for the paper and last week received her good letter which is printed here.

In a separate note she wrote:

"Please excuse all mistakes and I know you will make them all right. I have done the very best I could, and this is the first time I was ever asked to write an article. Your Decatur friend, Pearl Brown, 516 Detroit street, Ann Arbor, Mich."

Pearl has done well, and we find that but few corrections are needed.

Ann Arbor, Mich.,
June 25, 1944.

Dear Arba:

You asked me to write about Decatur as I remembered it when a little girl and also about my work here, which I am very happy to do it for you.

This is Decatur as I remember it beginning with Dr. and Mrs. Baker's beautiful place on the corner of George and Delaware streets. There is an oil station there now which does not make the place as beautiful as when they lived there.

Then the Presbyterian church, which was white, instead of brick as it now is. Many a Christmas tree we have attended there, when Mr. L. G. Stewart was superintendent. Next came Mr. and Mrs. M. S. Carney's home.

The town hall is where it use to stand, but the postoffice is changed It is on S. Main and long years ago it was on N. Main, where it was moved from the town hall building.

The Christian church where Elder Hammond used to preach years ago is the same dear old church. The Methodist church is the same also. On down Delaware Dr. Rose's lovely place is just the same, even to the large barn, where my father worked, taking care of the doctor's lovely horses. No lovelier a team ever trotted the streets than that of Dr. Rose. They could be seen early and late and my dear father driving them. They were the pride of Decatur.

I don't want to forget the lake which was called Mud lake at the west end of Delaware and Sherwood. Once about seven of us girls, Ethel Youells, Hattie Parsons, Jessie Parsons, Ethel Bassett, Alice Brown, Dorothy and myself had a picnic there and a lovely time we had. I remember the cake Mrs. Poole made for us. It was a lovely layer cake with white pastry and had those little wintergreen candies on it. Now we cannot even get any candy.

Our Sunday school picnic used to be at Eagle lake. We as children looked forward to going in the lumber wagon.

Our dear old school house is still in the same place. The school grove where we picked up acorns and stones, and played ring around the rosie and London bridge has been cut down. Now it is mostly a play ground, and the school is a new school, as the old one burned down.

They have no bells now to ring, and that was what I loved, the ringing of the school bell. Most of the teachers who were there in my time have passed on,—Miss Minnie Coleman, Miss Ida Trowbridge, Miss Anna Dewey, Miss Nellie Potts and many others I just cannot recall now. Miss Lila Harlow used to substitute for Miss Nellie Potts. She is Mrs. Canfield now and lives here in Ann Arbor, and Miss Mary Dyer taught too.

O yes, and my friendship pillow, I still have it and love it. I have all of Decatur's lovely autographs on it, even Will C. Moulton's. We all will never forget Will, and when he came back from the "Spanish-American War," the first place he came after going to his home was to come to see Mamma and Grandma and Alice, Dorothy and me. He was a lovely boy.

The little cottage we used to live in is gone, but the lot is still there. The lovely apple trees are cut down. The lot is turned into a Victory garden, which it could not answer a better purpose. The Goodenough home is the same. Dr. Keable's home is the same, only the fence is taken down.

The Lake of the Woods is just as beautiful. We used to stand in our front door and see the lovely blue lake. Winnie Copley took me across once, and I gathered lovely water lilies.

Dr. Rose's, Dr. Maxwell's and Arba Moulton's offices are still in the same places. Dr. Rose's and Dr. Maxwell's have changed hands,—Dr. Bope and Dr. Greenman have them now.

There are many other things I would like to mention, but this is quite enough. Main St. is changed quite a bit. An oil station is where Mr. Potts' grocery store used to be, and many other changes.

Works In Nursery School

And now where I work. It is at Mack School—Mack Nursery school. Mr. Russell West is superintendent. We have three lovely teachers—Mrs. Sadler, head teacher; Mrs. Townsend, next, and Mrs. Shurgart; one cook, and I am the maid. Our suprintendent and teachers are very lovely to Mrs. Miller and me, and Mrs. Miller knows just what to cook to make the kiddies happy. Their little sleeping room is so dear when the little cots are all down, with a little blanket and a sheet over them. They sleep from about one till 3 in p. m.

Their little dining room is just as attractive with their little blue tables and blue chairs, and each table has a little plant on it in a little yellow duck which gives the dining room a yellow and blue color scheme, with a lovely drawing on the wall with nursery rhymes as Jack and Jill and the Three Bears and so forth. Mrs. Miller and I work 6 hours a day and every other Saturday and every other Saturday at home, and every Sunday.

The Board of Education has these nursery schools all over now for the war working mothers.The children can even be there for breakfast as we serve breakfast at eight o'clock, and dinner at twelve; at ten we have a drink for them with their cod liver oil. "Abbott Cod Liver Oil." Sometimes the drink is tomato juice, and sometimes grapfruit juice and also grape juice.

In the p. m., when they awake they have milk with graham crackers; so they never get hungry. Their parents come after them about 5;30 p m. They are all very dear little children. We take them from 2½ to 4½ or 5 years, but at 5 they have to go into the kindergarten.

I think that is all. Written by Pearl V. Brown.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

916 Hays Park, Kalamazoo, Mich.

March 17, 1944.

What a lot of things can happen in a short time. That, I think, is what makes life interesting. As one writer has said we should "expect the unexpected." And so when my 'phone rang at a quarter of twelve and my good friends asked me to go to Detroit with them in about an hour, well I thought of a little motto I tacked on an old friend of mine, "Semper Paratus" (always ready).

So at 1 p.m. I was on my front porch with my overnight bag, and ready to start. Living in Detroit so long I thought I knew the place, but when I left my friends and started out alone I suddenly realized that seven years changes localities as well as making changes in ourselves.

I am wondering if I showed my feeling somewhat when I boarded a Grand River street car. Anyway a pleasant faced lady smiled and a gentleman by her side offered me a seat. I then and there resolved that I would smile more at strangers, especially if they carried an overnight bag. Then it began to seem, not a big noisy city, but a place where friendly people live and I also began to enjoy the streets I was passing and the changes that had been made.

One place intrigued me more than any of the others. It was a housing project on Nevada avenue. Rows of neat white houses for colored people, and on a big sign was the name, "Sojourner Truth." And so after coming home I went to the library to learn more about this remarkable colored woman. I found that she was born about 1790 in Ulster county, N. Y., and was named Isabella. Her life story is most interesting.

There is a sketch of her life in "Negro Builders and Heroes," by Brawley, who says she was one of the most notable and certainly the most singular anti-Slavery speaker. He also said, "In appearance this woman was tall and striking.. her insight into men and motives was astonishing; and her faith was infinite. She seemed to have endless resouces of wit and wisdom."

She changed her name Isabella to Sojourner, she said, "An' the Lord gave me 'Sojourner' because I was to travel up an' down the land showin' the people their sins an' bein' a sign unto them.

"Afterward I told the Lord I wanted another name 'cause everybody else had two names; an' the Lord gave me 'Truth,' because I was to declare the truth to the people."

There is much more of this interesting woman's life, this short sketch seems so inadequate.

Her last days were spent in the little home that friends had helped her to acquire in Battle Creek, Mich. "People ask me," she once said, "how I come to live so long an' keep my mind, an' I tell them it is because I think of the great things of God, not the little things."

She died November 26, 1883, and is buried in Oak Hill cemetery, Battle Creek. "I isn't goin' to die, honey," she said, "I's goin' home like a shootin' star."

My tribute to her—yes, like a star you shed a light below. And in departing left a warming glow.

Nellie Truesdell.

Kermit Washburn Heads Farm Bureau

Elected To Succeed Thor Hagberg as President at Meeting in Paw Paw Saturday.

Kermit Washburn, Paw Paw, was elected president of the Van Buren County Farm Bureau at the 20th annual county convention held in the Paw Paw high school building Saturday.

Earl Morehouse, Keeler, was elected vice president and four directors were chosen as follows: Harry Robinson, Mattawan; Bert Hill, Arlington; Clarence Patterson, Hartford; and Thor Hagberg, Lawrence. Waldo Phillips, Hamilton, who has given 25 years of service to Farm Bureau organization, was voted an advisory member of the board of directors.

Resolutions adopted by the convention pledged the organization to increase its numbers and to inform its membership so that it may be implemented to hasten victory and assist in writing the lasting peace.

Articles suggest that the extension service in Van Buren county promote an educational campaign for the control of the corn borer and the group indorses the organization of a soil conservatiaon district embracing the entire county.

The group deplores the present egg and poultry market conditions and requests the national organization to continue its efforts to remedy the situation.

Following discussion the convention adopted a final plank to the effect that the president, vice president and directors of the Farm Bureau be elected for terms of two years and become ineligible for re-election to these same offices until at least one year has transpired.

Honor Dodge's Memory

Waldo Phillips, Hamilton, presented resolutions of respect to the memory of the late Jay Dodge, Paw Paw, who was serving as secretary and treasurer of the organization of the Farm Bureau at the time of his death within the past year.

Hasil E. Schenck of Lebanon, Ind., American Farm Bureau Federation director, spoke at the afternoon session. The farmers place in the post-war economy was the theme of his remarks.

Henry Houseman, Sr.

1856-1944

Beloved Fellow Townsman and Pioneer Grower of Muck Land Crops in Decatur, Answers Call to the Life Beyond.

Henry Houseman, Sr., was born in the Netherlands December 16, 1856, and died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Grace Albright, in Decatur, February 18, 1944, at the age of 87.

On April 22, 1878, he was united in marriage to Miss Tiny Knapp and together they came to America 57 years ago.

Mr. Houseman was one of Decatur's pioneer muck land farmers, having lived in this community for more than 50 years.

He united with the Presbyterian church of Decatur January 3, 1904, and was ordained an Elder of the church January 12, 1908. Throughout the years his congenial personality, his loyal devotion and consistent christian character have won the respect and love of all who knew him.

He is survived by nine children: Mrs. Jessie King, Mrs. Effie Osterhouse, Mrs. Johanna Abshagen, Mrs. Anna Vliek, Mrs. Grace Albright, Lewis, Henry Jr., Harry, and John Houseman; besides 34 grandchildren and 19 great grandchildren.

The community has lost a respected citizen, the church a trusted leader, and his family a loving father. Of him it may be said, "He has fought a good fight, he has finished the course, he has kept the faith. For him is laid up a crown of righteousness."

Funeral services were held in the Presbyterian church Saturday afternoon, February 19, at two o'clock, Rev. Leroy Cabbage officiating, and burial followed in Lakeside cemetery.

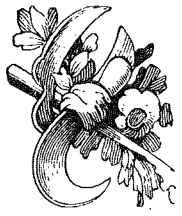
Mr. Houseman had lived most of the 67 years which he passed as a citizen of the United States, in Decatur and vicinity.

He came to Decatur when the land in many sections was covered with woods and water. Heavy rains gave the residents so much trouble that drainage ditches had to be dug to take care of the surplus water, but he saw a future in the land.

Renting a small farm from William Clark for seven years, he went to work and assisted muck farmers in getting drainage and clearing the muck. Then he planted celery and onions. He had learned how to raise celery in Kalamazoo where he first landed when coming to America from the Netherlands.

Next he bought a few acres from what was known as the Lyman Rawson farm. There he raised celery and onions for himself. When Mrs. Houseman died in 1925, he purchased a home on Prairie Ronde street and moved into Decatur. He still helped his son, Harry, who resided on the old homestead.

For 33 years Mr. Houseman raised and shipped celery to the W. D. Daniel Co., of Keokuk, Ia. He began sending 33 dozen per week. This grew in later years to 100 dozen per day.



The Passing of Mrs. Gertrude Charles Metzger

Mrs. Gertrude Charles Metzger passed away in Los Angeles, California, last Thursday, February 3, as the result of an apoplectic stroke on January 28, from which she did not recover consciousness.

Mrs. Metzger was a daughter of Austin and Matilda Lilly Charles and was born on the Charles farm in the township of Volinia June 9, 1872. The family moved to Decatur when she was young and for thirty years or more this village was her home town.

She had musical talent and a good mezzo-soprano voice. About the turn of the century she spent five years in London and Rome studying voice under some of the leading masters of the old country. She sang leading roles in grand opera in Milan and gave a command performance before the king and queen of Italy. Her career in opera was cut short by an attack of Roman fever, through which she temporarily lost her voice.

She was married to Charles Metzger, a well-to-do produce merchant of Grand Rapids, and that city became her home. She there resumed her work in music and made several trans-continental concert tours. Mr. Metzger passed away in 1909, and a few years later she returned to Decatur.

Mrs. Metzger established the first moving picture theatre here, known as the Nickelodeon. After a few years she rebuilt the Rasmusson building and named it the La Pearl Theatre. This was on the site of the present Cozy.

It was while she was operating the LaPearl that the famous Edgar Bergen, then a young school boy in Decatur, began his professional career, in her employ. Edgar swept out the theatre, worked the player-piano, and learned to operate the projecting machine, in his zeal to become an entertainer. He put on his first show in ventriloquism and slight-of-hand tricks right here in the La Pearl, the proceeds of which, we understand, were used for buying suits for the high school ball club.

Mrs. Metzger conducted moving picture shows in Marcellus and Paw Paw also, driving daily to these two towns in her well-worn Model T. Ford.

Her sister Pearl passed away in 1931, after which she disposed of her holdings in Decatur and went to Chicago. She taught music there until the summer of 1942, when she went to Los Angeles, California.

There she was a guest for some weeks in the homes of Miss Rebecca Metzger and Mrs. A. Porcasi, before going to work in the city. Mrs. Porcasi, who will be remembered by many Decatur residents as Nellie Chapin, was a young student of music with Mrs. Metzger here years ago.

Funeral services were held in Los Angeles, After which the body was cremated and the ashes are to be sent to Decatur for interment in the family lot in Lakeside cemtery.

Thirty-fourth Installment

August 30, 1861.

The night was quiet till about 4 a. m. when six guns were fired in quick succession back on the road towards camp. We all sprang to our feet but as nothing further followed we did not form in line. Soon after breakfast firing commenced in the same direction. There were 20 shots. We quickly formed and sent out some skirmishers.

There was further firing soon after between the enemy and a small party of our men. One man of Co. D was slightly wounded and one secessionist was killed. Both parties retreated briskly.

We are now drawn up in loose order in the grave yard and just behind the church. I am sitting, as I write, on the grave of some individual who has made a safe retreat from the alarms of war. The enemy can be seen with a glass carrying in one of their dead or wounded men.

Everything is now quiet. About 100 shots have been fired. I slept well last night on some straw under a tree. I was a little apprehensive that they might send some shells into the barn during the night. They have the range and distance and might have done so if they had desired.

At noon we were ordered, I. e. Companies I and K, under command of Lt. Park, into the woods on the right of the enemy as skirmishers. We deployed at about 3 rods distant from each other along a fence and off into the woods forming a line about 120 rods long. I was with the Orderly of Company K on the extreme right.

The trees and underbrush there were so thick we could not see more than 6 rods. All laid or sat down on the ground and waited in perfect silence for the approach of the enemy in case they should attempt to send out scouts or flanking parties. The day was windy and the rustling of the leaves and the motion of bushes kept us in a constant state of watchfulness which in the course of time became exceedingly painful. No one showed himself on the right. The next man on my left carelessly snapped his gun but it did not go. I did not know for sometime whether it was our man or someone attempting to shoot at us. This kept us wide awake for a few minutes.

Soon a gun was fired on our left which was immediately followed by that cry of death which I have before described. D. S. Buck, a boy of 18 from our Company, had killed his first man. He was still lying on the open field where he fell, when we came away.

One other man is supposed to have been shot. He fell among long grass and weeds and was not seen afterwards. None of our men were hurt though probably 100 shots at long range were fired at them.

The enemy commenced a practice of shooting at pickets and every man they could see on the first day we were here and we took it up yesterday for the first. Three of them were shot in the road just between our quarters and their battery. One of them, an officer, was shot from his horse by the Major of the 37th, our brigade.

August 31, 1861.

The night was quiet till just daylight when a low whistle passed along the ranks brought us quickly to our feet and into ranks. It however proved a false alarm. The enemy have again commenced firing at such of our men as show themselves within range. All the officers dress exactly like the men to avoid being singled out.

I yesterday pulled off my jacket which is dark blue, with light chevrons but when I saw where we were going I put it on again, thinking that my grey shirt might attract the fire of our men sooner than the chevrons would that of the enemy.

There is brisk shooting with muskets today most of it being done by the enemy. Our men return their fire occasionally. A man of Company G was shot through the body this morning at 100 rods by a secession picket. He will probably die.

The living here is poor except for what is gleaned from the country. Green corn and bread have been the principal diet till today a hog and several pigs were taken.

1 p. m. A secession picket was shot a few minutes since by a New York soldier who came out to try his gun. I would like to try mine but they won't let me. I have not yet fired a gun at a rebel.

After all it is rather barbarous. Gen. McClellan is doing all he can to stop it, but without very much success. It is strictly forbidden to us. I obey the orders myself, but I have taken no great pains to stop the men. It is very provoking to have them fire without replying.

Just at dusk last night as I was writing near the door of the tent, I heard a gun which was immediately followed by one of those deep hollow unearthly cries which are never uttered except by men when seriously wounded.

I stepped to the door and saw a private of Co. G lying on the ground. He had been accidentally shot by a comrade. The ball and three buck shot passed quite through his body. He was breathing with great difficulty. His chest heaved convulsively at every breath. He never spoke after he was shot and lived but about 10 minutes.

This morning there was an order for 25 men from each company for pickets. Lieut. Stevenson and self had charge of ours.

It rained hard at daylight and has continuedd to do so up to this time. (2 p. m.) I am writing in the church at Bailey's Corners or Crossing seven miles from our camp on the road to Manassas.

The enemy are on our right about a mile distant. They are on a hill in full view. They have breastworks and two pieces of cannon which can be seen from here. We have about 300 men and there are 20 cavalry and some artillery nearby. There are 3 or 4 houses here beside the church which has been occupied for some time by our pickets.

The walls are covered with ludicrous pictures of Jeff. Davis and other secessionists, as well as the names of our men and regiments—"Lakeman's Zouaves," "Irish Rifles," "The Mozart Regiment," "The 3rd Maine," "2nd. Mich.," "Col. Carrigan's New York Irish Regt.," "N. Y. 37th, Col. McCum," "Gen. James E. Nye," "Patrick Murphey," and a host of other names decorate the walls in large letters.

I am wet to the skin and feel very dirty as indeed I am. It seems now rather doubtful whether the enemy will fire on us today. A few well aimed shells would send us out of the houses in a hurry.

If the pastor of this congregation could return today he would find a full congregation, but I doubt whether they would pay much heed to his preaching. His sacred desk is now occupied by four men who are engaged in a brisk game of euchre.

About 4 p. m. the rain ceased. The enemy are intrenching themselves on a high hill to the west of us. I suppose that we are here to busy them while everything is preparing to fall upon them from Alexandria and the chain bridge. They have fired at our pickets several times today but have hit no one. A rifled cannon ball was yesterday sent through the barn where we are quartered.

Thirty-sixth Installment

A MOST UNUSUAL CO-INCIDENCE

The Second Michigan Infantry had not traveled far from the scene of the disastrous Battle of Bull Run when the entries printed here were made, and the boys were camped not to exceed 20 miles from Washington, D. C.

Following in this column is an unusual entry,—

September 8, 1861.

A soldier of one of the Vermont regiments is to be shot tomorrow for sleeping on his post as a sentinel.

The young man was not shot as ordered, and the entry recalls a Lincoln story which shows the great heart of the Civil War president. Because of the co-incidence we are printing the story here:—

DEBT

There is a great similarity in the many stories of Lincoln's leniency to soldiers incurring the death penalty according to the code of war, and no wonder, when they were so numerous that he often had four-and-twenty sentences to sign or ignore in a day.

A member of a Vermont regiment was sentenced for sleeping at his post. The more than usual intercession made for him induced Lincoln to visit the culprit in his cell. He found him a simple country lad, impressing him as a reminder of himself at that age. In the like plain and rustic vein he discoursed with him.

"I have been put to a great deal of bother on your account, Scott," he said paternally. "What I want to know is how are you going to pay my bill?"

From a lawyer's point of view this was reasonable enough; so the young man responded: "I hope I am as grateful to you, Mr. Lincoln, as any man can be for his life. But this came so sudden that I did not lay out for it. But I have my bounty-money in the savings bank, and I guess we could raise some money by a mortgage on the farm; and, if we wait till pay-day for the regiment, I guess the boys will help some, and we can make it up—if it isn't more nor five or six hundred, eh?"

With the same gravity, the intermediator reckoned the cost would be more. "My son," said he, "the bill is a large one. Your friends cannot pay it—nor your comrades, nor the farm, nor the pay! If from this day William Scott does his duty so that, if I were there when he came to die, he could look me in the face as now and say: 'I have kept my promise and have done my duty as a soldier,' then my debt will be paid."

The boy made the promise and was immediately restored to the regiment.

—David D. Thompson, in the N. W. Christian Advocate.

September 5, 1861

The night was quiet—rain toward morning. I was up nearly all night, and when not up it was too cold to sleep much as I had no blanket. We were apprehensive of an attack.

Everything was so quiet during the day that we thought something must be wrong. I posted the camp guard as pickets after dark. Some of them showed the white feather badly. I would get them together in post and while looking for the rest, some of the first were sure to sly off and hide themselves. I was more than two hours, and did an immense sight of swearing in getting them out.

One of Company I's men, Louis Leonhardt, dodged off and hid himself so that I could not find him. It commenced raining about 8:00 this morning and rained till dark. We were relieved about 10 a. m. and set out for home where we arrived in due time well wet and covered with mud.

All the men who are in the habit of it, as many of them are, got liquor enough to get drunk. They were, of course, noisy and quarrelsome. The Big Sailor and another quarreled in our tent. One suddenly drew a sword and the other a dirk and were parted with difficulty. We are in as much danger from our own men as from the enemy. Not less than 6 or 8 have been accidentally shot since we left Detroit.

September 6, 1861.

Fatigue duty—chopping for the whole regiment. Richardson seems determined that his brigade shall do all that is to be done. And that the 2nd shall do the most of that.

September 7, 1861.

The officer of whom I spoke as having been shot by the Major of the 37th proves to have been Col. Stewart of the rebel army. The enemy are known to be making an extensive move from Manassas today, but its direction is not yet known. Their tents were taken down this morning as seen from balloons.

September 8, 1861.

A soldier of one of the Vermont regiments is to be shot tomorrow for sleeping on his post as a sentinel. We are to go to Bailey's Crossing again tomorrow. I do not desire the job very much. It was interesting enough the first time but it is getting pretty dull business.

We were all called out for fatigue duty this morning, but by a general order of Gen. McClellan, prohibiting Sunday labor except in cases of strict necessity were excused.

Benson has gone to the hospital. He has already broken by excesses one of the best constitutions ever given to man. I have been acting Orderly for three days. I bought the Atlantic this morning and have been reading that and distributing clothes and shoes to the Company all day. I have a bad cold in my head, but care nothing for it if it does not trouble my lungs. I would like very much to go to the city but it is impossible.

September 9, 1861.

Contrary to expectation the Company was sent on fatigue at 7 instead of picket. We drew a week's rations today and I stayed in to attend to that. At 4:30 p. m. we slung our things and marched to the cross roads for picketing. Arrived there before sundown and made all necessary arrangements. As usual Captain May had me on camp guard as soon as we were within sight of here.

September 10, 1861.

The night was very quiet. Some shot and shells were fired yesterday but none during the night. Then shells were so badly constructed that not one which they fired exploded.

Hereafter there is no fatigue duty for the 2nd, but they have to do all the picket duty at this place. This is a little tedious but after all a fine thing. A third of the regiment marches out every day. It gives them a march of 5 miles out on one day and 5 miles back the next, a view of the enemy and a chance to exchange shots. All things considered it is an excellent school.

Mary

Two other sergeants and myself stood guard on a post in front of the officers quarters. I was on from 11 till 2. It was a fine starry night. I looked at the stars and formed groups and images out of them till my eyes ached. Now and then a group came up which looked as familiar as the face of an old friend. It reminded me very forcibly of the time (some 8 years since) when a girl named Mary and myself used to recite Astronomy together days and sit up late nights to view the constellations.

It is now a long time since I saw Mary. She has gone, I know not where, and I am here. Many a change in thought, feeling and prospects of life has come to both. The sky is just as blue and the stars as bright as then, but neither would look upon them with the same interest.

Friendly Pickets

One of our pickets yesterday stumped a Secessionist to lay down guns and meet half way to trade newspapers, offering a New York Times for a Charleston Mercury. The soldier was willing to do it but his officer would not let him.

Two of our Captains crossed the lines this afternoon and held a conference with a Major and Captain of the Rebels during which it was agreed that the pickets should not hereafter fire on each other. They had a very friendly interview and talked over matters for nearly an hour. They were from the Virginia 2nd.

The man of Company K, who was wounded some days ago died yesterday. One of our men told the Rebels that he wanted to go over and look for a blanket which he lost on the 21st of July. They are bantering each other pretty freely today.

In the afternoon I went to a Secessionist house and got a very poor dinner for a quarter. There was not a manufactured article in the house which was not made north of Secessiondom.

Forty-third Installment

September 28, 1861

Hot coffee was sent to the pickets at daylight. No one was seen about the fort this morning and about 8:00 o'clock it became apparent that the enemy had withdrawn their pickets during the night. Some 6 or 8 troopers are all who have been seen about the fort up to 3 p. m.

A woman who came down past the fort this morning with 4 children, a wench and some furniture, and a one horse wagon reports that there are still two regiments concealed in the fortfications on Munson's hill and 6 regiments not far beyond.

We hardly know how to take this move but intend by care to avoid any trap which may have been laid. Scouts were out all day looking cautiously around, peeping into every accessible place.

About 4 p. m. Gen. Richardson and Col. Poe came out. After looking around for a little while, Gen. Richardson ordered Capt. Sherlock and myself to take 12 men of Co. I, and occupy, if possible, a house about 30 rods in front of the enemies' battery.

We advanced, occupied the house and scattered along a fence parallel to the battery. Here we lay concealed in the weeds for an hour and a half. As we knew nothing of the enemies force or position and as we were over half a mile in advance of all our pickets, we were rather anxious to know what was doing.

We took such precaution as we could to prevent being surrounded, and waited the progress of events. We could see about 20 men around their works who fired an occasional shot at us, none of which took effect.

After an hour and a half, about 20 men of the 5th Michigan crept up to us. Soon after as many more came through the woods and got into a schoolhouse on the opposite side of the road and a little nearer to the fort than we. Another party under Lt. Benson of about 40 men came up the road even with us.

We were all looking very earnestly when someone, I know not who it was, cried out "forward." At this we all made a rush and entered the works on the run and found them empty. A few of the men who had been there ran afoul of our scouts and were taken. The rest disappeared.

Gen. Richardson and Col. Poe looked on, not believing the works were deserted. The Gen. swore worse than a Corporal. Benson and I had neither of us had a chance to get swords and were armed with nothing but pistols.

I was fortunate enough to escape his observation, but Benson caught it. "Is there another Lieutenant here?" shouted Gen. Richardson. "Yes sir," said Benson, "I am." The general turned short around, and looking at him a moment, said, "Well, by ———, you look like one. You'll kill somebody yet. Where is your sword? What have you been about; out on duty without a sword?"

Here Col. Poe interfered in behalf of the paralyzed Lieutenant and explained. "Well," said the general, "can you get a sword?" Captain Whipple handed him his.

"Do you see that barricade in the road?" asked Gen. Richardson. Yes. "Can you lead these men there?" Yes. Then without waiting a second, "Come, why ain't you off, sir? What you standing here for?" When he saw the men running to the works, he pretended to be very much enraged, but could easily be seen to be laughing in his sleeve. "There, Col., there goes one of them up to the fort. There goes two more. There goes the whole of them. Col., all you have to do is to hold these men if you can till it is time to let them go."

We quickly hoisted the Union Flag and gave it three lusty cheers. Some other parties soon after took possession of a work just beyond. The N. J. brigade had already seized one on the left.

When the sun set we had possession of all the enemies' works in that locality without loss. We had from Munson's Hill a fine view of Washington, the Potomac and toward the West the high hills to the right of Manassas were visible.

All the officers except Benson and I went back to the corners to sleep. We laid down with about a dozen of our men on top of the hill. We had our oil cloth blankets under us and only one blanket to cover us.

There was a strong, cold northwest wind which, when we awoke a little after midnight had chilled us pretty thoroughly. We got up and ran around till we were warm again and then slept well till daylight.

Two regiments came up before 9 p. m. to help hold the works and when daylight came, six others and two batteries were seen near by. The Garabaldi Guards were among them and I must say that they can beat the world at stealing.

All the New York troops are great at that, but I believe the Guards can beat them all. The country was soon plundered and houses which have been perfectly safe in our hands for a month were stripped by them in an hour, and have been burned.

Fifty-ninth Installment

November 6, 1861

Brigade drill went off well. Col. Poe said he was entirely satisfied and that there was not a regiment in the army that could beat us drilling when we attended to our business.

November 7, 1861

Court martial which came near being dissolved was reanimated and continued in session this a. m. Fined one man $6.50 and 20 days hard labor for talking disrespectfully to a sergeant. I was detailed for officer of the guard tomorrow but a new case came for the court martial and I go clear of guard for another day.

A sentinel of the 63rd Penn. Regt. shot two of his own Co. last night at one shot. They had been outside and were trying to creep in unobserved.

The Col. got after me a little today. They divided the regiment in eight Companies because it was so small. This brought me down among some d——d idiots of Co. E. I happened to turn my eyes off them for a moment and one of them was gaping in all directions. Col. Poe unobserved by me, was passing along the rear. His quick eye instantly perceived the pudding head staring around. He tapped me on the shoulder and asked whether "if I was to exert myself I could not keep that man's head to the front." I touched my cap with great deference and replied "Yes Sir." That man did not catch it much after that.

November 8, 1861

Court martial again today. I went to Alexandria after dinner. I walked around the city a little. I saw the building in which Washington was made a Mason. I saw also the steam frigate Pensacola (24 guns) all new and bright, just from the yard. She is gay. The city is dull and shamefully dirty.

November 9, 1861

Just now I heard some man down at the tents repeating some of Capt. May's extravagant expressions at Bull Run. One can judge how ludicrous they must have been to be remembered so long by soldiers. I can see him now with both arms stretched out, his pistol in one and his sword in the other, screaming "I will be obeyed," "Now or never," "I'll blow you through if you do not mind," and the men all gaping at him motionless with amazement.

Sid. Prentice swears that the Captain's actions scared him worse than all the secessionists he saw. He thought, as he says, "h——l must be out for noon" somewhere or the Captain would not make such a fuss. The only trouble was the Captain did not know what orders to give and when he gave one he would word it so incorrectly that they did not know what he meant.

There never were any men more willing to obey orders if they could have heard any to obey. If there had been no other Companies there, I believe the Captain would have scared ours out of their wits.

It is a cold rainy night but the wind does not blow and the tent is warm and comfortable. Benson is on guard and has to stay out doors all night. I am sorry for the boy. Law does even a soldier some good, for by means of what little I know I have escaped all these rainy nights for some three weeks.

I have everything as comfortable as one could wish. I have a new work on field fortifications, the Atlantic and one of Scott's novels for reading matter and have just partaken of a good supper of oysters and crackers, that being about as cheap living as the country affords. Soldiering under these circumstances is nice, very nice business.

When a man is out all day in the rain and lies down on the ground at night without a dry thread on him and only one blanket to cover him, it is different in some respects. Still one feels glad enough when the sun comes out warm next day to make it all up.

I do not often lose my temper but yesterday morning I went out to look for an orderly for the Court Martial and a meddlesome impudent chap from Co. K came after me and kept crowding and pushing against me and talking all the time some nonsense. I had had about enough of his foolery on other occasions. I told him twice that I wished he would keep away, but he paid no attention.

Finding that he paid no heed to what I said to him and not caring to be troubled longer I turned suddenly around and gave him a slap on the side of the head which brought him down on to his hands and knees. He has not troubled me since.

(To be continued.)

Sixty-fourth Installment

November 26, 1861.

On picket guard about 7 miles out on the Richmond road. I have command of the outposts. They gave me only 27 men to take the place of 90. The posts are badly arranged. There are no posts either to our right or left and there is nothing to hinder the enemy from coming around to our rear and cutting us off.

I supposed this morning that we were only coming out about 2 miles and therefore did not bring my pistol. I miss it very much. It is exactly the right place to use it. I was always very partial to firearms. With that I should feel pretty sure of a man at 10 rods and entirely so at 6. While with a sword I am not at all sure of him at 6 feet. I think however that my two days will pass off without needing it.

November 27, 1861

The night was very keen. I went the rounds twice and slept very well during the rest of the night. There was nothing seen or heard along our line. Signal lights were seen further to the left.

Our shanty of pine and cedar bushes set up in a circle with a little fire on the inside is quite comfortable. We have to keep very small fires and have them well screened from view, otherwise we could be as warm as one could wish. The night was so cold that the men on post were very wakeful.

About 8 a. m. it commenced snowing but it soon changed to rain which continued nearly all day. The roof of our house leaked badly but the fire soon dried the ground and kept us comfortable.

A little black boy came from a house nearby and brought us some very good pies and other eatables which he sold at a fair price. He said his brother ran away 2 years ago and went North and he would be darned if he didn't believe he would do so some day. He wanted we should give him some newspaper. He could not read them but knew a boy that could.

November 28, 1861

Last night passed off quietly. The Cavalry got sight of some "Secesh" out about 6 miles yesterday but they did not come near. Four men (all French) were sent up from the 5th last night to stop with me until morning, also two French troopers for Orderlies. One of them served in Africa and the Crimea. He is now in the service 9 years. He swears there is no better life than a soldier. I am sure I would dislike to have him after me with his sabre, 3 ft. 4 in. long, sharp on both sides. I believe he would be a match for any 10 of our new Cavalry either for fighting or endurance.

7 p. m. Home again. Returned about 3 p. m. It is raining and snowing and is much pleasanter in our good tent than in a brush picket house. A Capt., Lieut., 6 non-commissioned officers and 65 privates of the 63rd Penn. came out about 11 a. m. and relieved my 27 men.

Capt. Handy offered me $25.00 tonight if I would make him sure of getting in this Co. again. I think I can't do it unless the time comes when we must do that or worse. No man can live in it as Capt. if we are inclined to get him out. It is understood to be Thanksgiving in Michigan today and nearly all the officers in the 2nd, 3rd and 5th Regiments are drunk on the strength of it.

I had a very sympathetic and affectionate epistle today from the mistress of my friend Mr. Boren. She resides at present in Washington and seems to have great anxiety about the fate of her "dear Charley" as she calls him. I can very certainly assure her that it is his fate to be prosecuted for desertion if something very unexpected does not happen to prevent my doing it. It will take more than the prayers of one prostitute to save him after the nice scrape he got me into by trying to favor him. He has a very pretty, intelligent and wealthy young wife in Michigan for whom I am sorry. She has probably learned by this time that a traveling showman however good looking or smart by nature makes but an indifferent husband.

As the rain comes pattering down on the tent I cannot but again thank the good fortune that brought me back to camp just at the right time. Tents are not quite home in all respects, but no one who has not tried it knows how glad the tired soldier feels to find himself once more inside his own canvas house. Saving the presence of friends, no home, however gorgeous, ever gave greater joy. All toils and troubles are forgotten and he is mindful only of the cheerful warmth of his mud fire place, the hearty greetings of his comrades, eager for the history of his adventures, and neither last nor least the contents of his mess chest. Those who are in camp are always sure to look well to these things ere the return of the absentees, and as for the adventures they are generally none the less in narrative than in reality.

It was very dark last night but I made my usual rounds at 10 p. m. and 4 a. m. to assure myself that the pickets were doing their duty. They were very much exposed and I was very anxious that none of them should be lost or driven in while I had command. The ground was rolling and was bordered all the way either on one side or both with a thick growth of scrub pines among which one could move without the least noise. The posts were full 50 rods apart and I could approach within 20 feet of any of them without being seen or heard. The men did their duty well, but any one could have shot every one on the line with perfect safety to himself.

While going along the path one day I found the little piece of poetry which I have pinned into the fore part of the book. The only safety for pickets in such cases lies in frequently and noiselessly shifting his position. In this way a lurking enemy while looking for him in one place is pretty sure to be seen by him from another. It needs a keen-witted fearless, wide-awake man for a good picket guard on a dangerous post.

December 7, 1861

We presented Gen. Richardson, today, with a sword and sash which cost $75. It was a present from the officers of the Mich. 2nd. If I could have had my way I would have waited till another pay day and then have bought a better one.

The General knew nothing about it till we came in on him. He acted as funny and embarrassed as a boy with a new hat. He expressed his thanks in his usual dry blunt style and called on Col. Terry who was present to help him out by a speech which he did quite handsomely. Gen. said he desired to bring on the wine but unfortunately had none on hand. So he concluded to call us in at another time.

We took him entirely off guard. If so many secessionists had have come in and summoned him to surrender, he would have been less confused. Anything like speech making is a terror to him. He has never been known to talk for more than two minutes consecutively since he joined the Regiment. He likes to do things without ceremony if we may judge from the way in which he got married. When the Regt. first went to Detroit he was engaged to be married to a lady at that place. When he determined to go for three years she objected. She said she was willing to marry him and go with him for a three month's campaign, but she thought that 3 years in camp was too much. Indeed she could not consent to it. "Very well, Madam, there are others who will. Good day." The General called for his hat, crossed the street, offered himself in less than 10 minutes after to a girl whom he had seen but twice before, was accepted and married within two weeks.

Senator Chandler and a number of other Michigan men were here to see how we were getting along today and we had a review and drill for their edification. Tomorrow we bury (or "plant" as Prentice calls it) Foster who died last night at the hospital.

December 9, 1861

More lovely weather than that of the last 3 days no rational man could ask for. It is like the warmest days of Indian summer in Michigan, only not so smoky. There is hardly any frost nights. Foster was buried yesterday. A large number of men from other Companies were present. With an appropriate discourse it would have been a very solemn funeral. Chaplain May's sermon was about as appropriate and interesting as the dryest chapter of Coke's Com. would have been.

A military funeral when properly conducted is a very solemn and impressive scene. Its effect is far different from that of other funerals. Nothing sounds more sorrowful than the slow prolonged wail of martial music. The perfect silence and regularity of the procession, the measured tread, the inverted arms, and sober looks all increase the effect.

Soldiers always look very sad on such occasions, more however as matter of discipline and duty than because they care a great deal about it. In truth, after they have been six months in the service the death of a comrade makes very little change in their conversation or thoughts.

At dress parade tonight came orders to move at 9 a. m. tomorrow. I suppose we are going about 3 miles down the river to Washington valley. We shall undoubtedly winter there or at least go into winter quarters.

One of the most important things for a soldier to learn is that he has and can have no home, no fixed place of abode which can be improved or beautified beyond the mere wants of the day. As often as he gets well to living the order comes to move. He packs the most necessary of his articles, abandons the rest and travels to another place. As a member of the 1st Kansas hath written, "he covenanteth with the credulous farmers for much poultry, potatoes, etc., to be paid for in ten days and, lo, on the ninth day his Regiment moveth to another place."

We shall be 3 miles nearer the enemy but with no more prospect of active service. I dislike to be cooped up there all winter, but I suppose I can stand it at $105 per month. Our things are all packed and we have only to strike our tents and we are ready for the march.

Gen. Richardson gave Benson and I each a photograph of himself tonight. It is a good picture and I prize it very highly as coming from him in person. God knows I like the man and so, I think, does everyone in the 2nd, unless it be Major Williams. If the "Secesh" ever touch him they had better keep out of the way of the "Pet Lambs."

Seventy-ninth Installment

December 30, 1861

They are practicing at Fort Lyon today with 32 pounders. Although it is 2 miles off I can hear the balls whistle and strike the ground, very distinctly. Our servant, Noble, went to Alexandria toady, got drunk and has not yet returned. We have been obliged to pick up our liking as best we could.

December 31, 1861

We were out at daylight this morning for muster. The whole affair was over before 9 a. m. and we were back to our quarters.

Noble has not yet returned. I think we shall have to send him back to the Company again. He has got to be a man of more consequence than we can afford. I sent by him for the Atlantic and I care more about getting that than anything else.

I presume Noble is shut up in the Slave Pen by the Provost Guard. If so he may lie there. We have kept him more as an oddity than anything else. I might go home on recruiting service for six months if I desired, but I don't care to go. All other things being equal, I would rather be picketing on the out posts than any place I have yet found.

Benson is officer of the day. I wish I was on with him. He has done what ought to have been done long ago—to wit: got 4 of the prisoners tied to trees. Tied their hands behind them and then tied the rope fast to a small tree. In this way you are pretty sure to find them when you come back, if you have to go away a few minutes. I proposed to have a chain put around their necks and fastened to a tree, but I think this is as well. There is no sufficient place to keep them and they are getting exceeding troublesome.

This is a most beautiful and romantic country. Still there seems something decayed, neglected, mournful about everything. Perhaps if I could have seen it at another time it would have looked different to me. Everything is so unlike Michigan. Everybody lives away off the road, and seem to have done all that they ever expect to except going through the mere formula of living. The idea of anything new or business like strikes one as exceedingly out of place, a great innovation on customs immemorially established.

I have not seen a new house since I came into Virginia. They have all those monstrous chimneys at one or both ends which I have so often wondered at in picture books. The house may burn up or rot down, but the chimney remains firm as a tower. These chimneys standing alone are often all that is left to mark the spot where was perhaps a happy home—monuments alike to the departed joys which once clustered around them and to the general decline of the country where they are found.

At each plantation you will also see a strong old building of brick or stone, arranged with loop holes for musketry as a precaution against the possible workings of her peculiar institution.

One on taking a walk here has much the same feeling, so far as regards the country, as if he were in a grave yard—subdued, solemn thoughts of the many things which have been, not what is or will be.

This may be called the classic ground of America perhaps, and the memory of the statesmen, orators, warriors and patriots which are here buried lend a sacredness to the place which nothing can destroy. This is about its only claim to respect. Its high rocky hills, its pure crystal fountains, its clear healthful air, its distant and enchanting scenes would all point it out as a country where health and courage of body should be united with mental vigor and large share of taste, poetry, eloquence and refinement.

From our own camp we have a most enchanting view of the Patomac for more than fifteen miles. Benson and Goebel (1st of A) had a glorious time last night. They are both good men and they had business enough from taps till 2 this morning.

Goebel got so mad at his own Co. that he did not know which end he stood on. He was trying to arrest some of them when one tried to tap him on the head with a stick of wood. He knocked him down with the hilt of his sword and kicked him about 10 rods down the hill into a brook and then took him to the guard house.

By this time Benson came around and called out the whole of Co. I and marched them down to A's quarters with loaded guns. He and Goebel then "went for them." "Py Yesus, I cag and puck (gag and buck) every man in the Company." They begged and pleaded in all sorts of Dutch, German and French to be let off, but Goebel swore that if "Yesus himself was there making a muss, he would 'cag and puck' him, py Got."

They finally took 4 to the Guard House, tied and gagged them, and let the rest go. They then seized 4 or 5 corporals and sergeants of Co. C and arrested 2 lieutenants, Turner and Shearer, and made an effort to arrest some men of Co. B who threw stones at the guard while they arrested A's men.

About 2 a. m. they had succeeded in quieting all the noise and Co. I returned to quarters. Corp. Mack was the only man of our Company who was riotous. He will get straightened.

The Oldest Barber

THE SENIOR BARBER OF ROMEO EDGES OUT OUR THOMAS BASS BY 73 DAYS.

The unusual record of Decatur's veteran barber, Thomas Bass, printed in the Republican of December 30, reminded Mrs. Albert Stepnitz of the oldest barber in her former home town, Romeo. She thought he could beat Tom's record and wrote him to inquire.

In reply she received this interesting life record of another old timer:

MY HISTORY

By B. Bennington Bradley

I was born in the city of Flint on the 16th of February, 1859, learned my trade under the tutelage of my father at the age of 15. Came to Romeo on the 29th of December, 1881, and was married to Elenora Tracy.

I lived in Flint until February 28, 1882, then returned to Romeo where I raised a family of seven children, six girls and one boy.

The girls are all graduates of Romeo High school, the boy reached the 9th grade. All of them are pronounced musicians and all are alive except the oldest girl who passed away July 9, 1919, leaving two sons and one daughter. My wife passed away on the first of February, 1933.

I was the first barber in Romeo to have a combination work cabinet in front of my chairs, the first to have hydraulic barber chairs, the first to have electric clippers, the first to have running water, electric lights and an electric hair dryer.

I've seen 25 barbers come and go from here and am the only one alive in Romeo who was in business here 62 years ago when I started. I have 37 shaving mugs in my cup case the owners of which have passed on.

P.S.—I have 16 grandchildren and 16 great grandchildren; 2 grandsons are overseas, one in Ireland and one in New Guinea. My son is in the post office in Flint.

Both of these barbers are colored men of high standing in their communities, and their records are nearly parallel.

Our townsman was born on the first day of May, 1859, and will celebrate his 85th birthday in a few months. His birth place was Raleigh, North Carolina, and he began barbering in Richmond, Indiana, when he was 21. He began barbering in Decatur sixty years ago.

Romeo is a village somewhat similar to Decatur. It is situated in Macomb county 35 miles north of Detroit, and about the same distance from Lake Huron as Decatur is from Lake Michigan. Its population is 2,627. Decatur's population is 1599.

Barbers as a rule are long lived people. If you want to live long and prosper, hear all the gossip and enjoy your living as you go along, be a barber. Barbers know all that is going on in the community but usually are close mouthed. They play the races and bet on the ball games. That is why they never get rich, but they are always happy.

They generally have decided views on politics, but know when and how to express them.

They say about the gossip they hear that it goes in one ear and out the other, but we have learned from experience that if one wants inside local information the barber can furnish it,—if we can get him to talk.

We know of but one trade that for general interest and longevity of its followers, equals that of the barber; that is the editor's.

We once knew a barber in the Palmer House in Chicago. He was 84 years old and had barbered in that one place 54 years. He was there when the old Palmer House was torn down to make a place for the present palatial building. That was twenty years ago. The old barber vanished then and we never saw him again.

Bangor had an old barber that a few years ago was the boasted rival of our Barber Bass. Nothing has been said about him of late years, and perhaps he too has had his day.

What Our Soldiers "Over There" Think About

Remarks by 1st Lt. Eugene M. Wolkoff at Decatur Lions Club Luncheon on March 16, 1944.

Mr. President and Gentlemen:

It is a pleasure and an honor to be here with you today, though I hardly know what you wish to hear. It is an open secret that soldiers are seldom good speakers, and I am surely not an exception. But there are several things the boys over there think about that you might be interested in knowing.

Our Country the Best

No. 1—Without an exception, the soldiers of all ranks, who stay overseas for any length of time think and feel that these United States of ours make up the best country on the face of the earth. Born and raised in this country, we take too many things for granted. Sometimes we do not like one thing, and often we are dissatisfied with another. Perhaps it is natural. But, when one goes through several countries over there, sees how other people live, watches their ways, and sees what they have to contend with—one very quickly comes to the conclusion that we have the best country a mother's son can have.

The Red Cross

No. 2—Our boys overseas know pretty well that people at home stand behind them in every respect. This knowledge is good and necessary for the morale of our military forces both overseas and at home. It was very gratifying for a soldier to know that every loan was over-subscribed, every fund drive went over the top, even results of the scrap metal drive and the waste paper drive are very satisfactory.

There is no question in my mind, and no doubt in the mind of every soldier that the present Red Cross fund drive will be met by our entire population with a well deserved enthusiasm. And let me tell this, if any organization deserves our wholehearted support, it is unquestionably the Red Cross, whose service, overseas especially, cannot be evaulated with money. This one organization is always ready and eager to help any member of the military force and at the time of the greatest need: when one is sick, disabled or wounded. For this reason, it should be most generously supported by every man and woman in America.

Strikes

No. 3—There is one thing that a great many soldiers overseas do not quite understand. How does it happen, some think, that in these crucial times we have in the country so many labor strikes, and the threat of strikes? This really is beyond most soldiers' comprehension. When a private, for $50.00 a month and his C ration, when he can get it, will work, sweat, often live in a fox hole, and fight at a word or a signal of his leader, he fails to understand that a worker in a factory has any right to stop production that keeps a soldier in Italy or in the South Pacific going. The constant and uninterrupted supply must go to the front, or the soldier in his fox hole is out of luck. Because even with the abundance of supplies a soldier often pays with his life. But without these supplies he has no chance whatever.

Even in this case, however, if the labor leaders would stop to think, they would soon realize in its entirety the role that labor must play in this total war, and then we would not have so many strikes. It seems that something should be done so that we would not have these work interruptions in times like these. This war is everybody's business, and every one must pitch in so that we will win

War Far From Won

No. 4—This leads us to another impression a soldier overseas has, and it is shared by nearly all military forces. It is the fact that the war is very far from being won and over. To my mind it is just well underway. Germans are good fighters, they have "what it takes," and they will not be a "push-over" by a long way. They will have to be defeated thoroughly and decisively on the sea, under the sea, in the air and on the ground. They will have to feel that they are solidly beaten in all four spheres of modern warfare before they will holler "Kamerad." And they will be so beaten! But that will take some fighting. Of course our soldiers will do their part. Yet, in order to be able to fight successfully, soldiers on the ground, sailors on the seas, and fliers above them must be supplied with an abundance of material, with which they can fight. That job, the production of all these things, should be supplied by people at home. And every member of the military forces overseas expects that the people at home will not let him down. In this, I am sure, he is not mistaken.

THE SHERRODS IN ALASKA

When Mrs. Max Sherrod of Palmer, Alaska, called at the Republican office a few weeks ago she spoke of a nationally known writer who had visited her home town and interviewed the Sherrod family. He was there to write the story of that northern country to be published in a book entitled the Highway to Alaska and from the visit to Palmer he wrote an illustrated article entitled "The Garden Spot of Alaska," which Mrs. Sherrod said was published in the September number of the magazine, "Travel."

Following her call we went to the Decatur library and were fortunate to find the magazine and the interesting article to which she referred. The author and photographer is Herbert C. Lanks and one of the pictures shows a bit of Max Sherrod's farm with Mrs. Sherrod feeding the lambs. Max is an original settler and one of Matanuska's most enthusiastic farmers. The writer says in part,

"We visited many places in Alaska but no part of the country appealed to us more than Matanuska valley, the site of the well known government settlement project of 1935, fifty miles to the north of the port of Ancharge. Here are found large areas of fertile soil, mild climate and magnificent scenery.

"The total area of land under cultivation in this valley is probably not more than 20 square miles out of a possible 2,000 square miles of arable land.

"In 1935 the U. S. Department of the Interior and the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, a New Deal Agency, got together and worked out the Matanuska Valley colonization project. Colonists were picked by social welfare workers from those struck by the depression in Wisconsin, Minnesota and Michigan. Each family was to be settled with at least 40 acres of land to be paid for over a period of 30 years.

"With these and other liberal arrangements completed a thousand people began the 3,500 mile trek to their new homes, and finally settled around the little station of Palmer.

The writer called on a number of the settlers and this is what he said about the son of Vincent Sherrod and one time resident of the Eagle Lake neighborhood:

"Max Sherrod, another one of the original settlers, came from Battle Creek, Michigan. We met him in a potato field with his two daughters. He described how he dug fifteen tons of potatoes from a single acre whereas the average is about six to eight tons.

"Max Sherrod showed us around other fields on his farm. In a great patch of almost interminable rows of lettuce his daughter picked a head of lettuce that practically filled her arms. The cabbage field was even more spectacular. There were cabbages that weighed thirty pounds and which the girls could scarcely lift. Max said that one half acre yields him $1300 worth of cabbage, nearly all of which are sold to the army like the rest of his produce.

"He raised grain for his stock and got sixty bushels of oats to the acre. Last year his farm grossed $5000 with a net cash profit of $2800 whereas this year he expected to double that return.

"Mrs. Sherrod was enthusiastic about her flowers and small garden of vegetables. Sweet-peas towered up to the roof height of their little cottage. The garden peas had climbed so high that she had to use a step-ladder to pick the topmost ones."

This Travel magazine is on file in the Decatur library where anyone can see it and read the article. There are also several good books on Alaska in the library and a book entitled "Road to Alaska," the story of the Alaska military highway, by Douglas Coe. This is one of the Carnegie gifts books which insures it a high rating for reliability and interest.

It is predicted that Alaska is due for a boom after the war and some of our own young people may become interested in it. Back in the nineties several young men from this community took the long trip to this great country of the north and liked it so well that they stayed. Wesley Adams and Hugh Rosevelt of Keeler were two of them Mr. Rosevelt passed away there last year. He was an uncle of Supervisor Ted. Rosevelt and the Misses Mary and Ruth Rosevelt. Will Brown, a Decatur young man, went there during the gold rush to the Klondike and so far as we know he never returned.

Our Boys in the Service

WASHINGTON WEARS WELL

(Guess we do remember Bill DeGraaf and would have been glad to shake his hand and have a visit with him when he was here on his furlough. We know another fellow who likes the state of Washington pretty well, and he has our own last name, so it must be a good state. It was good of you to write, Bill, and will pass the word from you along to your Decatur friends. Once a resident of Decatur, always a resident of Decacatur. We claim them, especially the boys in the service, so a welcome is always waiting you here, and it will be a pleasure to hear from you often.)

Vancouver, Washington.
January 8, 1944.

Dear Arby,

I don't know if you know me or not, but I'm one of the old town boys. I lived in Decatur for 17 years before we moved to Holland, Mich., about 3 years ago, where my home is now.

I've been in the Army now for fifteen months. I was inducted the second of October, 1942.

Yes and I've been in the state of Washington for that length of time, too. I think Washington is a very nice state, and like it here. It's true we have quite a bit of rain, but I guess we run about neck and neck with California, as far as rain is concerned.

When I first came into the service I was stationed at Ft. Lewis, Wash., in the 123rd Infantry. Where they are now I don't know, but I was transferred into the medics, and came here to Vancouver, where I still am.

I've been here in Vancouver for 9 months now, and I'm rather used to it. Last Christmas eve. I ran into a fellow from Decatur. He was Duane Cottrell, and I had just written to him the same morning. It sure seemed swell to bump into someone from the old home town.

I had been home last November on a 30 day furlough, and was in Decatur for one day, but I hadn't noticed much of a change in the old town. I had a very nice time on my furlough. The biggest trouble was I had to take an operation to get it, but I'm still alive and kicking.

Well, Arby, I guess it's time for me to sign off now. Tell the town folks I said hello, and a Happy New Year to all.

Pfc. Bill DeGraaf.

Dec. 28, 1943.

Dear Folks:

Have received a number of grand letters from you lately, but couldn't get around to answering. Had a good Christmas dinner with turkey. carol singing and midnight mass on Christmas eve. We were worried that the usual bully beef would be our fare for Christmas and I sure was glad to see those frozen birds laid out, felt sorry for the patients that couldn't eat. A couple had to have intravenous feeding so we kidded them about maybe we'd let them have a few extra drops for Christmas dinner, also the best mince pie. Don't mean to be disloyal mama, but it really was as good as at home. Even the crust was thick, just as I like it; nut cake and what was supposed to be banana cream pie, which was lemon because we couldn't get the bananas to ripen. And for supper some of those wonderful egg dumplings I told you about that we had Thanksgiving. Dried eggs are terrible by themselves, scrambled like, so we try to use them up in the cooking. They're o.k. mixed with potato patties.

Am enclosing a couple of pictures. One is that from which the enlargement I sent you was taken. It's just outside the admission tent and in the background you can see the desk where I spend most of my time. The other is new—Billie's. I'm the one with the cup and it was along here that I picked up those shells I sent you. I thought they were novel, but not unusual enough to put on display in the bank.

Received two packages in time for Christmas, one from the kids in A.A. and one from Myrtle Van. Ring up Myrtle to tell her thanks. I'll write as soon as possible but am afraid that won't be very soon and don't be disappointed if this letter doesn't get a fol ow-up very soon.

Put all my presents on the bed and left them wrapped so it would seem more like Christmas. All the fellows wanted to dive into Myrtle's fruit cake but I made them wait until last night, as we all had too much to eat Christmas day.

Had a long letter from Aunt Lotta. She seems to like it there very much Received her letter along with many others around Dec. 21-24, which made it nice for the holiday.

I wrote the Martins about mother working so they'll understand. Had a telegram from them on Christmas day. Alan Martin is now back in camp in Australia though not so near home.

Received the Lions Club letter and money order, so am sending money order back for deposit. Nice of them to do it, must have been a big job. Would keep the money order to spend but only P. O. M.O.'s can be cashed and don't need it any way. It fell on the ground so there's a bit of IWPD dirt on the back. All my love, Al.

An Everlasting Memorial

The Decoration Day Address Delivered by Henry Houseman at the Annual Service in Hamilton Cemetery Sunday, May 27, 1945. Printed at request of Republican.

Everything about us here witnesses to the significance, the solemnity and the beauty of this occasion! These sacred shrines, the music and marching, the flags and flowers, and Hearts that throb in a grateful way—For this is our Remembering Day. And around those hearts still closely twine the ties which time and distance cannot sever. Here again is the evidence that the mystic chords of memory stretch from the graves to the living heart!

What a blessing that we are able as individuals to go back in quiet retrospect and experience a resurgence of love and of gratitude for the Past. Perhaps the Star in the window has turned to gold; gone, too, from many family circles are the old familiar faces. There remain the golden memories!

"And when the stream which overflowed the soul was passed away, a consciousness remained that it had left deposited upon the silent shore of memory, Images of precious thoughts that shall not die, and cannot be destroyed.

"Long, long be my heart with such memories filled, like the vase in which roses have once been distilled; you may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, but the scent of the rose will cling round it still!"

The happy past is secure and no unfortunate hour can take away what an earlier hour gave!

One of the God-like things of this world is the—veneration done to human worth by the hearts of men. What a privilege it is to gather in this hallowed shrine, revive our reminiscent love and pay humble tribute to human worth.

"We cannot know how much we learn
From those who never will return,
Until a flash of unforseen
Remembrance falls on what has been."

From the graves in this cemetery come silent voices which speak eloquently of high courage and of deep devotion; of consecration and of self-sacrifice. In remembrance of things past we come, and reverently place flowers upon those graves. Gratitude is silent when it is deep. We express it here with flowers. May no hand be too busy, and no heart too indifferent to bestow this simple, beautiful tribute in remembrance!

I now direct your attention to another memorial.—In an early chapter on the conquest of the Promised Land, the Book of Books relates the incident of the memorial tablets. Joshua, the commander, says: "When your children ask 'What mean ye by these stones?' Then ye shall answer them these stones shall be for a memorial forever."

An Everlasting Memorial

We of this present hour are challenged to build and to bestow such a memorial.

The most constant thing in life is change; these flowers we place upon the graves give of their sweetness and beauty, but they must fade. One generation passes away and another generation comes; but our memorial shall not pass away! I speak of it figuratively as a temple; the call to build it comes in this most tragic period in the life of man!

It is an imperitive call! Man is the "heir of all the ages;" and he should enjoy the fruits of past achievements. Instead, the dread Four Horsemen ride the roads of the world, starvation, persecution, strife, death,—never has earth witnessed these as in the days through which we have just passed and are even now passing. Tens of thousands of little children whose eyes should gleam with the very joy of life,—die; their eyes wide with terror! Multitudes have been left without a place to lay their heads. Over the Old World centers of culture, death and destruction reign supreme.

Well,—the German power—ruthless; inhuman; without conscience or honor,—has been crushed! There is but one end for the nation which adopts a destructive pattern of life—and that end is Destruction. The same fate awaits Japan! Then, what? Then comes the most momentous issue of our times, and whether or not we will be able to read it in time, will determine the future of our children. We do not—as Ann Morrow Lindbergh implies—go on to meet the wave of the future; rather we are that wave! The future is in the present.

Surely the Victory which we have achieved, and which we will achieve; the Victory which has been so costly should not be cheaply spent. We can in fact afford to spend it for one thing only—the Temple of Lasting Peace. Long ago the poet expressed the ideal:

"For I dipped into the future far as human eye could see,
Saw a vision of the world,
and all the wonder that would be,
Till the war drums throbbed no longer."

This dream of yesterday becomes the confident hope of today, and we can make it the realized fact of tomorrow! Note first this basic thought: War can be prevented; Peace can be built! What then are the stones which must go into the building? Inasmuch as this battlefield is in the hearts and minds of men and women, control must be exercised over Germany and her partners until they have lost the Will to War! Military force will be essential as long as there remains evidence of international anarchy; but peace is a continuing process and force must ultimately become the rejected stone of the builders!

The next will always be of primary importance. Note it carefully, every social problem has an economic root. There are two theories of leadership. The first is that the leader creates the situation; the second, the situation creates the leader. Take your choice for an explanation of Hitler, but I wish to emphasize that a policy of "live and let live" is essential if we would prevent potential Hitlers from riding into power on a wave of despair.

Now then, what is the keystone of the temple? Let us make sure of the keystone lest we build upon sand.

It was just at the season when the chimes ring the message "Peace on Earth, Good Will Toward Men." I was fairly thrilled to note that a metropolitan newspaper had devoted its entire first page to a reprint of Christ's "Sermon on the Mount." Of all the philosophies relating to human relationships, it is the one which charms me most. That Golden Rule is the standard measurement for all mankind. On that basis—and on that basis alone—the whole of life can proceed. As we contemplate a world in ruins and desperately wounded it should be transparently clear that every unbrotherly act is in the end a loss. The world will be rebuilt; but in vain we build unless the builder also grows. Would you do your part as a builder of this temple? Then sow the abundant fruits of righteousness on prepared soil!

In the peace we seek there is no room for malice; it must be a peace without hate. I am reminded of the words spoken by the great Lincoln as he contemplated the defeated South:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

This day suggests that we bestow a memorial. It cannot be left to the sculptor for there is no marble white enough; it cannot be left to the poet for there is no language rich enough to portray the sacrifice. For all who sacrificed in the hope of a better, a freer, and a more humane world; for those brave and simple men who died in that brave and simple faith, I propose the Memorial we must all help to build; it is An Everlasting Memorial,—the Temple of Lasting Peace.

THE POETS' CORNER

SPRING TONIC

'Twas home-made suits, shirts, mitts and socks
That I wore when a boy,
When a few pennies bought for me
The things that gave me joy;
And when I wasn't feeling well,
No doctor came to call
But ma gave me some castor oil
Though I did loudly bawl.

That awful taste comes back today
And loathe it I still do,
Though not a drop I've tasted since
The spring of umpty-two;
When ma thought I was lacking gimp,
So mixed for me to take
Molasses, sulphur and some oil
And bade me to partake.

My ma's intentions were the best,
But since that day and hour,
I've taken my molasses straight
On griddle cakes of flour.
In which buckwheat predominates,
And while still piping hot,
Sweet butter I spread on quite thick
To make them reach the spot.

Today spring tonic most folks take
Is tonic one may sip,
But tonic with a "stick" in it
Will oft cause one to slip;
And though the tonic mother gave
Was nasty as could be,
It got results that might prove good
For folks like you and me.

GOD NEVER FORGETS

God doesn't forget His children,
While they are traveling here;
But in His own good season,
He sends sunshine to cheer.

Sometimes He has to make us wait,
So we will think of Him,
So many cares and pleasures,
Our thoughts of God grow dim.

If everyone could realize,
That God's way is the best,
And pray for understanding,
We'd then have peace and rest.

The times in which we're living
Should cause serious behavior,
For we must meet in judgment,
Our Father, and our Saviour.

Potts House on Main Street Sold

William Wilcox has sold the house on Main Street, known as the Potts house, to Leon Simmons, of Lawrence township, who made the purchase as an investment. The transfer was completed the fourth of September.

This house is one of the landmarks of the village. It has stood for many years, the one residence in a block of business places. It was built by Charles N. Poor back in the fifties and was first occupied by him. He also built the 3 three-story store buildings adjoining on the south.

Back in the early eighties the house was partly destroyed by fire. This was when it was occupied by Fred Mielke, the tailor. It was then purchased and rebuilt by James Potts and was the Potts home for over fifty years.

William Wilcox bought it of Miss Ida Potts in the fall of 1939. He rebuilt it into a two-family apartment house, joined the Navy and moved his family to Paw Paw where they now reside.

Mr. Wilcox served two years in the Navy and received his discharge the last day of June.

He has recently become associated with his son-in-law, Leonard Oliver, in the building of a frozen food plant in Paw Paw and that village will be his permanent home. He reports good success in the establishment of the plant and expects to have it in operation by the first of the coming year.

Leon Simmons, who bought the house, is a well known farmer whose fine farm borders on Reynolds lake. He has a large peach orchard and has been advertising them in this paper.

Historic House Where Decatur Died

(Friends sent this newspaper clipping to Louis Loeser. This village was named for Stephen Decatur and everything written and printed about him should naturally have a double interest for our townspeople. We have had it in mind for some time to write the story of Stephen Decatur for readers of the Republican, but time, which is so necessary in every work of this kind, has not yet been available.)

Washington, D. C.—With the cementing of the last brick on the front of historic Decatur House recently, an era stretching straight back to the days of Dolly Madison was liquidated. The dynamic Dolly was holding forth at her own home just across Lafayette Square and the Monroes were in the White House when Stephen Decatur returned from his famous Barbary Coast campaign and began building the home for his bride.

It was in that house that Commodore Decatur died following his duel with Commodore James Barron. The story goes that the two fell out because Bainbridge, Decatur's second, obtained command of the Columbus, a ship on which Barron had set his heart. At the duel both men were wounded, but Barron lived. Decatur died in the basement of his home because his wife did not dare to have him moved upstairs.

From the day the rugged, three-story brick mansion was finished and furnished, until four months ago when its facade was dramatically changed, the house has remained very much as Mrs. Decatur planned it.

Now, what was once a reddish brown and somber exterior is veneered with bright red brick, accented with green shutters. And, for the first time, its interior is now lighted with electricity. Mrs. Truxtum Beale, current owner of Decatur House, made numerous efforts to sell it to the government some years ago. Now, Washington rumor has it that a manufacturing corporation is dickering with plans to make the house its Washington headquarters some time this year.

JAMES P. VAN DUZER

Mrs. Van Duzer has sent the Republican the following notice of the death of her husband:

"Of 1522 School. Age 62. Died of coronary thrombosis Jan. 7 at home. Member of St. Andrew's Holy Name Society, 3rd Order of St. Francis, De Soto Court, C. O. F., and De Soto Council, K. of C. Funeral held Jan. 10 from Cooney's chapel and St. Andrew's church to St. Mary cemetery, Techny, Ill. Survived by his widow Mary; a daughter, Sister Mary James; a son, James S., and 2 sisters."

James was the second child of Mr. and Mrs. Parshall W. VanDuzer, early Decatur residents, instead of the 3rd and youngest as stated last week.

MOTHER'S GRAVE

In that dear old village churchyard,
There I see a grassy mound;
There is where my Mother's sleeping,
In the cold and silent ground.
Looking at the stars above me,
Mourning one so tender, true,
Wondering if some day I'll meet her,
With our Lord, beyond the blue.

I was young but I remember
Well the night my mother died;
How I saw her spirit fading,
As she called me to her side.
Saying, darling, I must leave you,
Angels guard your little bed,
Don't forget the words I tell you,
When I'm numbered with the dead.

May you e'er be pure and honest,
Ever to your friends be true;
May you never be ashamed, dear,
Of the deeds that you will do.
I have always tried to follow,
The advice my mother gave;
Words she said still gently haunt me,
As I stand by Mother's grave.

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP

By Eugene Henry Pullen.

Eugene Henry Pullen was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1832, and died in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1899. He was vice president of the National Bank of the Republic of New York, president of the American Bankers' Association from 1895 to 1896.

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep."
Was my childhood's early prayer,
Taught by my mother's love and care.

Many years since have fled;
Mother slumbers with the dead;
Yet methinks I see her now,
With love-lit eye and holy brow,
As, kneeling by her side to pray,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep."
O! could the faith of childhood's days,
O! could its little hymns of praise,
O! could its simple, joyous trust
Be recreated from the dust
That lies around a wasted life,
The fruit of many a bitter strife!
O! then at night in prayer I'd bend,
And call my God, my Father, Friend
And pray with childlike faith once more
The prayer my mother taught of yore
"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep."

One of the collection of poems of Mrs. Lyman Gant.

POPULAR SONGS OF LONG AGO

Wonder how many remember these old, old songs, found in Mother's scrap book.—M. M.. R.

WON'T YOU Be My SWEETHEART?

A winsome lass of seven, a lad just full of fun,
Beneath the cherry blossoms were swaying in the sun;
Of course, to keep from falling, his arm around her strayed,
And he was softly singing, singing as they swayed.

Chorus:
Won't you be my sweetheart? I love you;
Be my little sweetheart, ever true;
Listen to my pleadings, do, I pray:
Be my little sweetheart, I love you.

Long years have passed since swinging 'neath cherry blossoms bright
Now again she's smiling in sunshine's golden light;
A well known step sounds near her, an arm her form enfolds,
And he is softly singing, singing songs of old.

Chorus.

Grandma in the orchard tells stories of her youth,
While Willie perched on one knee, the other holding Ruth;
Grandpa, bending o'er them, helps the tales along,
And smiles while softly singing, singing that sweet song.

Chorus.

THAT SUNDAY MORN

Pearl Harbor on that Sunday morn
When bombs dropped thick and fast
On battleships caught in a trap
Received the war's first blast;
And taught us never to believe
Jap promises again,
But to strike back and strike them hard
And victory attain.

We joined allies on British soil,
Then won the V-Day fray
And on through France and o'er the Rhine
Troops fought their bloody way;
And finally won Berlin
And forced the Huns to flee,
And there Old Glory flies on high
To help keep all men free.

Business was going along so well in this country a quarter of a century ago that people became self-confident, even boastful. A popular rhyme that went the round of the press in the late twenties was this:

"My granddad, viewing earth's worn cogs,
Said things were going to the dogs;
His granddad in his house of logs,
Said things were going to the dogs;
His granddad in the Flemish bogs,
Said things were going to the dogs;
His granddad in his old skin togs,
Said things were going to the dogs.
There's one thing that I have to state—
The dogs have had a good long wait."

DECATUR LIBRARY RECEIVES GIFT

We were happily surprised one day last month to receive a letter from Dr. Dalton K. Rose of St. Louis, Mo., enclosing a check for $500 for the Decatur Township Library. He expressed the desire that the amount might be kept in a fund with which to purchase scientific magazines and literature for the township and school libraries.

A meeting of the Decatur Township Library Board was called at which the members expressed sincere appreciation for the gift and discussed ways in which they could best carry out the purpose of the doner. They decided to take out at once a subscription to "The Scientific Monthly" for each library, and to make more scientific literature available to the community as fast as it can be done intelligently.

In explaining his purpose in making the gift Dr. Rose wrote:

"This is the Scientific Era—those who are to carry on scientific advance will come, in large part, from the country and from villages, as they have in the past. Very few are gifted to wander, often mentally at least, alone, down new scientific roads. It is difficult for many to leave well-trodden paths, old rules, though such rules are in process of scientific investigation and eventual elimination. If Decatur can produce one person who by his or her originality will improve the pleasure and value of home for the people of America and the world—then Decatur has produced in this and in the coming Scientific Era.

"I recall so well in my youth in Decatur that I knew of only a few of the scientific subjects, such as Law, Engineering, Dentistry, Medicine. Chemistry was in its infancy — I thought most Chemists taught Chemistry as did Dr. Johnson at Ann Arbor. Today Chemistry extends to such limited fields as Enzyme Chemistry! Industrial Chemistry is divided and subdivided!

"Medicine is replete with such divisions and subdivisions of subjects which as a whole are spoken of as "Specialties." Agriculture, Astronomy, Archeology, Agronomy, Anthropology, Botany, Engineering — civil, electrical, automotive, aviation — Dairy Science, Ecology, Forestry, Meteorology, Minerology, etc., are divided and subdivided as are Chemistry and Medicine.

"Journals open up this world to many, and in my opinion 'The Scientic Monthly' published by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Smithsonian Institution Building, Washington, 25, D. C., carries the banner. In it from month to month are advertisements by many scientific societies which publish their journal. Many are probably highly scientific and not widely read, but one of these journals may "pick out" a future "From Decatur, Michigan, Scientist." Less scientific publications, such as American Forests, Journal of Forestry, Farmers Digest, Audubon Magazine, Science News Letter, 'The Land,' published by 'Friends of the Land,' Bel Air, Maryland, Natural History, are also desirable."

Dr. Rose was reluctant to receive publicity in connection with the gift but was prevailed upon to let the writer use his judgment in making a conservative comment. Hence it is with his desire in mind that superlatives are omitted.

The one thing he asked at the close of his letter was this: "I wish this could be considered in memory of my father." Dr. Dalton is like his father in many ways, and one of them is that he does not ask for praise.

Dr. Gilbert L. Rose went through life doing for others, but no one heard of it from him. He was the typical country doctor of an age that is gone forever. He went till he could go no longer, and the week he put his prancing Hambletonians in the barn for the last time was the week he died.

He began the practice of medicine in Decatur in 1874 and was here 32 years when on the fifth day of January, 1907, he passed away.

But, in the words of a fellow practitioner, "he still lives in the hearts of all who knew him as the most noble, the most generous, the most charitable, the most beloved of his fellow men."

Sunday, October 21, was the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Will Carleton, Michigan's beloved poet, and services in his honor were held in Hillsdale college, which is near his birthplace. He was two years younger than Dr. Rose.

This seems like a fitting time and place to publish one of Carleton's best known poems,—

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR

There's a gathering in the village that has never been outdone
Since the soldiers took their muskets to the war of 'sixty-one;
And a lot of lumber wagons near the church upon the hill,
And a crowd of country people, Sunday-dressed and very still.
Now each window is preempted by a dozen heads or more,
Now the spacious pews are crowded from the pulpit to the door;
For, the coverlet of blackness on his portly figure spread,
Lies the grim old country doctor, in a massive oaken bed.
Lies the fierce old country doctor,
Lies the kind old country doctor,
Whom the populace considered with a mingled love and dread.

Maybe half the congregation, now of great or little worth,
Found this watcher waiting for them when they came upon the earth;
This undecorated soldier, of a hard, unequal strife,
Fought in many stubborn battles with the foes that sought their life.
In the night-time or the day-time, he would rally brave and well,
Though the summer lark was fifing, or the frozen lances fell;
Knowing if he won the battle, they would praise their Maker's name,
Knowing if he lost the battle, then the doctor was to blame,
'Twas the brave old virtuous doctor,
'Twas the good old faulty doctor,
'Twas the faithful country doctor — fighting stoutly all the same.

When so many pined in sickness, he had stood so strongly by,
Half the people felt a notion that the doctor couldn't die;
They must slowly learn the lesson how to live from day to day,
And have somehow lost their bearings—now this landmark is away.
But perhaps it still is better that this busy life is done;
He has seen old views and patients disappearing, one by one;
He has learned that Death is master both of Science and of Art;
He has done his duty fairly; and has acted out his part.
And the strong old country doctor,
And the brave old country doctor,
Is entitled to a furlough for his brain and for his heart.

A line from Attorney Otis Huff of Marcellus: "I was sorry to read in your paper an account of the passing of Charles Reits. I knew him very well years ago, and concur in the fine tribute you paid him."

Mrs. Albert Dwight advertised an electric range in the Republican last week and sold it the day the paper was printed. In expressing appreciation for this quick sale Mrs. Dwight complimented the story in "This Week" on building up Decatur. Her heart is in Decatur. She has lived here 52 years this coming December.

A favorite pastime of this columnist is to wander back in thought over the century past and write a word picture of Decatur as it was when our grandparents were the active citizens of the community. An appeal for help to Frank Thomas of Chicago, a friend of those early years, brought from him these interesting reminiscences:

"Do you remember way back or were you born to late to enjoy that wonderful piece of woods opposite Lakeside cemetery? It extended from the Brownbridge farm south to the first street north of Pine Street, which at that time was nothing but a sand road leading toward the lake. It reached from the cemetery to the lake and was covered with a great many large red oaks, some hickory, and near the lake many sycamores, and much underbrush everywhere. About half way to the lake was a natural picnic ground containing many large oaks where picnics held. I was always there when it came time for the three layer cakes and big dishes of home made ice cream. I never missed a meal nor paid a cent.

"Then toward the lake was a large opening which was a part of a brick yard, and there were several large holes filled with water where the clay has been taken out, and then farther on was a point out in the lake where there were a few large elms and the grandest swimming hole you ever saw.

"This land contained much game partridge, quail, squirrel, rabbit, and a couple of dens of that highly scented pet which you had better let alone if you wish to remain healthy.

"As near as I can remember this was in 1874 or '75. I spent much time in these woods when I was not playing 'One Old Cat,' with a ball my good mother made for me of store string stitched all over to hold it in place.

"Then comes man with his ax, and those grand trees went into railroad ties and firewood. What a beautiful park it would have made for everybody had it been preserved, and large enough for all the athletics of today."

Yes, I can remember the Lake of the Woods in those primitive years, and the wonderful woods from which it was named. One of the curios of the Republican Office for over a half century was a large bill advertising the Fourth of July celebration of 1876 held in the grove. I was there with parents and grandparents and ate my full share of the big picnic dinner and the ice cream and cake.

I can also remember the immense crowd there and the famous Constantine Band that vied with the speaker for the star attraction of the day.

Have forgotten the speaker but not the band. Have a vision in memory of those gaily uniformed players led by the drum major wearing his tall fur piece. The Constatine band in that early day was rated one of the best in the state.

No one would recognize Lake of the Woods today as the same lake where we played so freely some seventy years ago. Almost or quite 100 pretty residences around it now, and the Lake of The Woods area is a city by itself.

J. G. Hirst and Dalton Kinney have been leaders in developing the Lake of the Woods project.

Nellie Truesdell's Column

916 Hays Park Kalamazoo, Mich.

I have had too many compliments of late. I am beginning to glow all over, and in case I get too smug I think I better write something frivolous and get back to earth.

Right now I am thinking of popular songs and parodies that so often followed them in the gay 90's. Having three brothers and two sisters we learned them all. I remembered the parody Mr. Chamberlain spoke of, "Wait till the bull dog dies."

"I remember very well when we parted,
'Twas on a very cold night
When he tackled both my pants and suspenders,
Heavens, didn't he hold on tight.
Then your dad and I got into a racket
And he blacked up both my eyes
So you better excuse me tonight, Jennie,
And wait till the bull dog dies.

Cho.—Wait till the bull dog dies, Jennie,
Wait till he closes his eyes;
Then I'll come over and see you
But not till the bull dog dies."

Then there was Sweet Marie:
"When the sun sinks in the west, Sweet Marie,
And I sit me down to rest, love, with thee."

Parody

"When the sun sets on the eggs,
Sweet Marie,
Then the hens can rest their legs,
don't you see."

FATAL WEDDING

"While the wedding bells were ringing,
When the bride and groom were there,
Marching down the aisle together
While the organ pealed the air."

Parody

"While the wedding bells were ringing,
I bought wine and fine Hananies;
The congregation seemed astonished
When the organ pealed bananas."

No, Nellie Nelson, I don't know my "onions" any more, my husband won't eat them. Woe is me! I love them. Thank you, N. N., for your story and sharing your father with us. And I would like to dedicate the following poem to him. It was composed by Helen Janet Miller of Detroit, a member of Writer's Club:

POST MORTEM

What I loved was not an earthly form
Long-limbed and bronze of shoulder,
Impelled by mundane fires;
Or yet a better or a poorer human shape
Which is, after all, only a shell to hold
Something finer or cruder as one deserves.
What I loved
Was something within and beyond
That meager crust;
Something that will be living yet
When it has followed dust.
Nellie Truesdell.

UNRATIONED

There's no rationing of God's grace;
No blackout of the Holy Place;
No coupons needed when you pray;
No taxes over love hold sway;
No priorities on God's power;
No limit when His blessings shower;
No shortage in God's Word is found;
No one on faith has set a bound;
No truth is interfered by quota.
Joy is not cut, not one iota
While free for whosoever will,
The cleansing fount is flowing still;
So why should we disgruntled be
By shortages of meat and tea,
When of the things that really last
The world's supply is growing fast?

MRS. MARY EAST At 90

A Native of Indiana She Has Spent Most of Her Active and Useful Life In Cass and Van Buren Counties.

FRIDAY, FEB. 9, HER BIRTHDAY

Today we offer congratulations to one of our oldest residents, Mrs. Mary East, who will be ninety years young tomorrow, the 9th of February. Four score and ten is a long time to live, but when one has lived a full and useful life, time and years hold no terror, for, using the words of the poet, it can truly be said, "She grew old gracefully, beautiful, fair."

She was born in a little farm home on the banks of the Wabash River, near Muncie, Indiana, the youngest of thirteen children born to David and Joanna Howell Keene.

When she was about four years of age the family came to Michigan and located in Dowagiac, and all her life has been spent near the home of her early childhood. She was a true pioneer, suffering the hardships of early pioneer days uncomplaining, taking whatever came her way with a courage unsurpassed.

Some of the memories of her early childhood were how her father used to make their own sugar by the barrel from maple sap. Then too he would gather the large stalks from the elder bush and after removing the pith, would fill the center of the stalks with maple wax, and lay them away on the rafters of the log house to harden. Later the stalks would be cut or broken away and there were long sticks of delicious candy to delight the children as well as serve to the company in the evening.

It was her father who taught her how to knit. When a very young girl she started to piece a log cabin quilt, in which she used pieces of a sash she wore at a rally when Lincoln was running for his second term. The quilt is still in good condition and in possession of one of her daughters.

She recalls how the Indians (probably the Potawatamies) would come to their home and her father always gave them food and assured her she need not fear them for they were friendly,—and because of her father's kindness to them they were never molested.

She saw four of her brothers march away to join the ranks of the Boys in Blue in the great Civil War. Later she married a young war veteran, Darius Emmons, (better known as Dick) and to them were born seven children, one child, their oldest son, being accidentally killed when about six years old.

Besides caring for her family in the capacity of nurse, seamstress and all the other tasks that go into the making of a home, she was always willing and ready to help others in distress in whatever there was to do.

When, at an early age, the husband passed away she was both mother and father to the three youngest children, but her indomitable courage that had carried her through many difficult places, again stood the test and she saw them through school and higher training, fitting them to take their places in the world as successful men and women.

After her family was grown, she became more interested in social life and was active in the Woman's Relief Corps, State Grange, Maccabees, Rebeccas and the Eastern Star.

Later she was united in marriage with J. M. East, a highly respected farmer of Volinia township, and in 1927 they left their farm near Marcellus and came to Decatur, living in the little cottage home on West St. Marys street where Mrs. East still resides. Here she took an interest in village affairs and was an active member of the Garden Club, the Get Together Club and Happy Hour Club.

As a hobby she pieced quilts and worked in her flower garden, which contained many of the best known flowers, and many rolls of colored films have been taken when her blooms were at the height of their beauty. Her garden was her life and it gave her pleasure to give those who came to see her, huge arm fulls of flowers as well as slips and roots of anything they desired. Through her fingers she seemed to give strength and life to everything she planted for her shrubbery which surrounds her yard was nearly all started from cuttings perhaps taken from a bouquet given her by a friend.

She enjoyed almost perfect health until about two years ago. Since then she has led a quiet and inactive life, cheered by the devotions of her family and the loving remembrances of her many Decatur friends.

LETTERS

OF COURSE WE WANT IT

Bert Hazleton writes from Kalamazoo:

"Well, old Timer, just what can we expect from our legislature in the way of a delinquency bill that our teen-age will understand? We should have an honest law in delinquency drawn up by men with better moral characters than some of our legislators. I will send you a story on why Michigan, Illinois and Texas have no regulation for lock and safe men if you want it."

WHEN DECATUR WAS YOUNG

Robert Canning can go back a long way in personal remembrance of early Decatur days, and it is always a pleasure to hear from him and Mrs. Canning who now reside in the city of Pontiac.

We can remember most of the places he mentions in the letter following. The old tannery was a great place and it had a fascination for us. We picked up very thin strips of wood there to take home for lighters.

Pontiac, Mich.
Feb. 19, 1945.

Dear Mr. Moulton,

The time has come once again to renew our subscription to your good little "Decatur Republican," which we enjoy reading, as it makes its weekly visits to us. It most always arrives on Thursdays, though during the holidays, due to the Christmas mail, it came on Friday, for several weeks. We would surely miss it, should it "fail to arrive."

Pontiac has had plenty of snow and cold weather this winter, along with most sections of the state. We have kept quite well, except for a throat infection, from which I am just recovering. My husband has kept up remarkably well, all winter without even a bad cold, but he doesn't get out of doors much on account of the cold, and icy streets. He will be 87 years old April 6.

He has jotted down some items about early Decatur days that he thought might be of interest to you and some of your readers, to wit:

When the old Duncombe House stood at the upper end of Main St., and Wilkinson had a livery stable across the street, on St. Mary's St.

Tommy and John O'Leary each ran a one horse dray.

Little Tom Conway ran a saloon in the middle of the block on the east side of Main Street near where Pardinette's harness shop was. At that time the M. C. R. R. fired all their engines with wood, which they bought in 4 foot lengths and had it cut into 16 inch lengths.

The old tannery stood on the South side of the track between the depot and George St. They used all the white oak bark they could get. They hauled hemlock bark from Covert on sleighs, to the tannery. Mr. Shookman worked there.

Ransom Nutting was supervisor of Decatur township—a democrat. The next year they elected Billy O. Van Hise, a Republican, to succeed Nutting.

The Lyons lived in the big square house, east of the stave factory.

There was a saw mill and also a grist mill, in the hollow across from Lyman Rawson's dwelling. You can print these items if you wish to. They may be of interest to some.

With the very kindest regards, to you, Mr. Moulton, we remain,

Very Sincerely,
Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Canning
592 Going St., Pontiac 20, Mich.

In the same mail with the letter from Mr. and Mrs. Canning, there came a copy of the "Raton Daily Range," published at Raton, Colfax county, New Mexico, the home of Dr. Thomas B. Lyon, who sent it. Dr. Lyon was a member of the family who lived in the big square house east of the factory mentioned in the letter of the Cannings.

Dr. Lyon and Robert Canning are nearly the same age and both lived in Decatur away back in the sixties and seventies.

The story following is taken from the Raton paper:

DR. LYON TELLS OF LINCOLN ASSASSINATION

An interesting circumstance developed yesterday in a casual call at the Chamber of Commerce, which bore direct reference to the fact it was Lincoln's birthday.

Dr. T. B. Lyon will be 86 years of age on his next anniversary. In talking about this and that, the question of the exact date of Lincoln's assassination came up. Both he and the other man were agreed about it's having been 80 years ago.

Doctor Lyon was a small lad, about 6, living on a farm a couple of miles from Decatur, Mich., a small town near Kalamazoo. He was playing in the yard on April 15, 1865, when an excited neighbor drove up his frisky horse pulling a small cart, and called loudly for the doctor's father. He told him "Lincoln's shot," and then buzzed on to give further news. Doctor Lyon recalls the profound shock of his father and mother, and even on his own small-childish mind.

Incidentally, it wasn't long after that until Doctor Lyon, a young lad having finished grade school, went to Chicago, got a job driving a milk wagon, studied as best he could, took an examination, and was admitted to Rush Medical College from which he was graduated in 1886. He practiced here for more than 40 years, then, at 60, went back to his alma mater, took eye, ear, nose and throat training, and came back to specialize.

REPLYING To WALKLING LETTER

Chicago, Feb. 20, 1945.

Dear Mr. Moulton,

Enclosed please find cashier's check for my subscription to your paper. I get quite a laugh out of the piece that your Lynd Walkling had in the paper about a good old firm like Montgomery Ward. Mr. Walkling had better take a look into the facts before he expresses his ideas on the subject.

I am enclosing a clipping from the paper from a gentleman in Evanston. People in small towns do not know what the large city managers have to put up with when it comes to the C. I. O. Union telling the owner of the business just how he is to conduct his business, and that he must hire all C. I. O. workers.

The State of North Dakota has just passed a law that does not allow a closed shop. Will drop in and see you when I get up your way.

Yours truly,
W. A. Reay.

CHECK-OFF FOR CHURCH DUES?

Evanston, Ill.—Your editorial on the decision rendered by Judge Philip L. Sullivan in the Montgomery Ward case is most timely. It seems to me, however, you have entirely overlooked the real underlying cause of the dispute between Ward's and the union, which both the union and the government sought to tiptoe past, but which Sewell Avery emphasized. I refer to the two un-American demands of the union—maintenance of union membership and the check-off of union dues. There can be no doubt that if Ward's had submitted to these two demands there would have been no strike. Not until the present administration in Washington came into power has a labor union had the effrontery to impose such demands on an employer.

Labor unions have repeatedly demonstrated that when they are in the saddle they can be far more overbearing and tyrannical than the most hard-boiled employer. Now, they have no more right to impose such conditions on an employer than my church has to insist that my employer check off my church dues; and, also, that he fire me in the event that I withdraw from the church. Arthur D. Foyer.

FAST LIVING IN FLORIDA

West Palm Beach, Fla.
February 14, 1945.

Friend Arba,

I want to drop you a few lines from the Land of Flowers. In this section of sailors, soldiers and pelicans, a fellow does not know whether to wave a signal flag, salute or look up and wave a flag of truce—everything is quite thick down here.

My trip of 10 days with 114 stops from Los Angeles to Miami—3400 miles—was made with out any arguments with a ration board or O. P. A. As I had many stops to make enroute I made this in fair time and within the speed limits.

Believe I wrote you a card from New Orleans. Since that time I have been overly busy trying to find a place to sleep nights as first class accommodations are very scarce down here, even at $35 per week for a good room. How there can be plenty of people in every city I was in from Los Angeles via Yuma, Tucson, Las Crucies, El Paso, Juarez, Del Rio, and even smaller towns of Texas, San Antonio, Houston, Beaumont, to New Orleans, Gulfport, Biloxi, Mobile, Tallahassee, Florida—all you could see was "Sorry, No Vacancies." There must be some place in the U. S. A. that all the people have left behind.

Talk of "ceilings," there are none. I paid $7.50 for a room in Tucson, $5.50 in New Orleans, $6.00 in West Palm Beach, $5.00 in Mobile, $7.00 in Tallahassee.

The only reasonable spots I found were at Orlando and Ft. Lauderdale, then you had to stop driving at 2:00 or 2:30 p. m. to find those. So on the whole trip a fellow had to spend much time trying to find a restaurant in the morning that did not say on the door "Open at 11 a. m.," and at noon to eat before 2 p. m. or they would be closed, then at nite find a sign on the door open 11 p. m. to 6 a. m., and hotels with "No Vacancy" signs.

Gas stations open irregular hours, or have a sign out "No Gas", with tanks full for friends or neighbors, and not for the traveler. Couldn't purchase a cigaret from Los Angeles to Tallahassee. Just would not sell to strangers. "So 'tis."

Florida seems to have plenty of things, which includes 75° evenings, as tonight. A little cool here a couple of days, down to 45°. However the sand will not freeze your feet. Yet you hear people complain. I really do not know what the people want, and neither does Roosevelt now. For example I was in a colored district near here lately and heard a conversation between a white lady in a Cadillac car, and a "colored gal" ankle deep in sand. The white lady, a Mrs. Anderson, wanted the colored girl to do her washing. The colored girl replied, "Well, Missus Anderson, I ain't got no time. I'se terrible busy trampin' all around tryin' to find somebody to do my washin'. No mam, I shore can't do it." So "Tobacco Road."

Recently I was at a post office window and over the window it said—"3 days notice for withdrawals." A large colored lady in front of me said, "Here, Mam's my slip, I want to drawse out $500.00 by Saturday, and today's Thursday, so that's long enough."

Then there are others who are always in the calaboose, so are the ways of life, whether here, there or elsewhere, and always will be as long as there is money.

Well, this is a rather lengthy letter and I have a few reports to make so will close. They say I am to be transferred in July to "Michigan again," so I may have the pleasure of seeing you this time.

Oh, yes, I forgot to mention the magic city,—namely Miami. Even without dog racing or horse racing, the city of Miami is enjoying a very profitable season—also the cities of Ft. Lauderdale and West Palm Beach. But lots of people will cut their winter vacations short this year because of the extra cost.

How sailors and soldiers can keep their wives on their salaries I do not know. Yet you see them daily paying $12.00 for a room, and $1.50 each for their meals, and always in bars.

I will mail this somewhere along my travels tomorrow.

Very sincerely, Bob.

I wanted to see Bruce Bassett when I was in Santa Monica, but always put it off. Also meant to see Otto Van Hise in Pacoima. Just failed to do so, that's all.

Dear Editor:

Nearly every issue mentions names or incidents which stir my wife's and my memories. Some months since we were much interested in the stories of the McCay musicians whom both of us remembered well. And several times you have reminded me of my foolish promise to send you a story of the Chavileer family. Now, however, I am not sure that you should give space to that. This Week of December 28 mentions a farm at the foot of Fifield Hill and if the present generation does not know that feature of the landscape as Chavileer Hill, they might not be interested in the family who located there in 1846.

Your issue in Christmas week had so many interesting items that my wife says I should write you. That paper mentioned many names which we knew even though we did not know all the owners of the names.

Some of the names were Sela Eckenberger, Parshall Van Duzer, Charles W. Secord and L. G. Stewart. Of course, we knew Mr. Stewart well and we are glad to hear about him from time to time through your paper. Is Fred Newson, who is now located at Benton Harbor, the boy who in the '80s lived east of the School and who with the rest of us spent so many evenings at the telegraph office with Homer Hungerford? And where is Homer?

We were sorry to read of the passing of Edward Browning Griswold and my wife and I send our sympathy to his sister Grace whom both of us knew. That Browning family was a great asset to Decatur. Besides the parents and the two daughters, Libbie—Mrs. Clark—and Anna and the son Gideon who remained in Decatur, the summer visits of the Saint Louis Brownings and the Chicago Griswolds added much to the pleasure of us who saw them each year. Recently we heard indirectly from Gideon's daughter Marjorie through my cousins, Amanda and Rose DeBolt.

The Eagle Lake camping party you mention was one of the annual outings arranged by the Edward J. Sanfords of Kansas City who with their daughter Lulu Marion—Mrs. George H. Taft—were also regular summer visitors. Mr. Sanford and his brother Webster, who also visited there were sons of Mrs. A. J. Kinne. That brother's name was given to him because Mrs. Kinne's mother was Asenath Webster, who early in the last century lived at Vergennes, Vermont. And at about the time that my wife's great grandmother, Asenath Webster, lived just east of Lake Champlain, my great grandfather, Samuel Webster, lived on the New York side of the Lake. But when I wondered whether this meant that we were related even before marriage I was chagrined to find that I had no ancestry back of Samuel Webster, while her's goes back to John Webster, born in England, who settled at Hartford in 1636 and was the seventh governor of Connecticut.

But this is a long way from that Eagle Lake party which, I believe was about 1887 to 1889. Though my wife had been at many of those outings she did not come from Elgin for that one. Perhaps I would not have gone had I known she would not be there. Probably the person you mention as Lulu Sanford's girl friend was Myrtle Williams of Galesburg, Illinois who was a cousin of Lulu and of my wife. She married Will Secord of Decatur but died several years ago. Will and their son Royal are in business as job printers in Los Angeles where we saw them in 1939.

Though I am not sure, it seems that Grace Griswold was at Eagle Lake that year. If so, then possibly she, you and I are the only survivors. But if she was not there perhaps our survival is a demonstration of the saying that the good die young.

Sincerely yours,
Norman E. Webster.

Mr. Webster was an active young townsman of Decatur in those developing years before he went away to learn his profession and to make a place for himself in the great city of New York. What he writes of the early remembrances of himself and Mrs. Webster is to us interesting reading.

We are still looking forward to receiving his story of the Chavileer family who were among the first settlers of this community. In our boyhood years the big hill beyond the New Swamp road south of Decatur village was known as Chavileer Hill. A corduroy road through the swamp, which at times was impassible, led up to it.

No name for the hill was ever recorded, but no name in that community was quite so outstanding as that of Chavileer, and it just naturally became attached to the hill.

John Chavileer was a great character and we look to Mr. Webster to give the story of his life. He was a soldier of the Civil War and after the war came back to the farm. But the hard years of the life of a soldier made him restless and he sold out and went west, we think to Nebraska.

The last time we saw him was in the summer of 1903 or '04. The Grand Army Encampment was held in Washington, D. C., and he stopped in Decatur on his way to attend it. He was old and the spark of life in him was growing dim, but his iron will supported him and carried him through to the encampment and return. Soon afterward he answered the final call. We shall never forget his visit to the printing office. The Moulton farm, where our grandparents settled in '69, and where we were born, was on one side of the big swamp and the Chavileer farm on the other side, the families were then considered neighbors and Mr. Chavileer talked about his life there as a pioneer. We cannot remember what he said but can remember well how he looked. He was a small man but in his bearing, in his face and in his speech there was power. He fitted the phrase, "The Rugged Pioneer."

John Chavileer sold out to Tom Abbott, who built the big house, and he in turn sold to F. W. Fifield in 1883.

Mr. Fifield came here from the eastern part of the state. He, too, was a man of unusual force and ability and in time became the dominating influence in his community. The big hill gradually took his name and it became to the younger generation 'Fifield Hill.' But to the old timers the name Chavileer is still familiar.

To preserve this name in our local history and to give it the prominent place there which it deserves is the big reason why we hope that Mr. Webster will soon release to the Republican the story of the Chavileers.

It was Parshall Van Duzer's son James whose death in Chicago was noticed in the Republican last week.

Fred Newson is the boy of the eighties who lived on Prospect street east of the school house and helped Homer Hungerford while away the hours in the telegraph office when he was night operator.

Homer made a big place for himself in railroad circles. He became the superintendent of a Southern road and for a number of years came north each summer in his private car. It was switched onto a side track at Dowagiac while he spent pleasant days with his relatives on the farm and renewed acquaintances with his old friends in Decatur. He passed away about ten yeasr ago.

THE GOOD OLD DAYS

By Elwood D. Scott

First Good Old Days

The apples the old timers had were much finer than the commercial varieties of today, but it required so many years for those old kinds to reach bearing age they are almost all dropped from cultivation. Those old heaped up apple bins in the cellar were a source of real delight on winter nights, and the children loved the heaping dishpans of snowy popcorn. Then when the neighbors came in for a few games of double pedro the happiness was complete.

In my kid days most of the wells were dug, and boarded up like a mining shaft. Often long-dead mice, frogs and toads, bloated and slimy, came up in the water buckets. Kerosene lamps had been in use before I was born, but for many years they were only used when company came.

Those were not the Good Old Days anyway, for I heard the old original pioneers scoff and jeer at those times when I was a lad. They said lumber wagons were good enough for anyone to ride in, and they eyed with extreme disfavor the light, sleek, easy riding buggies that were coming into vogue among the well-to-do. They said they should be compelled to go back to the ox carts.

They hated the mowers and binders, and destroyed many of the new machines because they feared men would lose their jobs cradling in the harvest fields. We have a right to feel proud of our America, yet slavery had only been abolished a few years before that, and after the Civil War wages dropped to twenty-five cents a day.

The pioneers put the glorious period somewhere before eighteen hundred, but they too were hopelessly indefinite about it. So let us go back to that earlier time spoken of so reverently, and examine some of the everyday life of that faded heaven.

One of the New England states had just prohibited bath tubs by law. Hay was cut with scythes, raked, bunched and pitched by hand, often with wooden pitch forks. Grain was cut with a cradle, raked into bundles with a wooden-toothed rake, and bound by hand with a wisp of the straw, thistles and all.

Broken Down at 45

There were no horse cultivators and all corn had to be hoed by hand. Splitting fence rails with a maul and wedge, and clearing land with a grub hoe were regular occupations, and what sweet jobs those were. Wooden tubs and pails were used, along with gourd dippers. Many wooden dishes were in use, and the cracks made choice places for disease germs to multiply in safety and peace. Tooth brushes were practically unknown, and few knew anything about the care of teeth. If you had toothache the offending molar was removed by aid of a turnkey, an instrument of exquisite torture miraculously overlooked by the Spanish Inquisition. In after years the village blacksmith might have a pair of rusty forceps and pull your teeth for nothing. But not all communities were that lucky.

Many men were hopelessly broken down physically at forty-five, and the women were toothless hags at forty. The fine rubber covered foot wear we have today was undreamed of yet, and the men wore coarse, thick, heavy cowhide boots made by the village cobbler. To keep their feet dry they had to grease them well with mutton, or deer tallow. But this also made them unbearably cold, and unless you had room for three or four pairs of socks, frozen feet were frequent.

The telegraph and telephone were coming on the slow wings of the future. Most logs, and all of the wood was cut with heavy, thick-bladed axes, for they knew nothing of the fine, thin models of today. They had a form of the cross cut saw, but it had not been perfected much yet. Also they were expensive, slow cutting, hard pulling, and no one knew how to file and adjust them anyway.

Many of the early settlers had no fit tools to dig, or board up a well, so they got their drinking water the easiest way, from very shallow wells, lakes, creeks, or even surface pools. As they knew nothing about the germ theory of disease, they did not boil the water, and fever and ague made their lives truly miserable, and shortened them many years.

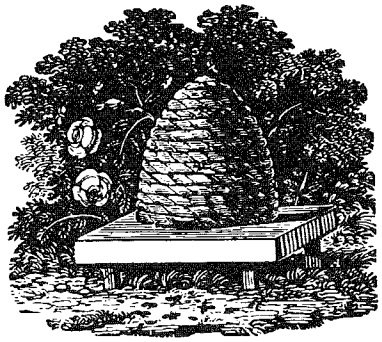
Doctors Poor

When your eyes began to fail there was little help for you. Only the larger cities had opticians, and often they did more harm than good. Anyone could be a doctor by simply declaring himself such, and diagnosis was far from being an exact science. Most of these self styled doctors knew the medicinal properties of only a few herbs, but I think they called them 'yarbs' in those days.

Broken bones were rarely set properly, and any serious wound might result in blood poison, lockjaw ,or death. The death rate among infants was terrible, and tuberculosis, known as consumption, scourged the entire nation. If you had appendicitis no one knew what it was, nor what to do about it. For all diseases they had one standard remedy known as blood letting, or bleeding, where they actually made a cut and drained blood from the patient's system.

Most men bathed and changed underclothes every Saturday night in winter, but many only took a scrub every two weeks. Some of the more independent type dispensed with bathing entirely in the cold months, so it is not surprising that perfumes found a ready sale.

White sugar was unknown, and many of the better class of country people bought syrup, or molasses by the barrel to eat on their bread, biscuits and hot cakes. Some sorghum was grown to make molasses, but unless properly done it was rather vile stuff, but those old timers ate it just the same. Where families lived among maple trees they often made what they called "soft sugar," and this was the only sweetening they ever had.



Log Cabins and Dirt Floors

Rattle snakes were everywhere, and the more rare and deadly copperhead haunted the low grounds. Stoves were not yet invented, and the fireplace was a source of little heat about the house, and was a tough proposition when used in preparing meals.

The women often kept house in a dirt floored cabin hewn from green logs, with few windows. They did the washing with home made soft soap, and often without a washboard. There were no door, or window screens, and flies and mosquitoes feasted unmolested, except for little smudge fires at night.

A poor grade of whiskey was made from corn, while the men, and often the women, smoked and chewed the rank, home grown tobacco that had no pretense of proper curing.

The men sheared the sheep, and the women carded and spun the wool into yarn, then wove it into coarse cloth on a hand loom. So the mothers did not have too much spare time after they knitted the socks and mittens.

Hay was always scarce in the winter months, and often they had to cut trees for the cattle to browse upon to keep them from starving to death.

The men never shaved, and they hunted with muzzle loading guns, many of them flint locks. Brooms were made mostly from the stiff shavings from the blue water beech, tied to a handle. Most of the furniture was made by the use of three tools, the knife, axe and auger.

Before the year eighteen hundred, carpenter work was not as simple as at present because all nails were hand made. Factory made nails did not get into the outpost sections for many years afterward. Log cabins had two extremes. If the gable ends were well boarded up the attic was always filled with stale air and that is where the children slept. If the gable ends were a hit and miss job, as was often the case, snow drifted over the attic floor and beds, in winter.

If you had to travel in the cavernous forest at night you carried a candle lantern, made of tin, having three glass sides. If it blew out your luck was bad, because there were no matches. Most families kept a constant fire in the fireplace, for not all were handy at lighting fires with a flint and steel. It was no rarity for people to go to near neighbors to get live coals to rekindle the fire.

Some families had candle molds for making candles. Others dipped wicking in melted tallow, then they let it cool, and kept dipping until it had reached the proper size.

Beans were seldom missing from the daily menu, and they had onions in everything but the custard. In many instances the porridges, soups and stews were served in a large wooden bowl set in the middle of the table, and all the diners ate with their spoons from that one dish. Out in the woods they frequently made lunch of bread and raw salt pork cut off a little piece at a time with a hunting knife.

Many of those old trail makers used parched rye for coffee all their lives. Earlier in our country's history superstitious fanatics burned innocent old women for witches, on very slight pretexts.

Always A Glorious Past

It matters little how far you go back through the years, they were still mourning about a Golden Age from a glorious, far distant past, and they received most improvements with anger and resentment.

Scientific cattle breeding began in England less than two hundred years ago, and was harshly condemned by the rabid church men as interfering with the intentions of God. For similar reasons Galileo's life was threatened because he had invented the telescope.

In the middle ages most of the refuse and slop from the homes was poured in the gutters of the city streets, and travelers found the stench of those cities almost unbearable. Many diseases flourished amazingly in those conditions and the Black Plague made periodic visits, spreading terror and death over vast areas.

Down through the ages people thought the past held treasures that were lost, or denied to themselves. Even Homer, twenty-nine hundred years ago bemoaned the fact that the glorious days were gone, and there were no new heroes to take the place of those illustrious ones who had gone before.

Old timers always seem suspicious and jealous of the innovations and improvements of the younger generations, and look with contempt upon them. Yet each age is only a stepping stone to the next which is still higher and better.

Each new crop of grandparents think the country is going to the bow wows because the youngsters start changing the old order of things. It will probably always be that way until Father Time has rolled up, and laid away his scroll.

In his climb to higher, and better conditions man seems able to surmount every obstacle to his progress, except himself. Unrest drove him to all his attainments. Had it not been for the eternal dissatisfaction in the human mind we would still be competing with the apes for the wild fruits and acorns.

Never Satisfied

We are a nation of fault finders, even though science has showered unnumbered comforts and luxuries upon us. The average span of human life now is about fifty-six years, a hundred years ago it was thirty-five, and in Caesar's time it was only eighteen years.

We are sated with so much that is excellent that we do not appreciate what would have been deemed miracles a hundred years ago. Our senses have been drugged and dulled by so much enjoyment that with the multitude of sports, dances, meetings, lodges, parties, radios and moving pictures we are still far from satisfied.

It seems to require a certain amount of hard knocks to develop real character, and perhaps that is why wealthy families seldom produce a genius. Nations do not go to pieces in bad times, but in good. Our grim, stern past produced many truly great men and women, and they continue to live with us as immortals. But those Good Old Days never existed except as mirages, and then they needed the glow of many sunsets from departed years to hide their dreariness.

No king of a hundred years ago enjoyed the comforts and blessings our common working classes now possess. In those old castles of continental Europe the inside walls gleamed with frost all through the winter months. Our ordinary homes are better ventilated, better heated and better lighted than that old royalty could hope to experience.

All the year around there are dainties in the stores no monarch could purchase a hundred years ago. The farther back we go the more raw and primitive human life becomes. If we had to go back and endure the working hours and conditions of a century ago, one year would seem to multiply eternity.

This is the greatest year since man quit living in caves, even though the sub-brute Germans and abysmal Japs almost succeeded in turning down the Lamp of Time.

Last summer I went to the upper peninsula of Michigan to make some badly needed repairs on the cabin roof, and to search for health, lost elsewhere. Camping by a beautiful emerald lake in the solitude of the wildland furnished some new fuel for the fires of thought.

All my life I had been hearing and reading about "The Good Old Days," and one night when a great rain squall played Nature's Storm Symphony on that cabin roof I got to wondering just when that wonderful period was. Somehow it had always lacked an exact date. Nowadays people refer to it vaguely as in The Gay Nineties, or the Elegant Eighties.

I was born in the late seventies, and there is little from my childhood years that I would care to recall. The city dwellers got the factory jobs, and in the country and small towns farming was the main employment. Back in the years mentioned jobs were rare, yet you either worked for your living, or sponged off someone who did. There were no government agencies to pamper anyone. It was a case of work, or go ragged and starve. You took care of yourself and had pride in it.

Those old timers asked no odds of anybody, for they were a hardy, self-reliant lot, and had to be to live. In these days some people resort to deceit and dishonor to get their parents an old age pension, or have them cared for by the welfare societies. In those days it was considered an unbearable disgrace to have a relative become a public charge.

Daylight to Dark

On the farm you rose about 4:30 a. m. with a lot of chores to do, ate breakfast at six, and had the teams in the field at six-thirty. You worked until noon, had dinner, did a few more chores and were at work again at one.

Most farmers quit the field at six p. m., but not in haying, grain, or bean harvesting. Those were special periods when you worked until dark, and overtime was not yet in the dictionary of laborers. Evening chores still had to be done regardless of the quitting time, and often you unloaded the wagons by lantern light.

We had the mowing machine in those days, but the boss rode it while the hired man bunched the hay with a pitch fork. Also he worked in the hot hay mow while the boss pitched it off.

Wages on the Farm

Later the first binders came out, and a man was disgraced if he did not set the grain in shocks as fast as it was cut. Before the bundle carrier was added to the binder that was no job for a softie. The beards of the rye and barley made this task something far removed from a dream of delight, but a really first class man could get twenty dollars a month, board, room and washing. Inferior help got from twelve to sixteen, and boys, four to eight dollars per month. A top-notch girl sometimes got as much as a dollar and a half a week.

Many of the farmers treated the hired hands as members of the family, but there were some who did not; neither were tyrants unknown. Yet any kind of a job was highly prized, and only fools quit because they got miffed about something, real or fancied.

A long time ago I was riding with one of those old timers when he waved his hands over the landscape and said, "Salt pork cleared every bit of that land." And salt pork was on the table seven days a week. Besides that they ate those meat frylngs on their potatoes and bread, seldom using any butter. These observations do not refer to the wealthy class, but to the hard-up, struggling mass of farmers.

Cultivating corn was done with a "double shovel", a walking rig using one horse, and had to go twice in each row, and among stumps and roots. If ever there was torture for aching shoulders that old jumping, bobbing double shovel was it. Finally the wheeled cultivator came, this was a walking job too, but it used two horses. Later the Fremont cultivators came out, and the operator rode the machine, doing much better work.

One farmer I knew went to town to buy a wheeled outfit, and came back with the walker, where the man guided the two gangs, as well as the two horses with his hands. It was after quitting time when he got home and the hired man went out to see it, remarking casually, "Oh, you bought the walking kind." The boss replied, "Yes, I am not buying riding cultivators for hired men."

Long Hours

In a similar vein of thought another boss took the new hand out to the stump and grub patch to clear some new land. In mid-morning the new man stopped to fill his clay pipe. The boss asked him what he was doing that for; and he said, "Take a smoke." The boss spoke out venomously, "I do not stop to fill my pipe, and by G—— you ain't going to either; we did not come out here to smoke pipes." Such incidents were far from rare.

For miles around one farmer was particularly noted for getting his men out extremely early in the morning, and keeping them working late at night. One Saturday night the hired man went to the village, and the boys jokingly asked him how he knew when it was time to get up in the morning. He answered, "O, I blow out the light when I undress, then I throw my pants up in the air, and when I hear them hit the floor I know it is time to get up."

My first job hiring out was on a berry farm when I was sixteen, and I was never abed after four-thirty in the morning, working as long as I could see at night, which is quite late in June and July. Nightmares of that season haunted my dreams for many years. Yet everywhere in the country those experiences were not unusual. There was no use complaining, for you could quit any time, and someone else would be thankful for the job.

Most hired hands got paid eight or nine months of the year, but worked for their board in the winter months; getting paid if they sawed wood at forty cents a cord, and the other man getting half. The hired man had his Sunday off, but if he wanted to go anywhere he usually had to walk. In those times, if your finances got run down at the heel, your outlook was decidedly dreary.

Entertainments

Entertainment was at low tide. At some schoolhouses in the winter they held what were termed Lyceums, where two captains chose sides, and debated mostly silly questions, the same old ones, year after year. Also in the winter we had an occasional box social, or a maple sugar party. But this generation would find them tame after the first one.

The town hall might get an indifferent group of singers, dignified by the title of Concert Company. Wagon shows came through each summer with some rather poor quality gymnasts and acrobats. Some roughneck in a clown's suit sprung smutty jokes, and made painful, and futile efforts to be funny.

We thought we enjoyed those simple amusements immensely, because they were all we had, and we saw nothing to compare them with that was any better.

But I think the dances of those old times were far superior to those of today. The orchestras played music by celebrated composers, and the melodies were loved through the years. They were not as wiggly as the tunes are today, neither did they sound like miserable imitations of cat fights. There was lots of new music played, but it had to be good. One of the great dance players of those times had stacks of fine music, and could play from memory eighty sets of quadrilles. The dancers performed the schottische and waltz numbers beautifully, and there was stateliness and grace, as well as charm, in the quadrilles. The rough, uncouth, bawdy square dance of today, with its misfit tunes, inherited nothing but the name from the past.

Those old time dances sometimes lasted until near daylight, but they were infrequent and going to them many miles away in a cutter on a stormy night with the weather below zero was not nearly as much fun as tender memories seem to recall in after years. If anyone had attempted to do some of this modern dancing, or so-called dancing, in the ball rooms of fifty years ago he would have been hissed, or perhaps kicked from the hall.

Few Luxuries

Potatoes were all dug with a fork, but the worst job on the farm was pulling beans by hand, as you were on your knees most of the time, and nothing else could promote a lasting backache in so short a time. It was done mostly by husky boys who thought they were in luck when they were paid seventy-five cents per day.

All corn was husked by hand with a wooden husking peg, and you were regarded as a sissy if you wore gloves; you were out in the field as soon as it was light enough to see, and the icy winds, snow, and wet husks had all the knuckle joints chapped and bleeding before a week had passed.

Farmers went to town about every two weeks for mail and groceries, except when they ran out of tobacco. The hens laid about four dozen eggs a year, but few after Thanksgiving. If a family had seventy-five quarts of canned fruit for winter it was considered wonderful, and canning vegetables was an art housewives had not learned at that time.

Few oranges were sold except at Christmas, and no fresh celery, lettuce, carrots, or beets in the winter. Oil stoves had not made their appearance yet, so all cooking was done over wood fires, even in the summer. Few people had the luxury of an ice house, and there was only one dipper in the school house water pails.

Funerals lasted over two hours. Daily papers were out of the question, and few could afford magazines. Grocers had never heard of keeping baked goods. There were a few story papers such as the New York Ledger, but those were loaned until worn to tatters. Most of the books were of a religious nature, or of the old style English goody-goody type. What few novels that were in circulation at least had the common merit of decency; while after perusing some of our modern best sellers the mind and the home need to be disinfected.

In those days there were no pure food laws, so dozens of worthless patent medicines were sold, and quackery thrived until the suckers quit biting. They still gave skunk oil, or kerosene to children for sore throats, while blood puddings, hominy and tripe were often on the bill of fare.

In the fall apples and pumpkins were cut in thin slices, sewed on a string, and hung over the stove to dry; the flies were probably thankful for such a fine place to roost. There were no inspections, so diseased cattle and hogs were slaughtered for food, and everybody swigged milk from diseased cows in blissful ignorance.

In our modern flour mills the wheat goes through sets of stiff brushes, and nearly all foreign matter is crushed and blown away. The screens and fanning mills of those times had no such magic fingers, and as the rats and mice used the wheat bins for their picnics it is well to place a limit on your wandering imagination.

Chavileer Hill and The Chavileer Family

By Norman E. Webster,
50 Broadway, New York, 4, New York

A Visit To Familiar Places

By Jennie L. Chavileer Webster.

Ed and I went to Decatur on Friday, June 22nd, 1923. Saturday forenoon, Joe took his car and we went across the swamp on the road that comes out at Chavileer Hill. We visited the old home. There have been many changes. The house that we all knew so well and which was moved across the road (when the new one was built) has entirely disappeared.

The house in which John and Kate began housekeeping is moved up near the orchard and is used as a tenant house. The barns have been changed by many additions, and some entirely new built. The orchard still remains much as it was years ago. We drank of the spring water that is always running—surely no other water ever tasted so good, and no other running water ever made such music as that does.

We then went on down to Joe's house, that being a brick house, it has not changed much and while it is occupied by tenants, he looks after it so closely there are few changes. We visited the celery and peppermint that is growing on the muck land there.

We then went up the road on Chavileer Hill. The thick woods that used to be on either side of the road are cleared away and many good farms and comfortable homes are where only the Brewer farm and a few others used to be.

We went to the Crane Cemetery where mother and Ellen are buried; also Jim and Rachel's little boy with their marker "Johnnie Sleeps", and John and Kate's baby boy with "Our little Claude" on the stone.

We then went on past many of the farms that were so well known—the Gards, Huffs, Squires, and others that were familiar places years ago.

At last Joe said "And this is Charleston". But there were only two small houses and they were in the corner of a field under cultivation. One could hardly believe there had ever been a hotel and a number of other houses there. We saw the Moreland home; there had been some changes—I recalled some of the frolics and incidents in connection with it.

We then went down to John and Kate's old home. The front of the house looked much as it did years ago. The roses and shrubs were still there. There had been added a new kitchen and wood shed and porch. A large barn stands in the place where the old one stood,—that had been moved back and made into a shed for wagons and other farm implements.

This was one of the most familiar places we had seen. It is owned by a son of Andrew Rutherford whom I have reason to remember very kindly for he worked for father a year or more when I was a child and used to help me with my arithmetic which the teacher could not or would not take time to explain. After a pleasant call here, we went over to Little Prairie Ronde. Saw the Morris, Lawrence, and many other farms well cultivated and which looked much as they used to. Then we went along that beautiful drive past the Ben Hathaway farm. The house was destroyed by fire not long ago—the flowers and shrubbery were there as of old.

We called at the Rosewarne farm. Frank Rosewarne lives there, and while the house has been changed and enlarged, otherwise it was much as it used to be. We had a pleasant visit there recalling some of the old times.

We then went to the Anderson Cemetery where father and mother Webster are buried. We went down the West Valley road, past the Charles place, also the home of Doc Simpson, and John Welcher's old home, and came to that beautiful stream—Rattle Run. The Vought home has been well cared for, also the Bryan Youngs place.

Then we came to the school house with so many pleasant associations. I could but think of the song we used to sing:

The old school house is altered some,
The benches are replaced
By new ones very like the same
Our pen knives had defaced;
The same old bricks are in the walls,
The bell swings to and fro
The music's just as sweet
As many years ago.

There have been no changes at the Goble farm. The house where father lived a short time before going west is gone. Red Run is the same old red stream.

As we rode along those country roads, I repeated for Joe and Ed that song we used to sing to our country beaux:

I am a wild and laughing girl,
Just turned on sweet sixteen,
As full of mischief and of fun
As ever you have seen;
But when I am a woman grown
No city beau for me,
If ever I marry in my life,
A farmer's wife I'll be.

I love to feed the chickens
And love to milk the cow,
I love to hear the farmer's boy
Go whistling to his plow;
The lowing herds and bleating flocks
Make music sweet for me,
If ever I marry in my life
A farmer's wife I'll be.

Let other girls who love it best
Enjoy the gloomy town,
'Mid dusty walls and dusty streets
To ramble up and down,
But flowery banks and shady woods
And sunny skies for me,
If ever I marry in my life
A farmers wife I'll be.

There are five roads crossing the Swamp where there were but one or two for so many years. All of that large meadow and swamp land has been ditched and drained and has become very valuable.

A man was building a large storage plant at Decatur—large enough to hold 35,000 bushels of onions; some of the other crops are celery, beets, and pepermint of which many car loads are shipped every week during the season.

We reached Decatur late in the afternoon. Joe is an ideal host and seems to enjoy giving one a good time, as much as we who are entertained.

Chapter I

A story in the Republican of February 8, 1945 begins as follows:

"The big hill 2½ miles south of Decatur over which the New Swamp Road takes the traveler into Volinia township and Cass county is commonly called Fifield hill after the man who lived at the foot of it in the eighties and nineties.

"Before it was known as the Fifield hill, it was Chavileer hill named for the equally prominent farmer who lived in the same place a generation before him." This was a reminder that the Editor had asked for facts about farmer Chavileer and his family.

The family name in its French form Chevalier is not uncommon in this country. It may be found in many city directories. And there is a family tradition that the father of farmer Chavileer was a Chevalier when he came here from France but his Pennsylvania Dutch neighbors changed his name.

Of the ancestry of farmer Chavileer less is known than about that of his wife. Her great grandmother was the mother of Robert Fulton, having married an immigrant from Kilkenny, Ireland after the death of her first husband Hinkle, whose forename is unknown. By him she had borne a son Joseph Hinkle who of course was older than Robert Fulton who was born in 1765, both probably in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. When Cincinnati, which was first settled about 1789,1790, consisted of little more than a string of block houses, this Joseph Hinkle then perhaps 30 or 35 years of age came down the River from Pittsburgh with his large family. Sometime thereafter, while he with others were out clearing land near the fort and had laid down their guns while they worked, the party was attacked by Indians. All escaped except Joseph Hinkle who was tomahawked and killed, the tragedy being witnessed by his son Joseph who escaped by climbing a tree where he was hidden.

This second Joseph Hinkle was born in 1787 and when his mother was left a widow with a large family he was bound out for a term of years. It is said that he lived a hard life. But in 1806 when he was 19 he married Elizabeth DeBolt. "To Joseph and Elizabeth Hinkle seventeen children were born. One died when an infant and Mrs. Hinkle took a motherless babe in its place, besides two little girls, making in all 19 this remarkable woman reared. The Hinkles are a family of longevity being noted for the same. Joseph Hinkle died in his 95th year (1881). His wife was 67 and lived to see her youngest child married" (perhaps about 1858).

As illustrating this family characteristic of long life and also the size of some families during the forepart of the last century a list of these 17 children of Joseph and Elizabeth Hinkle may be of interest. And it is possible that it may even be of value to some future local historian or geneologist. A few facts about them are as follows:

Mary born 1809, Mrs. J. Chavileer, died 1859 at Decatur, Mich.

Henry born 1811, died 1899 at Saratoga, Ind.

Nancy, born ——, Mrs. Henry Gephart, died 1898 or before.

Lewis born 1814 (Twin of Lucinda), died 1898.

Lucinda born 1814, Mrs. Bailey, living 1899 at Alma, Mich.

Lydia, born ——, Mrs. Sam'l Vanatta living 1899 at Bloomington, Ill.

Squire, born ——, died 1898 or before.

Joseph born, living 1899 at Butler Co., Ohio.

Rachel born, Mrs. Lingle, died 1898 or before.

James born, died 1898 or before.

Amanda born, Mrs. Huffman living 1899 at Saratoga, Ind.

William born, living 1899 at Butler Co., Ohio.

Benjamin born, living 1899 at Butler Co., Ohio.

Elizabeth born, Mrs. Chas. Tyron, living 1899 at Saratoga, Ind.

John born, died 1898 or before.

George born, (Chas. F. adopted) died at birth.

Hiram born 1834, living 1899 at Thackery, Ill.

These were great grandchildren of that early Hinkle who lived in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. And since their father, Joseph, was one of a large family it is understandable that Ohio was said to be full of Hinkles. The lives of four generations covered more than 150 years.

Turning to the Chavileer family the known facts do not go back so far. The earliest known is that an immigrant from France came here probably late in the 18th century. The reason for his coming has not been learned but it is a reasonable surmise that it was to escape from the unsettled political conditions in France or that he may have been influenced by the reports from those who accompanied Lafayette whose name was always revered in the family of the immigrant's son—esteemed almost as highly as that of Washington.

This first Chavileer located in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania and remained on his farm until his death perhaps about 1815 or a little later. His widow whose maiden name has not been learned lived until about 1860. So her children had a long life expectancy as well as those of the family of Joseph Hinkle. In this first Chavileer family there were five children. These were Jonathan born in 1805 who was the farmer at the foot of Chavileer Hill; Eliza who became Mrs. Dillon and the mother of Rev. Perry Dillon an occasional visitor in Decatur; Rebecca who became Mrs. John Fisher; Ellen and David.

Two racial strains arising in different parts of Europe, the Chavileer flowing from France and the Pennsylvania Dutch Hinkle coming from Germany, had wandered into the same county of southeastern Pennsylvania—although not at the same time. And as running water may not be dammed completely, these streams had gone on, apparently by different stream beds until finally they were joined in Ohio as the first generations of the Chavileer family of Chavileer Hill. But this is not a place for rhetorical composition. Even though the odysseys of these two family lines may have seemed epical to them, the stories can be of only passing interest to all except the small circle of their kinfolk.

Jonathan Chavileer was born March 31, 1805 near Lancaster, Pennsylvania. There was a tradition that he attended school with James Buchanan who became the 15th President. But this cannot be a fact because Buchanan was 14 years older than Chavileer and was graduated at Dickinson College at the age of 19 when Chavileer was only 5 years old. But at that time Buchanan went to Lancaster to study law and it is possible that some later association there was the basis for the erroneous tradition. Nothing is known of Chavileer's life from 1805 to 1829 except that prior to the latter year he had gone to Ohio. There at Madisonville, Butler County, Ohio, on August 14, 1829 when he was 24 he married Mary Hinkle who was 20.

As a farmer and a farmer's wife the couple remained there during the next 17 years. There five of their six children were born. A few facts about the children are here noted briefly.

Elinor, born August 25, 1831, married Milo Welcher February 14, 1850 and bore two sons, Joseph and Augustus. She died August 5, 1858;

John F. born October 1, 1834, married Kate Moreland who bore three daughters, Grace, Maud and Effie. He died July 1, 1914;

Rachel H. born January 17, 1839, married James A. Vought January 17, 1858 and bore one daughter, Edna Rachel Vought, died April 6, 1906!

Mary Ann born July 26, 1842, married Charles J. Northrup, January 17, 1864 and bore one daughter, Carrie Gladys and one son Charles C. She died Jan. 6, 1924;

Jane Law born April 1, 1845, married Norman Earl Webster, December 23, 1864 and bore one son, Norman Edward. She died March 3, 1938;

Elizabeth born November 12, 1849, at Decatur, married Lewis T. Cody March 4, 1872 and bore one son Fred C. and one daughter Nellie. She died about 1937.

Unless Jonathan's brother David had children, the six named above and the three daughters of John F. are all whose family name was Chavileer.

In the summer of 1846 after their first 17 years on the farm in Ohio, Jonathan and Mary Hinkle with their son nearly 12 and 4 daughters aged 15, 7, 4 and 1, moved by horse drawn wagon to south western Michigan.

An incident of that trek seems worth recounting. How many persons and teams there were in the party is not known. There were 7 of the Chavileers, the father then 41 being the only man of them. It seemed therefore that there may heve been two or more wagons and perhaps other persons who went along as helpers or passengers. This seems probable because the wagons had to carry personal and household effects and also because it is known that there were occasional check-ups or roll calls. On one of these occasions the baby was missing, little Jane Law or Jennie as she was called by everyone except her father. Searchers retraced the road for a considerable distance and found her where she had fallen. Her face was muddy from the dust of the road mixed with her tears as she had cried herself to sleep.

Since it seems that only four men bore the family name in its Dutchfield form of Chavileer—the French immigrant, his two sons, David of whom no more is known, and Jonathan, and the latter's son John F., the rest of this story will be devoted to the last two who came to the vicinity of Decatur in 1846.

Chapter II

Some of the pioneer families in this section of southwestern Michigan settled on the open land such as Little Prairie Ronde. Among these were the Anderson, Buell, Copley, Hathaway, Lawrence, Morris and Rosewarne families and probably others whose names do not come to mind. Some came before the Chavileers and some later. To them the open level land looked most inviting. But Jonathan Chavileer grew up in the rolling country of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania and for many years had been a farmer in the similar country of Hamilton County, Ohio, each place near running water. So he chose land on the hillside leading down from the upland to the more nearly level land south of the swamp through which the Dowagiac Creek meandered. The location he selected was largely wooded as well as hilly.

But there was another reason for his choice for a home. Well up on the hill there was a spring from which flowed a perennial stream. Whether there was an aesthetic reason underlying this selection as some contend cannot be proven. Certainly there was a utilitarian reason for it. The spring would provide the domestic water supply as well as water for the stock. And there was another reason also. We who live in the towns and cities and even the young people of the country may think that it always was the custom for trucks to pick up the cans of milk, which we see beside the road at each farmhouse, and carry them to the nearest creamery. But in Chavileer's days mechanical separation and pasteurization were unknown. Except near the cities there was no market for milk. Every farmer's wife made butter. It makes my arms ache now even to think of the old dasher churn.

Before the creamery provided a ready market for the farmer's milk he had the problem of keeping the milk and cream sweet. Some large farms had ice houses filled each winter with the harvest from some nearby lake. But that method required much work in winter and added much labor to the long days of summer. Cool cellars were used for milk storage on many farms. And on many farms where there was a small but never failing stream, the milk house or spring house served as the refrigerating storage. Perhaps there are some yet, though all may be gone. On a hillside near the house an excavation was made similar to that for the old time out door cellar. In this was built a long narrow house, the upper end of which was wholly or largely in the excavation while the lower end was nearly all above the ground level. Along each side wall was a table which held a sluice box into which the stream was brought at the upper end and held at 3 or 4 inches deep by a low dam or weir at the lower end before the water passed over and on to the bed of the stream. Each sluice box held two rows of stoneware basins or pans in which the milk was kept until the cream had risen and been skimmed off. The spring house was deliciously cool on a hot day.

For his family Jonathan Chavileer erected a small house on the south side of the Valley Road a short distance west of the New Swamp Road. That house has been gone many years; though when Abbott built the large house on about the same site, the first house was moved across Valley Road where it remained a long time. The son John F. was only 12 in 1846, but much later, after he and Kate Moreland had married, they located on a farm in Volinia over and to the south of Chavileer Hill. Both father and son were Democrats but also they were Unionists. And so while probably neither voted for Lincoln both responded to his calls and enlisted.

John's company formed at Paw Paw in 1861 missed connection for inclusion in a Michigan regiment then being organized. By telegraph it arranged to be accepted as Company C of the 70th New York Infantry. This became a part of Sickles' Brigade which participated in the Peninsular campaign and in the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. In the last General Sickles lost a leg at the Peach Orchard and it fell to the lot of John F. Chavileer to help carry his General from the battlefield. Fifty years later on July 1, 1913 the Grand Army of the Republic held its annual encampment at Gettysburg. That morning the New York Tribune carried on its front page a four-column group of sketches made at the encampment by its artist Weed. It was captioned "J. F. Chavileer who helped carry Gen. Sickles from the field." And sure enough, though no one of his sisters knew that he was in the East, he had come from the State of Washington for that reunion. He visited his kinfolk on his return. Twenty-five years later on July 1, 1938 the New York Herald Tribune published a reproduction of those sketches by Clive Weed which it had printed on the 50th anniversary of Gettysburg.

Jonathan Chavileer must have forgotten his age of almost 57 when in February 1862 at Lawton he enlisted in Company H of the 12th Michigan Infantry. As compared with the period of training now being given to the soldiers of World War II it is interesting that the organization of his regiment was completed on March 5th; it left Niles on March 18th; and on April 6 and 7 it participated in the battle of Shiloh or Pittsburg Landing perhaps the most bitter engagement of the Civil War in the West. The regiment was discharged on March 6, 1866. Some 20 years later when he was living with his son in Western Nebraska he joined the local post of the G. A. R. But after attending a few of its meetings he gave up that association because he could no longer endure hearing all Democrats of Civil War days called copperheads.

His wife Mary Hinkle Chavileer had died in 1859. By 1872 their youngest daughter Elizabeth had married and all his children had homes of their own. He married twice thereafter but there were no other children. A tendency to a restless disposition took him from Decatur to a farm in Macomb County, Michigan near Utica. Then he bought land in Missouri and when his children urged him to free himself from the care of it, he visited it and disposed of it in a trade for land near Waco, Texas. But the title to that proved to be worthless being based upon one of many fraudulent deeds which were circulated after the Court House and local land office were destroyed by fire.

Jonathan Chavileer's son and wife and his five daughters and their husbands have all passed on. And unless Jnoathan's brother David had sons there is now no one carrying the family name of the French immigrant as it was so quickly corrupted by his Pennsylvania neighbors. The last survivor of Jonathan's children was Jane Law Chavileer Webster who died March 3, 1938 when almost 93 and whose obituary was published in the Republican of March 10, 1938. She left a quantity of geneological material much of which has been used in this story of the Chavileer family.

With the boxes of correspondence which she had saved was a small envelope marked "Verses from Mate re 16 and 17 birthdays." The enclosures are in the handwriting of her next older sister Mary Ann who was about 3 years older. The rhymes were for birthdays on April 1, 1861 and 1862.

Since these simple lines are 84 years old and were so intimately associated with the two sisters when they were living near the foot of Chavileer Hill the first verses and the last are copied here.

"To Jennie on her sixteenth:

Thou art sixteen, sweet sixteen,
O may thy brow so fair
When sixteen added years have passed
Be free from lines of care.

To dim thy future happiness
May there no cloud be seen
But may thy life be ever blessed
As now at sweet sixteen.

* * * * *

Farewell I close these simple lines

Most welcome may they be
And sure to make you think at times
Of one away—that's me.
Your sister Mate."

Sixty two years later when Jennie Webster was 78 and had been a widow for nearly two years she, in the company of her favorite nephew, Joseph Welcher, visited some of the scenes of her girlhood and shortly thereafter wrote of the trip to her surviving sisters and to the children of those who had gone. That letter written by a Chavileer to Chavileers and about the vicinity of Chavileer Hill closes this story of Chavileer Hill and the Chavileer family.

An Old Paper Recalls Other Days

Here is some local history that may need correcting, and the person who can correct it may consider this an invitation to do so.

From eighteen eighty to nineteen ten, and perhaps before and after, in a house at the corner of Sherwood and John streets, there resided Clarence Bassett, their daughter Ethel and son Bruce. And didn't Sadie Lucas live with them and wasn't she a sister of Clarence, and the milliner of Chadwick in the very store where Raymond Gale sells hardware and implements now?

Who built that house we do not know. It might have been Clarence Bassett himself. The present owner thinks it was.

In 1900 it underwent repairs. The proof of this is that tucked away behind the lath and plaster of one of the walls was a copy of the Decatur Republican of June 14, 1900. On the label was the name Clarence Bassett, the date, Sept. 22, 1898. And here it was June 14, 1900. The price was plainly printed, '$1 a year in advance.'

On the margin of the paper was stamped, "Subscription Expired." But everything was cheap and times were easy in those peaceful days and the subscriber who actually paid in advance was the exception.

The paper is well preserved and contains some items that might bring a smile to the features of old time residents. For instance:

Parshall Van Duzer and John Collins attended the congressional convention at Benton Harbor. (Guess which one.)

Mrs. F. C. Stapleton is attending the LOTM Great Hive meeting at Grand Rapids.

Fred H. Dewey is the KOTM delegate.

The Democratic state convention will be held in Detroit July 25 and the Fourth Congressional district is a unit for Tom Cavanaugh of Paw Paw for governor.

The commencement exercises will be held in the Presbyterian church Tuesday evening, June 19. The class of '00 is one of the best the school has graduated. It numbers 14 and they are Margaret McLeese, Earnest Whitlock, Ethel Stewart, Bessie Parker, Ralph Van Hise, Anna Orr, Maynard Thomas, Nellie Taylor, Ethel Bassett, Beatrice and Berenice Harris, Waldo Phillips, Edythe Sanborn, Albert Dwight, fourteen, and they all took part. The valedictorian was Albert Dwight and the superintendent Willis T. Bishop. Rev. George B. Rogers gave the invocation. All but 3 of that class of 45 years ago are now living..

The paper was brought to the office from which it was printed by Mrs. Pete (Ethel Mead) Wanko. They are improving the house again, adding a kitchen and bedroom, and that is how they came to find it. They bought the house of the estate of Mrs. Esther Taylor six years ago.

Bruce is the only living member of the Bassett family and we have had no word from him for several years. He learned the printing trade in the Republican office and was probably working here in 1900. Fay Beach was the foreman.

Clayton Howe Joins Republican Staff

The Republican is off again this week with a fresh start. The going has been hard since last March when the late Charles Danner was taken ill. Arthur Howe has been a loyal helper, putting in time and over time to do his part toward getting the paper out, and his wife, Maxine, has given needed assistance. We are grateful also to Clayton Kinney, who is a capable Intertype operator, for setting type after his working hours on the farm.

But now we foresee that our troubles, at least for the time being, are over. Clayton Howe came to the Republican staff as a permanent part of it with the beginning of this week. He possesses all of the requirements needed to keep the Decatur newspaper and its job department up to the highest notch of efficiency. He can make the Intertype run with the speed of an airplane; he can make it execute all sorts of stunts that show up well on paper; in fact he can make it do almost everything except to actually speak the words.

Clayton learned the trade in this office before the First World War. He went through that war and then took a course in the South Bend Business College. After that he worked on the South Bend Tribune and for the Oliver Plow Company. Twenty-one years ago he went to work as a Lintotype operator for Ihling Bros. Everard Co. of Kalamazoo, and comes from there back to the Republican where he began his trade.

His brothers Otis and Arthur both learned the trade here, and Arthur has been here 25 years. With Clayton it is coming back home, and his relatives as well as the office, are pleased with his decision.

The Decatur Theatre Where Edgar Bergen Gave His First Shows, Site of Present Cozy Theatre

EDGAR SHOWED IN MARCELLUS

Edgar Bergen turned naturally toward the LaPearl theatre, now the Cozy. Mrs. Gertrude Metzger was the original proprietor, owner and manager of the movie house in those days, and she named it the LaPearl, after her sister Pearl who died.

Edgar worked about the theatre, swept it out and did odd jobs assisting Mrs. Metzger. The latter recognized the undeveloped genius in the boy and encouraged and helped him as she could.

He put on some entertainments here and on at least one occasion she put on a show in another town with Edgar as the chief entertainer.

Postmaster Herbert Creagan recalls that one night she put on a show in Marcellus. That was back in about the year 1914. He played the snare drum in those days and was engaged to play with the orchestra. Mrs. Metzger took Edgar and Herbert over in her tin Lizzie and they put on a great show.

Sorry we are unable to contact Mrs. Metzger for a story of her recollections of our visitor.

Enclosed is clipping from the Decatur, Illinois, Daily Review. Thought it would be of interest to you and your paper. Please let me know of future plans of your Centennial committee, as I will be very happy to be present at this event.

Kindest regards,
Harry H. Stern.

The clipping,—

"Edgar Bergen is going back to his home town of Decatur, Mich., on Sept. 15 to participate in a celebration marking the one hundredth anniversary of the town. When Bergen was just becoming a nation celebrity there was much confusion whether his home town was Decatur, Ill., or Decatur, Mich., among the various movie writers.

"Decatur, Ill., city dads should remember to extend congratulations to our Michigan cousin next September."

Harry Stern is a nephew of the late Fred Stern and lived here in his youthful years. He has a large clothing business in partnership with Julius F. Myers in Clinton, a city of 6,331 inhabitants.

BERGEN OWNS AIRPORT

Edgar Bergen, amateur flier also known as an NBC comedian and partner of Charlie McCarthy, has just made his debut in the new role of airport owner. Bergen has purchased the field, located at Montebello, Cal., to establish an instrument flying school for worthy young pilots who lack the funds to finance their own training. Many such pilots trained by the Bergen Aviation Foundation are already flying for the commercial air lines and in military service.

DOEKO PRAK

A Brave Young Marine Gives His Life For His Country.

Doeko Prak was killed in action at Iwo Jima on the third of March. The news came in a telegram to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Harm Prak, on the 31st of March and was published in the Republican last week. The message said that further details would follow, but they have not yet been received.

Doeko was the oldest of seven children and was born in Decatur January 7, 1926. He attended the village school and enlisted in the marines, third division, in August, 1943.

He was determined to go into the war and did not want to wait to be drafted. He was only 17 at the time and his parents were loath to sign his permit, but he said if they did not, he would go to Mexico and join, so they signed.

He trained for the marine corps in San Diego, California, and was sent overseas into the South Pacific last June. He was in the fighting at Saipan and Guam, and wrote last August that he had taken 3 Jap rifles.

The last letter received from him was dated the 7th of February. Doeko was a strong healthy boy. He left home when he was 17 and weighed 185 pounds. He never had a furlough and never saw his home again. He told some of his friends when he went that he did not expect to come back until the war was over.

Besides his parents Doeko is survived by 3 brothers and 3 sisters, and his fiance, Miss Winnifred Lillie of Volinia.

Sojourner Truth was born a slave in New York State. After she was freed, she worked as a servant. Ttough she always lived from hand to mouth and never learned to read and write, she said God told her what to do. And nothing stopped her from doing it. One day when she was middle-aged God told her to drop everything and start walking eastward. So she did. That was when God told her to take the name Sojourner Truth. For the rest of her life, she wandered all over the country, usually on foot, talking and singing about abolition of slavery and about women's suffrage. "I heard a lot about giving black men the vote, but nobody thinks about votes for black women," she said. Sojourner had a commanding presence. She was six feet tall, wore dark, Quaker-like clothes, and spoke with humro and homely wisdom. She often visited Northern Indiana, where she was jailed several times by Hoosiers who didn't approve of abolitionists. But in Michigan she finally found a home in Battle Creek. One day she set out on foot for Washington, D.C., because God told her to go see President Lincoln. She did have a nice visit with Old Abe, but nobody took their picture. And she wasn't 108 when she died in 1883. Most likely she was about 86. Thousands of folks, both black and white, followed her coffin to the cemetery in Battle Creek. Sojourner's grandson, her last descendant in Battle Creek, died in 1915. You can see Sojourner's picture below.

FIRST DECATUR BOY TO BOMB TOKYO

Extracts from the letters of Sgt. Carl Southworth, 19 year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Maynard Southworth, who is located on one of the Marriana Islands, and has made the grade from private to sergeant in less than a year.

Sunday, February 18, 1945: No mail yet, but hope it will catch up by next week. Haven't done much here but fixing up our tent so it will be nice to live in, and doing a little work on our plane.

They say there are Japs on the island but they are being killed at the rate of 25 to 100 a week, so it should not be long before they are all gone.

While at Hickham Field I tried to look up Don (his cousin Don Southworth). I couldn't find him and was told he was back in the hills.

Wdnesday, Feb. 21.

Just finished supper and right now am hearing some good music. Am writing in front of my tent and it seems like sitting on the front porch in autumn with the smoke coming up from the brush piles.

Haven't heard from Myron, but maybe I should say Sam. That is what his pa-in-law calls him. I sure would like to be based near him when I am in the states.

I have been working on my guns all day because I want to make sure they work when I want to use them. It is getting dark out so think I will go in for a little while. I don't think the war will last much longer. You don't have to worry about me getting malaria because they don't have it on this island.

I will be sending some money one of these days. There is no place to spend it and nothing to buy here, so I should save quite a bit.

Don't worry about me and take care of yourselves.

Monday, February 26.

Well, I made a raid on Tokyo the other day. Have been working hard the past few days. Got a letter from Sam and he told how much Tommy had grown, and he was afraid he will be shipped out.

We have been getting good food and I feel fine, so don't worry about me. They gave us some rubber mattresses which we have to blow up, and they are not bad to lie on. Later we are going to move into huts made of plywood.

We sure are having good weather here. It won't be long till you are cutting asparagus, and sure wish I was there to help you. I still haven't got any papers, so you should tell Arba about my new address.

Saturday, March 3.

Am writing this morning to tell you that I have been made sergeant, and I still haven't got the Decatur papers. I wish you would send me some more socks and shorts. It is time for chow.

March 7.

You can believe anything about these islands that Ernie Pyle writes, because it is true and you can believe what you hear on the radio.

I have made 2 missions now. Everything has gone along fine and I am feeling good.

Yes, I was in on it, Pa. The only way I have got any Japs is from the bombs we drop, but there are plenty of them around us here in the woods.

It won't be long till I will be moving into one of the new huts they are building for us. I made a chair the other day, back and all, which I carry over to the show and it surely comes in handy.

It gets hot here in the middle of the day and it won't be long till I have a nice tan.

Wednesday, March 14.

I got your first letter in a week today, and it seems good to get a letter from home. I sure would like to get the Decatur papers.

I have 4 missions in now. Don't think it will be long before this thing is over and I will be able to come home. I am sending a picture of the crew standing in front of our plane and am sending you one.

We have a USO show tonight, the first one, so think I'll go.

Think I am the first boy from Decatur to bomb Tokyo.

Carl Southworth was one of the crew of 11 of the great B-29 Superfortress which made the incendiary raid on Tokyo Saturday, March 10, and left nothing but twisted tumbled and left nothing but twisted, tumbled, down rubble in its path.

The raid was given one of the big headlines of the Sunday Chicago Tribune of March 11, declaring that 15 square miles of Tokyo was laid waste in the raid.

Major General LeMay, in an interview, said, "I believe that all those under my command have by their participation in this single operation shortened the war.

According to the Tribune's story the first plane off was the first to return after a flight of more than 15 hours. It was piloted by Captain Earl Russell of Stamford, Texas, and Carl was one of the crew. The Captain was in the center of the picture which Carl sent home.

When these boys left Tokyo 2 or 3 square miles of the city were on fire. Carl was right gunner and assistant chief engineer of the B-29 on this daring mission.

Pvt. Bernard J. Dine Fatally Wounded in Battle of Iwo Jima

The tragedy of war again visited Decatur Thursday, April 5th, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Dine receiving a telegram from the War Department announcing the death of their son, Pvt. Bernard J. Dine who died of wounds received at Iwo Jima.

A telegram was also received by his wife, Margaret. Both messages came from Washington, D. C., and were received in Decatur at about 10:30 Thursday morning. The dates of his injury and death were not given but will probably be made known in the letter which will come later.

This is a copy of the message:—

"Deeply regret to inform you that your son Private Bernard J. Dine, US MR died of wounds received in action at Iwo Jima Volcano Islands in the performance of his duty and service of his country. Remains reported buried in grave No. 1296, row No. 26, plot No. 1, Fourth Marine Division cemetery at Iwo Jima. Please accept my heartfelt sympathy. Letter follows.

A. A. Vandergrift,
General USMC Com.
of the Marine Corps.

Pvt. Dine was born April 11, 1922 at Winona, Minnesota. He graduated from the Decatur high school in 1940 and the same fall married Margaret E. Wickett, popular daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Carl E. Wickett. Mrs. Dine and their two children, Sharon M., age 3 and Richard B., age 1, together with his parents, survive him.

"Bernie" Dine was inducted into the armed forces June 14, 1944, received his "boot training" at San Diego, California, additional training at Camp Pendleton, California. Went overseas with the Fourth Marine Division in November. He was a member of the Masonic Fraternity, serving, at the time of his induction, as Senior Deacon of Decatur Lodge No. 99, F. and A. M.

As one of Decatur's promising young men, quite obviously endowed with competence and strong character, his passing again emphasizes that the flower of young manhood is the unavoidable price demanded by war. His survivors have the profound sympathy of the community.

FROM ONE WE ONCE CALLED TEACHER

Nellie Kirtland Rich Betaque, once a Decatur school girl—she went to school to Upton,—then a Decatur teacher, then a farmer, now a resident of the city of South Bend, always an upright christian woman and loyal friend. God has given her the strength, endurance and patience to meet the responsibilities of life which have come upon her, and she has never wavered in meeting them.

Mrs. Betaque is well into the eighties and we think Mr. Betaque is as far into the nineties. Mrs. Betaque's letter and her good wishes mean much to us. We shall never forget those golden school days when at the important age of 13 we recited history to her in the Grammar room of the old Decatur school building. They burned wood in stoves then to keep the school rooms warm; and when light, other than that furnished by the sun, was needed it came from kerosene lamps. Still, for all of those great handicaps we got by, and have lived to see this age of wonderful inventions.

Mrs. Betaque's good letter follows:

January 12, 1945.

Dear Friend Arba:

Your reminder came yesterday that I must send in my $2.00. I am enclosing same and wishing you continued success. I enjoy the paper and marvel at your fine memory that helps you so ably to carry on. I am confused in trying to trace back who's who, and still you continue to straighten out the tangles. Well that's your "gift."

Now a word or so about Mr. Betaque. He has been confined to the bed for the past two years, and while he looks well has not been contented and wishes his time might come. We are hoping for the promised peace to come, but I fear we must change our perspective and unite with Jesus Christ's plan.

I may not live to see the great plan come, but know it will surely be fulfilled.

Love from all,
Nellie Betaque.

We hear often from Robert, Dean's son, who has been across for over 3 years.

The Goodspeed Home in Nicholsville

In some countries of Europe many families occupy the same farm home for several hundred years, the land passing from father to son, one generation following another. In this country we seldom find a farm remaining in the same family for any great length of time.

Ulysses S. Goodspeed was born on the farm where he now resides, seventy-six years ago. With the exception of a few months in the Dakotas he has spent all of those seventy-six years living in the same house in which he was born.

The Goodspeeds were among the early settlers in Volinia Township and own a large farm south of Nicholsville. In the early days the family owned a general store in the village. Nicholsville was a thriving town in those early days, but with the coming of the railroads both north and south of it the town lost its importance as a trading center. It is still a popular summer resort center because of the fine lakes nearby.

A few years ago the Goodspeeds remodeled their home making it semi-modern. The house is over one hundred years old and was built of the finest timber of that day. It is still sound and strong. At the time the house was erected there was built of brick an elaborate double fireplace serving two rooms, with a double compartment bake oven attached. This is an interesting sight for people of our day. It was, without doubt, the latest thing in baking equipment at that time.

A seafaring member of the family, who took part in whaling expeditions in the early days, left a large collection of coral formations, sea shells and many souvenirs from his deep sea fishing in different parts of the world. There is also a fine collection of Indian relics. These have all been handed down from one generation to another and are still in the home. The house also contains many interesting and valuable pieces of furniture, dishes, etc., some dating back well over one hundred years. Mr. Goodspeed is still enjoying good health and we wish him many more years in his spacious, comfortable home.

The Gard Family of Volinia Township

(Last week, in connection with an item about the 86th birthday of Mrs. Ida Gard Swan, the Republican printed a few facts about the early settlers of Volinia. Mrs. Swan found this story of a Gard reunion held 22 years ago. It was written by Mrs. M. B. Welcher, and will interest many readers of the Republican.)

Descendants of Jonathan Gard, pioneer of Volinia township, gathered at the farm of the late Newton Gard there Sunday for the annual reunion. The widow of Newton Gard, 92 years old, was the hostess.

Her daughter, Mrs. Orlie Fulton Everett and her family, who occupy the old homestead, received nearly a hundred relatives and friends who came from many points.

The descendants of the late Josephus Gard and their families attended. Attorney Clyde Ketchum of Kalamazoo, great great grandson of Josephus Gard, gave the principal address.

Mrs. M. B. Welcher, a granddaughter of the pioneer, gave a history of the Gard Prairie, which follows in part:

"My father, Jonathan Gard, Elijah Goble, Samuel Rich and George Tony were the first white men to set foot on the fertile soil of Volinia township. They came in the summer of 1828, but in the fall all returned to their homes in Indiana, my father at that time living in Butler county.

"The family consisted of father, mother and four sons, Milton, Finley, Newton and Franklin. Franklin being a babe a few months old. Being so well pleased with the country, they made preparations for locating permanently in Michigan, and the next spring they all came back, with the exception of George Tony. Tony's wife said she had enough living in a wilderness, and positively refused to come. Tony then gave father the 200 acres of prairie which he had staked off for himself, and it has ever since been known as Gard's Prairie.

Took Up Claim in 1828

"My father arrived at his claim the 30th of March, 1928, and lived there until his passing out in 1854. They made the journey to this new country with an ox team, cutting their roads as they came and requiring six weeks to make the journey. Their neighbors were mostly Indians and wolves, and the latter kept them company by howling nights.

First Volinia Weddings

"My father added to his 200 acres until at the time he passed away he owned 600 acres, which was divided into four farms, upon which my brothers lived until they passed away, with one exception. Finley Gard traded his Gard farm to Eli Green for one in Hamilton township, but later on Newton Gard bought that farm, and it still remains in the Gard family, so that a greater portion of Gard Prairie still remains in the hands of the Gard relatives, and we are celebrating today in the pleasant home of Nancy Gard, my brother's widow, who has been confined to her wheel chair for many years, but who is cherful, contented and uncomplaining for she has learned the art of growing old gracefully, and is now in her 93rd year. We sincerely hope she may be with us many years to come.

"The first wedding in Volinia township were David Curry and Alexander Fulton to Sarah and Elizabeth Gard, daughters of Josephus Gard. Both couples were married by the same ceremony in the spring of '32. The first white child born in the township was John Rich, October 21, 1829. At the time our people came to Volinia, there was a band of Pottowatomie Indians campe d on the Dowagiac Creek, just below the George Newton home. They were very friendly, bringing in wild honey and smoked venison, but expected something in return, such as wheat bread, and the like. It being such an effort to get flour I think mother preferred not to exchange food, and would rather prepare it herself.

"Such were pioneer days, where most of us would be considered tenderfeet when it come to roughing it."

MRS. CHRISTIE'S SCRAPBOOK

Mrs. David Christie kept a scrapbook in the days of long ago. It covers the period of the sixties, seventies and eighties when Mrs. Christie was an active resident of Decatur. We started to write "citizen" of Decatur, but women were not citizens then. Otherwise it was the golden period in American history.

Mrs. Christie passed away many years ago, but the scrapbook lives on. What a fine thing it was, and would be yet, to keep a diary and a scrapbook. But people worked harder and had more time for such things in the pioneer days.

Mrs. Christie's scrapbook contains many clippings from the Decatur paper as well as other papers and magazines and much local history. Her daughter Dora, Mrs. Anderson of Lawrence township, presented it to the editor several years ago, and it is a highly prized possession.

Old time residents may be interested in the stories taken from it, and comments upon them which will be additional contributions to local history, will be welcomed.

The Republican is interested in collecting as much local history as possible so that its files will be a storehouse of information for the future historian who undertakes to write the history of Decatur and southwestern Michigan.

The frontispiece of Mrs. Christie's scrapbook is a picture of the building of D. B. Fisk and Company, straw goods, fancy goods, millinery, of Chicago.

Then come pictures of Hon. James G. Blaine and General John A. Logan, who ran for president and vice president on the Republican ticket in 1884, and were defeated by Cleveland and Hendricks.

The big event locally over that election was the payment of the election bet of D. W. Brodhead and George McKay. Mr. Brodhead had the losing side and paid the bet. He wheeled George McKay in a wheelbarrow from the railroad park to the Sweet Brothers' skating rink. Mr. KcKay sat in the wheelbarrow with a large picture of President-elect Cleveland and a grin on his features which extended from ear to ear. He was flanked on either side by a dozen or more kids of whom the writer was one. These headed the procession and were followed by the band and a crowd of Democratic citizens.

The skating rink stood on the corner of Main and St. Mary's streets. It occupied the entire space of the building in which the Michigan Gas and Electric Company now has offices, and was by far the largest audience room in town.

It was packed with people,—jubilant Democrats, and sad Republicans, in celebration of the first victory the Democrats had won since the time of Buchanan before the Civil War. Several Democratic campaign orators were present to speak for the bright future predicted for America under a Democratic administration and when the procession passed through the crowded room to the platform pandemonium let loose. Little loyal Republicans like we were felt very lonely in that strange assemblage. It seemed like our country had suffered a great calamity, but curiosity was too great for us to stay away. It was a big crowd in Decatur and we just had to be in it.

Jim Chamberlain was one of those jubilant young Democrats, and if he doesn't add something more in the way of reminiscence of this great occasion we shall be disappointed.

The Republican has two other scrapbooks, one that was kept by the Mallory sisters and the other by Mrs. Hattie Roberts, and we are thinking of opening another column in the Republican, entitled, "The Scrapbook."

Leslie Galehouse brought the Republican a clipping from a newspaper showing a picture of Decatur in the stagecoach days. It was taken in the late sixties or early seventies.

Decatur was the terminal of the stage line operated between Decatur and South Haven by Major William Graves of Niles. The stages, drawn by four horses, passed through Bangor, Breedsville and Lawrence, and brought express packages and mail from the wilderness towns to Decatur, their shipping point on the Michigan Central Railroad.

The general stage office was in the Galloway House in Decatur, later the Duncombe Hotel.

fires which several times wiped out portions of the business district. On the front of one of the two story buildings is a wooden boot advertising the boot and shoe business of John Shaad who moved here from Three Rivers in 1865.

There is nothing in the clipping to show definitely what paper it was clipped from, but it was probably a Kalamazoo paper of about a half century ago.

It had been preserved by Millie Watson, an aunt of Mrs. Gallhouse. The Watsons were early residents of East Valley.

Next Monday, February 12, is the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, and a legal holiday in Michigan.

We would like to print a story about Lincoln every week, but lacking the time and space to do this we bring one out whenever possible.

This story of the Emancipator, is taken from Lincoln Lore, published by the Lincoln National Life Foundation, Dr. Louis A. Warren, editor. It is a story also of Sojourner Truth of whom the Republican has spoken occasionally in this column.

She was a colored evangelist, a wonderful woman. She once spoke in Decatur for the W. C. T. U., and we have printed the story of that outstanding event in our memory. Her home in later years was in Battle Creek.

It was on October 29, 1864, less than a week before the election, that Sojourner Truth visited President Lincoln, at Washington, and we have her account of the visit in a letter which she wrote a few days later on November 17th.

"It was about 8 o'clock a. m., when I called on the president. Upon entering his reception room we found about a dozen persons waiting, among them two colored women. I had quite a pleasant time waiting until he was disengaged, and enjoyed his conversation with others; he showed as much kindness and consideration to the colored persons as to the whites —if there was any difference, more. One case was that of a colored woman who was sick and likely to be turned out of her house on account of her inability to pay her rent. The president listened to her with much attention, and spoke to her with kindness and tenderness. He said he had given so much he could give no more, but told her where to go and get the money, and asked Mrs. C--n to assist her, which she did.

"The president was seated at his desk. Mrs. C. said to him, 'This is Sojourner Truth, who has come all the way from Michigan to see you. He then arose, gave me his hand, made a bow, and said, 'I am pleased to see you.'

"I said to him, Mr. President, when you first took your seat I feared you would be torn to pieces, for I likened you unto Daniel, who was thrown into the lion's den; and if the lions did not tear you into pieces, I knew that it would be God that had saved you; and I said if he spared me I would see you before the four years expired, and he has done so, and now I am here to see you for myself.

"He then congratulated me on my having been spared. Then I said, I appreciate you, for you are the best president who has ever taken the seat. He replied: 'I expect you have reference to my having emancipated the slaves in my proclamation. But,' said he, mentioning the names of several of his predecessors (and among them emphatically that of Washington), 'they were all just as good, and would have done just as I have done if the time had come. If the people over the river (pointing across the Potomac) had behaved themselves, I could not have done what I have; but they did not, which gave me the opportunity to do these things,' I then said, I thank God that you were the instrument selected by him and the people to do it. I told him that I had never heard of him before he was talked of for president. He smilingly replied, 'I had heard of you many times before that.'

"He then showed me the Bible presented to him by the colored people of Baltimore, of which you have no doubt seen a description. I have seen it for myself, and it is beautiful beyond description. After I had looked it over, I said to him, this is beautiful indeed; the colored people have given this to the head of the government, and that government once sanctioned laws that would not permit its people to learn enough to enable them to read this book. And for what? Let them answer who can.

"I must say, and I am proud to say, that I never was treated by any one with more kindness and cordiality than were shown to me by that great and good man, Abraham Lincoln, by the grace of God president of the United States for four years more. He took my little book, and with the same hand that signed the death-warrant of slavery, he wrote as follows:

"'For Aunty Sojourner Truth,
"'Oct. 29, 1864. A. Lincoln.'

"As I was taking my leave, he arose and took my hand, and said he would be pleased to have me call again. I felt that I was in the presence of a friend, and I now thank God from the bottom of my heart that I always have advocated his cause, and have done it openly and boldly. I shall feel still more in duty bound to do so in time to come. May God assist me."

A little mistake in connection with Decatur's growth must be corrected. The item stated that Decatur now has a population of 5,599. It should have read, 1,599. When those figures escaped the proofreader he must have been dreaming that the prediction of 5,000 in 5 years had already come true.

A few weeks ago something was written for this column about Hamilton Fair and a request made for a story of the fair. It did not bring the story, but Mrs. Carrie Hall brought a picture entitled "Governor Warner at the fair," in which we could recognize Governor Warner, Colon C. Lillie, E. A. Wildey, and Arthur Haydon. Governor Warner spoke at the fair that year. That was in the fall of 1905 and the picture was printed in the True Northerner of December 1, 1905. Mr. Wildey at that time was its editor and manager.

This clipping, taken from a Detroit paper, has been passed along till it has arrived at the Republican office with instructions to send it on to another word specialist. Before doing so, however, will pass it on to the readers of the Republican:

WORDS

By Frank Colby

Q. Several times you have remarked that "English is a completely unphonetic language." Are you rash enough as to suggest that English spelling does not represent sounds?

Answer:

"In English, sounds are seldom spelled,"
The foreigner exclaims.
"One never knows how he should say
The simplest words and names."

For instance, take -o-u-g-h,
An easy combination,
Until you try to say it, then
It's pure abomination.

Rough rhymes with cuff, bough rhymes with cow,
But through must rhyme with woo.
And cough is like the sound of doff,
It's loony, entre nous.

The sound of "oh" is heard in though.
My tortured ears I pick up
To hear that hough must rhyme with lock.
(Hup!) Pardon, please, the hiccough.

Now right, and rite, and write, and wright,
With anguish fill my dome.
But stranger still, to make me ill,
Are bomb, and tomb, and comb.

If do and to must rhyme with coo,
What rule applies to go?
If now and how resemble frau,
Why "oh" in know and flow?

I find that meat and mete and meet
My shattered wits dispel.
I'm off the track! Please lead me back
Into my padded cell.

Hillsdale is a beautiful little city. We have visited it twice, both times many years ago. The first was in company with L. G. Stewart when inspecting school buildings for information helpful in the erection of our own grade school building. At that time we called on Mrs. E. A. Blackman, daughter of Hiram Cole, a Decatur attorney of the sixties and seventies, widow of the founder of the Decatur Republican, and mother of Hiram Blackman, then editor of the Hillsdale Democrat.

At that time there were four newspapers in Hillsdale, all weeklies, the Democrat, Leader, Standard, and Collegian-Herald. Col. March was editor of the Leader. He was a gentleman of the old school which passed away with the army musket, the horse and buggy and the Washington hand press. He was tall and stately, his hair and long pointed beard were the ivory white which is mellowed by age, and he wore a Prince Albert coat and broad brimmed black hat common to an officer of the Civil War.

Col. March had a daughter, Mrs. Sutton, and a son-in-law whose first name we have forgotten, but will call him Billie. We met them on a press trip through Northern Michigan one summer in the first half of the first decade of the present century.

Sutton was a salesman and an all around good fellow. His hair was silvery white and it made him conspicuous in a crowd, for he was young. He pointed out a rock in the rapids of St. Marys river at the Soo where a few summers previous he had been in a canoe that capsized. He clung to the rock all night, and when rescued the next morning his hair had turned from a dark brown to pure white.

At another time in those early days we were one of a delegation of guests of the City of Hillsdale and visited the college with Gerrit J. Diekema of Holland.

A pleasant letter from LeRoy L. Dewey, minister of the First Methodist church of Hillsdale, recalls these early visits. In renewing his subscription to the Republican our former townsman writes:

"I enclose $2 for your invaluable paper, which I continue to read with great delight. We are greatly enjoying life in this cultured college town. It is a beautiful, friendly and busy little city, and our church work is going along with much encouragement. We are happy, and the people seem to be happy, so we ought to get along happily and well."

Hillsdale is not more than 80 or 90 miles from Decatur, but it is on another railroad, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, so its people have but little in common with the people of Van Buren county. The city was settled in about the year 1840, making it eight years older than Decatur. Baw Beese park, outside the city limits, is owned by the city and is a popular summer resort. Decatur's Tourist park might in time become a popular summer resort if the village does not sell it.

Hillsdale college adds greatly to the standing of Hillsdale as an attractive city. It was founded in 1844 by the Free-Will Baptist denomination. The college was first located in Spring Arbor, Jackson county, and named Michigan Central College. It was abandoned there for lack of support and re-established at Hillsdale.

The story of its founding is one of faithfulness to a cause, of perseverence under trials and hardships, and of refusal to accept discouragements.

The Free-Will Baptists had two pioneer evangelists in Elders Cook and Limbocker, and to them and a few other hardy homesteaders is due the credit of founding Hillsdale college.

Julia A. Woodman and Sarah V. Woodman of Paw Paw graduated from the college in 1852. We wish that Mrs. Cora Woodman Richmond of Tampa, Florida, were able to write a sketch of these two members of this splendid pioneer family of Van Buren county.

EARLY DAYS

By Bert D. Goens

It was the year of 1911, on March 7th, that this story was started. But it brings back a lot of happy thoughts and memories. I was 21 years old, full of venture and pep, and very anxious to make for myself a home that I might call my own.

So, being a farmer boy, one of a large family of six boys and five girls, I looked the situation over, counted my pennies, and was made to realize that it was going to take more than pennies to own one of the fine farms here in Michigan which I wanted so much. But thanks to good old America, full of opportunity, and to good people always standing ready to help young men, who really want to do things, I got my chance.

About this time Uncle Sam was offering homesteads to men willing to step out and take a little chance. He was offering homesteads of 320 acres each, out in Montana and other states. I had the privilege of looking at some of the fine exhibits of grain and other crops that had been raised on some of the lands and I began to wonder how I could own one of these fine farms. Out there they called them ranches.

I sat down one day and wrote Uncle Sam at Washington, D. C., a letter asking about the opportunities for homesteading out west. He was not long in answering and giving me the information I wanted.

I found out that it was 1590 miles to Havre, Montana, where there was some fine land available. Having never been away from home over 25 miles, that seemed like another country to me, but as I thought it over, I said to myself,—other men have done it and so can I.

Free Ride To Havre

After I had made up my mind to go, I met up with another fine gentleman who thought he too wanted to own some of that Montana prairie land. He informed me that he was going to the same place that I was going, and was going to take two car loads of stock, lumber and farm tools. He said to me, "Young man, you can ride out in one of the cars and help look after the stock on the road, and your fare will not cost you anything." That sounded good to me, as it was going to give me a big lift.

So the time came and we left Decatur on the 7th day of March, 1911. Seven days later, on the afternoon of the 14th, we landed in Havre, Montana, 1590 miles away.

The next day after we landed there the thermometer went down to about 22 below zero. One of our boys froze his feet and later died from the effects of it. That naturally made me feel pretty blue, but as the days went by, I overcame it quite well. Our first big job was to get all of our lumber and tools, and feed to last a couple of months, hauled out to the homestead we had been able to get. It was 25 miles out from the railroad, and that was quite a long way for old Dobbin. It took two days to make the round trip.

Building and Planting

There were no buildings of any kind out on our new farm, so first we must go about it to build a shack. We would drive out there and stay to a little inland tavern called Cottonwood, about 3½ miles from where our homestead was located. It took us about three days to build our shack. It was 12 feet by 14 feet long, and in this neat little shack I baked my first pancakes. Oh, boy, were they good! The shack was built, the first pancakes were made, and we were on our way.

The next big job was to build a barn for our stock, four horses and one cow. That took us about two weeks. Then we were ready to start turning over the prairie sod, a rich chocolate loam.

It required four good horses to pull a 14 inch plow in that sod and Uncle Sam required us to have 20 acres into crops on our homestead the second year and forty acres the third year.

The first season was fairly good. Crops yielded very good. Also the second year was good. Wheat went from 25 to 50 bushels per acre.

Building A Church

The first winter was very mild. But the second winter made up for it. The thermometer went to 42° below zero, and the snow was three feet deep on the fields. We managed to keep warm for we had plenty of coal. We mined our own coal from a government mine about 2½ miles from our homestead.

Well, we found some very fine people in Montana, always ready to help one another and they tried to make us feel at home.

I had one experience while in Montana that I have always been very proud of. The people of the community surrounding Cottonwood felt that they should have a church where they might attend service, which is a very fine thing for any community. So they called in a little minister who had a homestead in the neighborhood. He was not long in organizing to build a nice neat little Presbyterian church. They had an attendance of about 75 each Sunday. I had the opportunity to help build that church.

One thing I observed while there in the west, was that people were just people, as we are here. And they enjoyed about the same things as we do here. Some liked to go to church, others never went to church. Some liked to dance and have a good time. Others liked to hunt, and enjoy sports such as riding horse back, and playing ball. Cottonwood had a good stiff ball team that played once a week somewhere in the county.

Meets Decatur People

I must say I liked my homestead life in Montana, although it was lonesome at times.

While there we visited our old townsman, Mathew Cady, who had a homestead at Shelby, Montana. He was very glad to see us, and to prove it he said, "Boys, before you go away I want to send something back to Michigan for the people to look at." So, as we got ready to leave, he took us out to his garden. We noticed as he passed by the gate he picked up a grub hoe. We looked at him but did not dare to ask any questions. We soon saw what he was going to use it for. He said, "Do you see that vine? That's a yam vine," and started to feel around for a yam. He soon located one and began to dig with that grub hoe. In a jiffy he rolled out a big yam that weighed about 5 pounds. Then he looked up at us and said, "How is that, boys, for a yam?" Our eyes began to sparkle, for we knew that there were plenty of jack rabbits out there. Now we could have rabbit and yam. We also visited another old gentleman from Decatur by the name of Charlie Dennis. He had a fine homestead. It lay on a south slope, beautiful to look at. From that spot you could see one of the most beautiful sunsets of the west, as it went down behind the Great Rockies 180 miles away.

It was in this little town of Shelby that my friend and I got our first thrill. We put up at a little hotel for the night, and noticed as we passed by the barroom on our way to bed that the cowboys were getting a little happy.

Our room was just above the barroom. But as we were rather tired and sleepy, we thought we would take a chance. Everything went well until about 3:30 in the morning, when all at once they started shooting and yelling. They brought the hair standing up straight on my head. My friend whispered and said, "Boy, that doesn't sound very good." I don't remember just what I said, but I know what I thought.

Next morning when we went down to breakfast all was quiet, but we were glad to see that train when it came whistling in to the station. That place was just a little rough for our pleasure. Some of those cow boys celebrate a little loud at times.

Proving Up

The time came when I was to make proof for my homestead. It was customary to select two neighbors to go before a government land office man and testify for you, which I did. I chose two fine gentlemen and everything went well for a while, until we met another neighbor that was proving up also, and the boys just had to celebrate. I can never forget that day.

In about 30 days Uncle Sam presented me with a deed to 320 acres of virgin land, and I had to make another decision in my life. That was whether I wanted to make Montana with all the opportunities it could offer, my future home, or go back to dear old Michigan, that had about everything one's heart could wish for in the way of opportunities. Besides my good Mother and Father, five fine brothers and five fine sisters that were living back here. They helped me to make up my mind to sell my homestead and return to Michigan.

I soon had a fine cash offer and accepted it. I received a check that looked like a million dollars to me, and took the next fast train coming to Michigan. I have never been sorry that I made that decision, because I think good old Michigan is the greatest state of them all. It has more opportunities to offer to both great and small.

A Summer In Canada

I spent one very enjoyable summer haying up in Canada. It was up on the Cypress Hills, about sixty-five miles from the nearest railroad. We were making hay for a very fine young bachelor from the states who had a small ranch there. He had about 65 horses and 125 head of cattle, as fine as I ever saw.

There were only 90 days of summer up on the hills and it frosted eleven months out of each year. He kept about 500 tons of hay on hand all the year around. While we were there in the hills, fire broke out in the forest, so I had some experience fighting fire.

The worst thing in Canada is a forest fire. When it starts, every man far and near is drafted at once to fight it, and the government pays so much a day. We got 40 cents per hour.

Canada has some very fine laws. One law in particular I thought was outstanding—the horse thief law. If someone stole your horse or cow, all you had to do was notify the Mounted Police, give them your brand and description, and in just a few days they would be pretty sure to have the animals rounded up, without a penny cost to you.

Those fine riding Mounted Police seemed to pride themselves on bringing them in.

Michigan, My Michigan

I think if I get the western fever again it will be for California or some other warm climate. But it is a little hard to think about going very far away from our old home state. I expect I can be proud of one thing, that not many people have had the privilege of enjoying—that is our old homestead. Mother lives on the same farm that she was born on 75 years ago, and is enjoying good health there with my youngest brother, Howard Goens who owns the farm now and is a very prosperous young farmer. He is making a nice home for mother in her declining years. We as a family appreciate and are very proud of our brother for the many good things that he has done for Mother and Father, and is still doing for mother. So I don't think I will venture very far away from Michigan, and if I do it will not be for long. Michigan is the garden spot of the world.

Decatur's First Resident and Gold Mine

A few weeks ago the Republican had as callers Mr. and Mrs. B. B. Butler of Oak Park, Illinois. Mr. Butler is vice-president of Drinkwater, Inc., at 2323 South Michigan avenue, Chicago.

The call resulted in a most interesting visit on early Decatur days. Mr. Butler's grandfather was Charles S. Tucker, the first resident of Decatur. Some 30 or 40 years ago the Republican printed a history of the village which was prepared by Mrs. Annie Tuttle and read by her before the Every Tuesday Club. It is somewhere in the newspaper files, but the big question is where. If anyone can furnish it shall be glad to make a copy of it.

It is our remembrance that Tucker came here in 1847, before there was any evidence that a village would be established here. He built a small shack to live in somewhere near the present location of the depot and got out ties for the Michigan Central, then in course of building. The road was built through to Decatur in the fall of 1848, a depot was built here and the place named Decatur, after the township which was organized in 1837 and was named after Commodore Stephen Decatur.

Charles Tucker later took up land south of the village on the New Swamp road and built his home on it. He sold it to Charles A. and Sophia S. Moulton, grandparents of the editor of the Republican, in 1869, and it is now the farm home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Griffin.

I was born on this farm and spent much of my boyhood there. In those early days the "gold well" was the great place of mystery on the farm. As soon as brother Will and I were big enough to drive the cows to the pasture we discovered it. It was a boxed in well about five feet square and 8 or 10 feet deep, and was filled with brush and dirt and stumps. Our grandmother told us the story about it with all the wild speculations about the wealth of yellow metal supposed to be stored there for anyone who could find it.

Our excitement ran as high as did that of the original "miners." We worked all one summer cleaning out that old well, but one stump was too big for us to handle and we could get no help or encouragement from the big folks, so finally we gave up the search. It had been many years since we had thought of the gold well, and it is probable that today there is no way to identify the exact spot which 80 years ago was the talk of all Southwestern Michigan.

Extracts From Diary

Mr. Butler had found among the effects of his mother, Rosanna Tucker VanDecar, daughter of Charles Tucker, leaves from an old diary which he had copied and they are printed here:

Extracts from Diary written by sister of Rosanna Tucker Van Decar. The name of this sister is presumed to be Marietta Tucker.

The Tucker family at the time of this diary lived near Decatur, Michigan, in the southern edge of Van Buren County. Someone has written the year 1864 on the first of the pages comprising the diary — this we presume is correct although it was evidently inserted some years later.

The diary covers only a short period—March 17th, Thursday to May 11th, Wednesday. The days of the week given correspond to the dates in 1864 and this seems to be the correct year based on the people mentioned in the diary. The following are interesting quotations from the diary.

"March 17th, Thursday—Sister Rosanna and family are preparing to move in the house across the road from our house. Father has gone to town after some corn meal, returned at noon went back to town brought an old acquaintance, Dr. Bartholomew. He stayed until after supper. Cousin Dellie came here in the evening to stay."

"March 20, Sunday — Father has just returned from the office with the N. Y. Tribune. I am writing to cousin Willie. Also wrote a business letter for father."

"March 21, Monday — Father has taken some letters to the office. I crocheted in the evening, Sister Rosanna and I. It was a beautiful moonshining evening. Father went to town as usual in the evening. A two year old heifer died."

"March 23, Wednesday — Father went to church meeting in the evening to the Presbyterian Church. He returned at eight o'clock."

"March 24, Thursday—I am preparing to go to an exhibition. Cousin Dellie and I went to the exhibition accompanied by father. It was an evening well spent. It closed about twelve. Dellie and I were in bed about one o'clock to rest the remaining few hours we had to sleep. Father was not very well he having such a bad cold did not enjoy the exhibition as well."

"March 25, Friday—Mother is doing the baking. Father returned from the P. O. in the afternoon with a letter from cousin Lucy. Father went to town in the evening."

"March 27, Sunday—Some gentlemen from town came here to look at the digging, professed to be miners, they went with father, dug some gold they think. Well we had company all day. Nelson Van Decar cousin of mine and family were here. They stayed but a short time here then went to visit across the road. Eliza Stanton came here about noon. She was here a good share of the afternoon."

"April 5, Tuesday—Mr. Higgins and father went mining found what was said to be gold. There is quite an excitement in Decatur about it at present people think it can not prove a failure."

"April 6, Wednesday—Viola Brotherton came here in the afternoon. We had quite a visit."

"April 12, Tuesday — About noon some gentlemen from town came here to see some of the gold from the mine, Mr. Abbet and Mr. Cole."

"April 15, Friday—Some twenty-five men came from town to explore the gold mine. Mr. Bodsford came to dig and settle a box to the gold if possible. There is quite an excitement.

"April 16, Saturday — As many as fifty men were here from different places to prospect for gold, went away satisfied that there was gold to be obtained. But abandoned the place for the present. Mr. Crane from Paw Paw came here. General excitement prevails."

"April 17, Sunday—Some gentlemen from Paw Paw came here this morning. Mr. Wells for one he was all the man we know. I wrote to Sister Phebe."

"April 18, Monday — Charles Scott came here took supper at our house, he came to prospect for gold. Father and him went to town in the evening."

"April 19, Tuesday—Father was at the mine most of the day. Some gentlemen from Decatur and vicinity came to prospect again."

"April 21, Thursday — Mr. Higgins and another man came to prospect again."

"April 22, Friday — Charles Scott came here about noon together with some gentlemen from Mattawan they found a specimen of gold of considerable size. I received a letter from sister Philena."

"April 26, Tuesday — Father received a letter from Charles Scott answered it immediately."

"April 28, Thursday—Some gentlemen from Indiana came to prospect for gold."

"May 5, Thursday—Some gentlemen from Kalamazoo came to prospect for gold. Quite a number were here."

William Henry Tucker, Decatur attorney in the seventies and eighties, was a son of Charles Tucker, and the well remembered actor, Frank Tucker, was a son of William Henry. Another member of this family was Fred Tucker, who some forty years ago lived in Battle Creek and called a few times at the Republican office. Mr. Butler knew no Tucker relatives, and if anyone can add to this Decatur history shall be glad to hear from them.

Trying Times

Modern definition of an optimist: "A person who gets on an all-reservation train without a ticket and asks the conductor to cash his personal check!"

Decatur Graduate 50 Years Ago Adopted By S. Dakota

(Oliver W. Chamberlin of South Dakota has the same gift as his brother Jim Chamberlain of Texas for writing letters, and when on rare occasions he addresses one to the Republican the office feels highly favored and wishes he would do it oftener. Attention is called to the difference in spelling of the sir name. They spelled the name without the "a" in the final syllable when they gave it to Miss Ida Trowbridge at the time they entered the first primary here in Decatur. But when Jim got to training with those big hatted Texans he added the variation. They do things different in Texas.

Oliver and his wife set out early in life for South Dakota and the state has been good to them. He has noted the publicity given in the Republican to the favored states of Texas, Montana, California, Washington, Vermont and Michigan, and thinks South Dakota will rank with the best of them. He has therefore set out to put the Coyote state on our map of favorites. His letter following makes a good beginning and he has supported it by an illustrated book entitled "A Brief History of South Dakota," also by several folders and newspaper clippings. All of which we shall find to be interesting reading and will be commented upon as soon as the opportunity presents.

One impression we have of South Dakota is that it is the least known of any state in the Union. True, the Black Hills and the Bad Lands are familiar terms, but we have known but little about them, and so the brief history received is doubly welcomed. Another ignorant impression we have is that the Black Hills would be the last place to be considered for the world's capital. Oliver may educate us to think differently.)

Mobridge, S. D.,
November 22, 1945.

Arba Moulton
Dear Friend:

I am sending in a separate parcel a short history of South Dakota to wise you up a little on our "UNPRETENTIOUS" state, also a little descriptive literature. Note that South Dakota has a higher standard of living than any place on earth, or any state in the U. S. President Coolidge selected South Dakota to spend his summer vacation in preference to any other state in the union, he received invitations from every one. Note also that the Black Hills has more following as a place for the world's capital than any other location.

In the history, the poem entitled "Bad Lands" is not accurate. It is a "good poem," but there is no other place easier or cheaper to raise cattle than the Bad Lands. I send you an ad of the sale of some white faced cattle which will bring unbelievably high prices, that is to an easterner. As the earth has been in existence only 6,000 years, it is not accurate. These cattle were largely from the Bad Lands.

South Dakota will be some "jinks" in dams also. Note that a million acres is to be irrigated. The largest dam will make the Fort Peck dam look like a dwarf in comparison, unless Nellie Nelson gets to be president in time to veto the appropriation, which is for $1,500,000,000.

A cottonwood tree is close to our house. It is 12 feet in circumference three feet from the ground; its topmost branches will be 30 or 40 feet under water. The bridges at Mobridge, normally 100 feet above the Missouri, will be 34 feet under water. This place is about 100 or 125 miles from the dam. It will back water past Bismarck and will be used to irrigate 750,000 acres 200 miles from the dam. Fort Peck dam backs up water a measly 90 miles.

I am very thankful to Vedah and the editor for the information about the class of '95. As to myself will say we have been blessed with two boys, and 7 grandchildren to date. I am able to read without glasses and can walk ten or twelve miles without tiring, but I am not fooled by a flash in the pan, for

I am almost home. Even now I think
There is a sound of a muffled oar.
I see through the river's brink
A light on the other shore.

I want to tell you I only wait
The beckoning of my father's hand.
I'll enter the beautiful pearly gates
That ope on the better land.

The youngest of our class of 1895 has about 5 years to go before reaching the three score and ten, but that is only a short time at our ages.

We will be like the soldiers who were honored at Natchez, Miss. The closing of every verse was Under the sod and the dew,

Waiting the judgment day.

Will Broderick rendered that poem so beautifully.

The most prominent boys in that room when Cora Hinkley was teaching were Will Broderick, Hiram Curtis, Horace Lincoln, Bert Kurtz, Tom Mahoney, Frank Arnold, Oscar Runyan, Morris Hinkley and I am not sure about Lucius Hubbard. I also was a member, also Will Moulton, perhaps there were one or two more.

The girls as I remember were Emma Hamlin, Rose Dennis, Kate O'Leary, Bessie Van Hise, Mabel Culverhouse, Anna Pardonette, Sarah and Mertie Griffin, Nellie Van Camp, Florence Palmiter, Grace Campbell, and I think Edna Carney and Lena Stewart. Am not so sure but there were a few more, 57 years might dim the memory a little. These afterward were of the class of '95.

Fifty years, near a lifetime
Had the servant toiled and worked,
Fifty years the best he'd given
In the fight he'd never shirked.

Fifty years, not one wasted
For the master up above.
Now he is sweetly resting
In the Saviour's pardoning love.

Fifty years near a life time
With a faith as firm as steel.
Fifty years resting in God's sunshine.
Its reflected warmth we feel.

We are praying for you, brother,
And our prayers are gone above
That you also may be resting
In the Saviour's pardoning love.
—Jack Skelton.

We are electing to go through Seattle in a few days. If we knew Will's address we would look him up if possible.

O. W. Chamberlin.

A letter went out by return mail giving Oliver the address of Will Moulton which is 1916 2nd Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

Mackinac Island

By Gerald Dine.

(Gerald Dine, son of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Dine, has spent his second summer on Mackinac Island, where he learned the secret of living and enjoying life at the same time. He worked four months of the past summer for the Lake View Hotel. Something of interest was going on there most of the time and he was a good observer. He came home the first of October and has written for the Republican these notes about the island.

Gerald is about to leave for Miami Beach, Florida, where he has been assured a similar hotel job for the winter. There he will be in one of the greatest winter resorts in the United States.

While at Mackinac Island he met two former Decatur young ladies, both of whom are now residents of Detroit. One was a daughter of Mrs. William MacKellar, who with two girl friends, stopped at the Grand Hotel on a week's vacation. The other was Celia May Fuller, daughter of Floyd Fuller of the U. S. A. and Mrs. Floyd Fuller of Houghton Lake, who was there for a day on her wedding trip.)

An Historical Spot

This was a great summer on Mackinac Island, the land of no automobiles, no street cars, no trains, no flies, no mosquitoes, no hay fever, and no oppressive heat. It doesn't sound like much of a place, but it's really wonderful.

It is a historic island as well as a famous summer resort. It has been under three flags. Many important battles have been fought there. There are two forts on the island, Fort Mackinac and Fort Holmes. There is also a soldier's cemetery near the fort.

In the early days Mackinac Island was the main fur trading center for the Great Lakes. John Jacob Astor was the fur dealer. The big warehouse and the Astor House have been restored and are visited annually by thousands of sightseers.

Now, the island is strictly a historical and resort spot. Most of the island is a state owned park. It is all wooded land with roads and paths throughout the whole park. The island has a circumference of nine miles. The paths are for bicycling, bridle paths, carriage trips and also walking. That is one woods where you can walk as long as you care to and never fear of getting lost because you can get to water within fifteen minutes by walking in any direction.

There are about twenty hotels and rooming houses on the island, of which the Grand Hotel is the largest with four hundred rooms. It has a front porch which is two city blocks long. It's the longest porch and the largest summer hotel in the world. It also has a beautiful swimming pool. It has a water sprinkling system throughout the whole building for a fire preventive.

There are over a hundred so-called cottages, of from twenty to fifty rooms each, along the high bluffs on both ends of the town. These are owned by millionaires who spend their vacations away from the rush of the city.

The state keeps a nice summer home for our governor there also. They call Mackinac Island the summer capital of Michigan. His mansion was redecorated this spring by a crew of twenty inmates from the Jackson Prison. They worked on the building for several weeks and did a beautiful job.

There is little to offer in the line of amusements, except the clean fresh air which you enjoy through bicycling, boat riding, horseback riding, swimming and walking. There are two good golf courses, and several places to dance.

The religious organization known as the Oxford Movement which was founded in England some years ago have been holding their summer meetings on the island since the war. They have about a dozen of the hotels occupied. There were on the average of seven hundred on the island all summer long. They come from all parts of the world. The largest number come from Canada and England, but lots of Americans have joined also. They don't let any of the members smoke, drink or use any kind of make-up. They dress in very common clothes. The men never wear a suit coat that matches the trousers. They all seem to have such a happy and relaxed look on their faces. You can tell them two blocks away.

They keep coming and going all summer. Some days as high as two hundred might come or go. They are very independent. Everyone of them works. Some in the kitchen and others keeping the hotels clean.

During the last of May and early June two American Great Lakes Passenger boats, the U. S. "North American" and the U. S. "South American," brought high school seniors from all parts of the middle west to the island as part of their week's senior trip. They would stay for several hours exploring the historical forts and taking the huggy ride around the island. Many of the children from the cities were seeing their first horse and carriage.

In June we also have a lot of honeymoon couples. The island is beautiful this time of year. The big lilac trees are in blossom then. Some of these trees are as large as apple trees and the flowers are much larger than you ever see around here. Some of the lilac trees are a hundred and fifty years old. Those of you who have seen the travel-talkie "Lilac Time on Mackinac" will agree to that.

Governors Conference

The Governor's Conference was held at the Grand Hotel during the first week in July. Loads of cigarettes and scotch whiskey went to the Grand Hotel for that great occasion. The hotel grounds were closed to the public during their stay. Most of the governors met our governor, Mr. Kelly, in Detroit and they all came up together on the U. S. "Western States" ship. Lots of them brought their family and friends. The people were roped away from the dock so the governors could walk safely to the horse-drawn carriages which were lined up at the end of the dock to take the governors around the island. When they returned to the Grand Hotel after an hour and a half sightseeing tour of the island their baggage had all been carried to their rooms.

A modern telephone and telegraph system was set up at the hotel. The state politicians, state police, telegraph and telephone workers stayed at the smaller hotels. Admiral King and General Marshall flew in by seaplane for about a two hours visit during the conference. The governors have held their conference on the island three times during the last fifteen years so they must like the place.

Yacht Races

When the governors had cleared away, the Detroit Yacht Race was in progress, followed a week later by the Chicago race. There were about forty yachts in each race. Mackinac Island is the finishing line. The Detroit racers ran into a seventy mile an hour wind and only six of the yachts finished the race. But the Chicago race was a huge success. The wives and families of the yacht owners come up by train and have everything ready for their husbands when they arrive. The race lasts from two to four days depending on the wind. They are a free hearted, happy and jolly bunch. They spend a week or two at the island and then the whole family goes back in the yacht, some going straight home and others taking trips through the northern waters.

Then the summer vacationers come by the thousands. Some are just sightseers over for the day, but lots of them get rooms at the hotels and spend their whole vacation on the island. That was due to the gasoline shortage. As a rule they never stay longer than a day or so and spend the rest of their time driving through the beautiful woods of the Upper Peninsula. Lots of them did go to Canada for a day, tho. You could get delicious steak dinners there. They ranged from the millionaires to the very poor factory worker, who had never had a vacation before and spent his last dollar for the trip.

Some tried to show off while others were very conservative. Some would spend $18 to $25 per night for a room at the Grand Hotel and eat cheese and crackers in their room in order to save money. The Grand Hotel maids were always complaining about having to clean up a lot of cracker crumbs and corn flakes. Others would stay at the smaller hotels and get stickers and stationary from the Grand to give their friends the impression that they stayed at the Grand. Those people were only kidding themselves because lots of the small hotels had nicer rooms than the Grand.

Hay Fever Sufferers

From the middle of August until the season closes in September the island is filled with hay fever sufferers. Lots of them stay at home until they are right down in bed with the sickness. By the time they get to Mackinac Island their eyes and nose are dry. It is such a clean fresh air. Your appetite is better in that climate, too. For two days after the wind had been in the south for several days everybody began to sneeze and their eyes would look like they were crying. Such a pitiful sight. The pollen had been blown up from the south. Just as soon as the wind changed everyone felt O. K. again. That happened only once.

The State of Michigan used Mackinac Island for the DDT Fly Spray Experiment. It did wonderful work. Every fly was killed. We took down all the screen doors and windows. Usually the flies are awful bad, because of the large number of horses on the island. At times in previous years they have been so thick that they killed horses.

I would recommend Mackinac Island as the spot to spend a summer vacation or to go in case you have hay fever. You can spend a very enjoyable week there for $100 including your transportation up there and back. If you can't afford to go there on a vacation go there and work for the summer. You enjoy all the luxuries and the wages are good, too. Everybody is friendly and sociable there.

Seaman Trapp Goes Down with His Ship

Last week the Republican printed a letter from Lt. Commander J. A. Marks explaining how Seaman William Gillette of Lawrence lost his life with the sinking of the U.S.S. HULL.

This letter from the same officer gives an account of the death of Edward George Trapp, son of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Trapp of Hamilton township, a seaman on the same ship.

If we remember correctly there were 147 seamen on this ship when she sank, and the very remarkable thing about it was that of that small number drawn from all parts of the United States two were from homes in this community and both were subscribers to the Republican.

We note with pride the praise bestowed on this young sailor by the Lieutenant Commander, and call special attention to the paragraph of his letter in which he says, "Your son Edward was one of our leading seamen."

Edward George Trapp was born in Chicago March 15, 1918, and today, March 15, 1945, would have been his 27th birthday. He attended school in the city and came to Hamilton township with his parents when he was 14.

Here he helped his father on the farm and on December 10, 1939, was united in marriage with Marie Ranieri. He was employed by the Kawneer Company in Niles at the time he entered the service, May 26, 1943.

He had been overseas more than a year when word came from the government that he was reported missing. This report was followed by a telegram which stated that he had been lost December 18, 1944.

Edward is survived by his wife, Marie, his parents, 2 sisters, Mrs. Amanda Hulek of Chicago and Mrs. John Wolf of Decatur, and two brothers, Charles, Jr., of Chicago and Cpl. Arthur Trapp, U. S. M. C.

The letter from the Lieutenant Commander follows:

My dear Mr. and Mrs. Trapp,

As Commanding Officer of the U. S. S. HULL, I am writing to you concerning the loss of your son, Edward George Trapp, who was listed initially as missing at sea following the capsizing and sinking of the HULL. It is with greatest sorrow that I inform you that after careful investigation of all circumstances there can be no hope sustained that he survived the disaster.

On the day of the loss of the ship, the 18th of December 1944, she was operating on a war mission in a forward Pacific area in company with a large group of naval vessels, which included the unfortunate SPENCE and MONAGHAN, both destroyers. With little warning a violent typhoon struck the group of ships. The HULL was well secured for heavy weather and she was a very sturdy ship, but the destructive force of the storm was terrific. The ship withstood a terrible beating from the wind and seas as the mountainous waves smashed over her and the wind shrieked as it rose to over 110 knots, an almost unheard of velocity. I can assure you that every possible maneuver was tried to improve the ship's situation, but it was of no use; the storm had the ship in its grip. The men had plenty of time to get their life jackets on and be ready for the emergency, as the order was issued to put them on about twenty minutes before the ship went down. Shortly after noon the storm reached its height and the wind laid the ship slowly over on its side until the seas came flowing into the pilot house and down the smoke stacks. She sank slowly, thereby giving the crew ample opportunity to get clear of the ship. After she sank, the seas pounded us unmercifully, throwing us about like peas in a pot of boiling water. That anyone came through that punishment is a miracle to me, for I fully expected that I would be drowned after twenty minutes in that sea in spite of the protection of my life jacket. After entering the water it was quite impossible to see more than a few feet because the air was full of foam and spray, and we were thrown about most violently.

For several days after our sinking both surface vessels and aircraft searched all possible areas very carefully for survivors. There was no land at all within several hundred miles, so that it is quite impossible that anyone could have survived unless he was picked up by ship or aircraft.

Your son, Edward, was one of our leading seamen and as such, was entrusted with responsibilities which required a considerable amount of integrity and perseverance to see that they were properly executed. I am proud to say that he carried out these duties with skill and dispatch and his officers knew that he could be counted upon in any emergency. Had he survived, he would have been rated coxswain the first of the year. His shipmates looked to him for guidance and leadership, as he had the ability to impart his vast knowledge of seamanship in a way that all could understand. We want you to know that all of us who survived feel his passing deeply.

You must realize some consolation in the knowledge that your son lost his life in the service of his country, fighting a war against enemies who attacked us most brutally without warning. We who were fortunate to come through the disaster are determined to continue fighting until victory is attained in order that those who have died may not have been lost in vain. I extend my most sincere sympathy to you in your sorrow and want you to know that I shall be glad to be of any further assistance possible. Further inquiries will reach me if addressed to me in care of the Bureau of Naval Personnel, Room 4625, Navy Department, Washington (25), D. C.

Very sincerely,
J. A. MARKS,
Lt. Comdr., U. S. N.

Ancestors of Cass Co. Family in Desperate Fight with Indians

The Republican is indebted to Attorney Carl Benton of Paw Paw for this graphic account of a fight to the death between a party of white pioneers and another party of Wyandot Indians. Ancestors of the Poes, who survived the fight, settled in Newberg township, Cass county, and their settlement known as Poes' Corners, is familiar to most residents of this section of Michigan. It is less than 20 miles from Decatur.

Mr. Benton said he copied the story from an old history and does not claim credit for writing it, but he has dug up something that will be highly interesting to lovers of local history.

In 1835 George Poe settled on Section 22 of Newberg Township, Cass County, Michigan. Other members of the family came in and made settlements in the same locality, thus forming the nucleus of the settlement which is today known as Poe's Corners, being seven miles South of Marcellus and where there is a church, schoolhouse and town hall. The Poes are descendants of Adam and Andrew Poe the famous Indian fighters of early days and one of their most famous exploits is described in the following story:

THE POES

In the summer of 1782, a party of seven Wyandots made an incursion into a settlement some distance below Fort Pitt, and several miles from the Ohio river. Here finding an old man alone in a cabin, they killed him, packed up what plunder they could find, and commenced their retreat. Amongst their party was a celebrated Wyandot chief, who, in addition to his fame as a warrior and counsellor, was, as to his size and strength, a real giant.

The news of the visit of the Indians soon spread through the neighborhood, and a party of eight good riflemen was collected in a few hours for the purpose of pursuing the Indians. In this party were two brothers of the names of Adam and Andrew Poe. They were both famous for courage, size and activity. This little party commenced the pursuit of the Indians with a determination, if possible, not to suffer them to escape as they usually did on such occasions, by making a speedy flight to the river, crossing it, and then dividing into small parties, to meet at a distant point in a given time.

The pursuit was continued the greater part of the night after the Indians had done the mischief. In the morning the party found themselves on the trail of the Indians, which led to the river. When they arrived within a little distance of the river, Adam Poe, fearing an ambuscade, left the party, who followed directly on the trail, to creep along the brink of the river bank, under cover of the weeds and bushes, to fall on the rear of the Indians, should he find them in ambuscade. He had not gone far before he saw the Indian rafts at the water's edge. Not seeing any Indians, he stepped softly down the bank, with his rifle cocked.

Adam and the Chief

When about half way down, he discovered the large Wyandot chief and a small Indian, within a few steps of him. They were standing with their guns cocked, and looking in the direction of our party, who by this time had gone some distance lower down the bottom. Poe took aim at the large chief, but his rifle missed fire. The Indians hearing the snap of the gun-lock, instantly turned round and discovered Poe, who being too near them to retreat, dropped his gun, and sprang from the bank upon them, seizing the large Indian by the clothes on his breast and at the same time embracing the neck of the small one. he threw them both down on the ground, himself being uppermost.

The small Indian soon extricated himself, ran to the raft, got his tomahawk, and attempted to dispatch Poe, the large Indian holding fast in his arms with all his might, the better to enable his fellow to effect his purpose. Poe, however, so well watched the motions of his assailiant, that, when in the act of aiming his blow at his head, by a vigorous and well-directed kick with one of his feet, he staggered the savage, and knocked the tomahawk out of his hand. This failure on the part of the small Indian was reproved by an exclamation of contempt from the large one.

In a moment the Indian caught up his tomahawk again, approached more cautiously, brandishing his tomahawk, and making a number of feigned blows in defiance and derision. Poe, however, still on his guard, averted the real blow from his head, by throwing up his arm and receiving it on his wrist, in which he was severely wounded; but not so as to lose entirely the use of his hand. In this perilous moment, Poe, by a violent effort, broke loose from the Indian, snatched up one of the Indians' guns and shot the small Indian through the breast, as he ran up a third time to tomahawk him.

Fight in the River

The large Indian was now on his feet and grasping Poe by a shoulder and leg, threw him down on the bank. Poe instantly disengaged himself, and got on his feet. The Indian then seized him again, and a new struggle ensued, which, owing to the slippery state of the bank, ended in the fall of both combatants into the water. In this situation, it was the object of each to drown the other. Their efforts to effect their purpose were continued for some time with alternate success, sometimes one being under the water and sometimes the other.

Poe at length seized the tuft of hair on the scalp of the Indian, with which he held his head under water, until he supposed him drowned. Relaxing his hold too soon, Poe instantly found his gigantic antagonist on his feet again, and ready for another combat. In the struggle they were carried into deep water. In this situation they were compelled to loose their hold on each other, and swim for mutual safety. Both sought the shore, to seize a gun and end the contest with bullets. The Indian being the best swimmer, reached the land first. Poe immediately turned back into the water to escape, if possible, being shot, by diving. Fortunately, the Indian caught up the rifle with which Poe had killed the other warrior.

At this juncture, Andrew Poe, missing his brother from the party, and supposing from the report of the gun shot he heard, that he was either killed or engaged in conflict with the Indians, hastened to the spot. On seeing him, Adam called out to him to "kill the big Indian on shore." But Andrew's gun, like that of the Indian, was empty. The contest was now between the white and the Indian, who should load and fire first. Very fortunately for Poe, the Indian in loading drew the ramrod from the thimbles of the stock of the gun with so much violence that it slipped out of his hand, and fell a little distance from him. He quickly caught it up and rammed down his bullet, but Poe shot the Indian as he was raising his gun to take aim at him.

Adam Shot by Friend

As soon as Andrew had shot the Indian he jumped into the river to assist his wounded brother to shore; but Adam, thinking more of the honor of carrying the scalp of the big Indian home as a trophy of victory than of his own safety, urged Andrew to go back and prevent the struggling savage from rolling himself into the river and escaping. Andrew's solicitude for the life of his brother prevented him from complying with this request. In the meantime, the Indian, jealous of the honor of his scalp even in the agonies of death, succeeded in reaching the river and getting into the current so that his body was never obtained.

An unfortunate occurrence took place during this conflict. Just as Andrew arrived at the top of the bank for the relief of his brother, one of the party who had followed close behind him, seeing Adam in the river, and, mistaking him for a wounded Indian, shot him in the shoulder. He, however, recovered from his wounds. During the contest between Adam Poe and the Indian, the party had overtaken the remaining six of them.

A desperate conflict ensued, in which five of the Indians were killed. Our loss was three men killed, and Adam Poe severely wounded. Thus ended the Spartan conflict, with the loss of three valiant men of our party, as against that of the whole Indian party excepting one warrior. Never on any occasion was there a greater display of desperate bravery, and seldom did a conflict take place, which, in the issue, proved fatal to so great a proportion of those engaged in it.

The fatal result of this little campaign, on the side of the Indians, occasioned a universal mourning among the Wyandots. The big Indian and his four brothers, all of whom were killed at the same place, were among the most distinguished chiefs and warriors of their nation.

The big Indian was magnanimous as well as brave. He, more than any other individual, contributed, by his example and influence, to the good character of the Wyandots for lenity towards their prisoners. He would not suffer them to be killed or ill-treated. This mercy to captives was an honorable distinction in the character of the Wyandots, and was well-understood by our first settlers, who, in case of captivity, thought it a fortunate circumstance to fall into their hands.

Recollections of Boyhood Days In Decatur

Being Another of Those Interesting Letters from Jim Chamberlain.

Fort Worth 3, Texas
February 18, 1945.

Dear Arba:

I desire to express my heartfelt thanks for your very kind letter so graciously expressing your sympathy and kind wishes concerning my wife's unfortunate accident.

I should have answered your letter sooner but I thought that ere now I would receive a letter from our son outlining his plans for coming home, and also that my wife would be out of the hospital and I would have something definite about which to write of our immediate future plans, but third degree burns are slow healing so while she has had the best of care and has steadily improved it will be a few days before she will be home and I haven't heard from our son lately.

I have not been able to get the Pinkerton book you wrote about. There are several Pinkerton books listed in the public library, one of which I have read, but the author is Rowan.

Back in the old days I received many a nickel and a dime from Charlie Friedman and Sig Desenberg for reciting my only poetic opus (what would you call it?) which had no literary merit so was in a class by itself. It was surely gauged by the same standard as the acting of the Cherry Sisters in their short lived career.

The Decatur team wants the amateur bunting:
And will get it though they may go lame,
For they're a bunch with a resolute will,
To get there just the same.

They don't need to hire an army of curvers,
With sinewy arms to go lame,
For they have Thomas with a team,
That will get there just the same,

If Carney should fall off in batting,
Or Thomas' arm go lame—
They still would have a team
That would get there just the same.

If Stapleton should slump in his catching,
And Taylor's fielding be only a name,
They yet would have a team
That would get there just the same.

If Haydon couldn't play second,
And Hughes' hitting got very tame,
They still would have a team

That would get there just the same.

If Chadwick's eyes should get crossed catching flies,
Or flirting with some ancient dame;
They yet would have a team
That would get there just the same.

If Rawson should pull and Achilles
tendon,
And O'Leary and Kruse should quit
the game;
They still would have a team
That would get there just the same.

All the readers of this monstrosity must remember the above doggerel is an apod, having no feet and so cannot be scanned, so lovers of poetry, kindly consider that the sole object of my foisting such a (what do you call it?) upon you readers is to revive pleasant memories in the minds of the "Old Timers." While it is not an exact reproduction of the original yet it is as nearly so as I can remember.

I feel grateful for the kindly expressions of some of the readers concerning the help I may have rendered them in their school work. I surely do love bouquets.

You wrote some time ago about Rolla Dillon and in a later issue Mrs. Carrie Dobson Dwight mentioned Algebra and these remind me of the following story. One day when Prof. Pierce and Rolla were walking together on their way to school, they met a man who was leading a spirited steed that was giving a very vigorous exhibition of his prowess. Prof. Pierce asked Rolla what he would suggest to take some of the spirit out of him. Rolla instantly replied, "Put an Algebra in front of him."

The Campaign of '84

Yes, Arba, I was at the skating rink at the time you mentioned and needless to say I enjoyed the procedings. There are at least two incidents of that campaign that perhaps you are not familiar with, but seemed very important to me. The Decatur postmaster, John L. Harrison, took me to Dowagiac to hear James G. Blaine who spoke in the city park. As there was a large crowd in the park, and as we could not get near the speaker's stand, and I being not yet in my teens, Mr. Harrison held me up in his arms so that I could not only hear but see the Republican candidate for President.

I shall ever cherish the pleasant memories of the many favors given me by the genial and able postmaster.

In passing I might add that I regard Blaine and Tilden as the ablest statesmen of their time, though neither was seated as President. I say seated, because from what I have read of the elections of 1876 and 1884, I believe with a fair count both of these statesmen would have served as Presidents.

With your indulgence I would like some time in the future to go into the details of those two campaigns.

Of course I know you consider Lincoln as the greatest American and you must know that I consider Thomas Jefferson as the greatest American of all time. Perhaps some time in the future, we may be able to present our reasons for our selections.

Another incident of the campaign of 1884 that might be of interest to some of your readers who recall the torchlight processions and parades usually headed by a brass band of that period: in a Democratic greenback parade of that campaign was a cart drawn by an ox owned by James Canning, a Republican, but borrowed for the day by Frank O'Rourke, a Democrat ostensibly to work, but really to pull the cart in the parade.

I believe Ed. Myers rode the ox. Standing on the cart's platform was my father representing Blaine and holding in his hand a satchel labeled "Mulligan Letters," when somebody among the bystanders, so frightened the ox that he shied violently, and father, having no means of steadying himself was thrown to the ground, but was not injured. Of course this incident produced great merriment among the Republican spectators, Mrs. Canning being especially pleased.

On my daily visit to the hospital St. Valentine's Day I noticed several peach trees in full bloom. I may have seen more blooms on peach trees in Michigan, but I surely never saw more robins in our yard than I did on the 14th of February this year in Fort Worth. They seemed to be having a convention and to be discussing some momentous question, perhaps how and where to build their nests, perhaps relating to past experiences or future plans. However they seemed all to be in a merry mood so I don't believe they were complaining about a cigaret shortage, about traveling priorities or housing problems or post war reconversions. The robins are numerous here at two seasons of the year, about this time, and again in late fall.

Gardening is in full blast.

Another effusion will follow shortly.

Your friend, Jim.

The Civil War Diary of Captain Charles B. Haydon

Of Company E, Second Michigan Infantry.

Eighty-fourth Installment

January 15, 1862

A most lonesome unpleasant day. The snow is about 2 inches deep and it has been raining and snowing all day. There is a hard crust and everything is covered with ice.

This will be a used up country when the war is over. The negroes all say they are going to leave before the army goes. They generallly behave pretty well but they know a great deal too much. This war is the certain destruction of slavery. If they are not liberated they will behave so bad that they will have to kill them all.

January 16, 1862

Pay day. I put $212.50 in my pocket for the last 2 months service. It was all in treasury notes. They are bright, fresh, have very good pictures of Abe. Lincoln on them and pass pretty well. One cannot help thinking some times of the paper currency of our revolution and the Assignats of the French Revolution.

I sent $80.00 home. I am going to try to have a little money on hand if possible when I come out of the war. There is no knowing how, when or where that will be, but so long as one has a little spare change, he can get along almost anywhere.

Corpl. Mack will get sent to the ranks I think. If I had commanded the Company he would have gone long ago. His faults have been far more serious than those of Ball or Coleman.

I was truly sorry for those two. They had not the slightest idea of such a thing till the order was read on dress parade. They went back to their tents and commenced ripping off their stripes and chevrons while the big tears were rolling down their cheeks. They did not say a word but I know it cut them severely. They came out next morning in the list of privates and in privates uniform. If they behave well I shall do all I can to have them restored after a while.

We start in the morning for a 3 days tour on picket. The snow, water and mud are full ankle deep. The whole regiment goes.

I am not very well. I have not been free from a headache since the champagne I drank on New Years. It will be a long time ere you get so much of the cursed stuff down me again.

There is a good deal of noise and drunkenness in camp tonight. Col Poe says he don't see why my commission as first lieutenant doesn't come. I don't either. I should have got $4 more pay today if I had it. I do not like this always acting as something which you are not. I always acted 2nd Sergt. while I was 3rd. I have acted first Lieutenant ever since I was promoted 2nd.

January 18, 1862

Yesterday we were off for picketing at 8 a. m. The ground was frozen hard and the walking was very good. The regiment reached headquarters about 10 a. m. and by 11 a. m. our Company was posted next on the left of the Telegraph Road.

The shantles are comfortable and the Captain and I have a comfortable log house for ourselves and reserve. By the time we were posted the roads began to be very soft and before night the mud was ankle deep. I made the rounds at nine but the mud was so deep I went no more during the night. The men should regularly be called up every morning an hour before daylight. We have however our own men and non-commissioned officers and know that they need very little watching.

The night was as quiet as anything could be. Weather warm and foggy with some rain. This morning there is considerable rain. About noon, raining hard. Came an order to advance the pickets 2 miles. We set out and marched a mile toward Accotink when we were ordered to halt. We remained there in the woods about 3 hours after which we marched back and picketed along the Accotink road back to the general quarters at Potter's.

The pickets now run from the river to Accotink village, thence diagonally along to Accotink road to the Telegraph road near Potter's, and from the Telegraph road a little below Potter's in a circular line around to the Orange and Alex R. R. which is, I believe, the extent of our Division's line. Thence the line runs around to the Potomac at a point about 10 miles above the Chain Bridge.

It requires about 4 regiments to fill the line. From Accotink to the river the line is now 2 miles advanced from the point where we found them. The headache troubled me a little yesterday but it is all gone now. It was the result of too little exercise and too much eating as diseases usually are.

I think it a great piece of good fortune to Benson that he enlisted as he did. A more favorable opportunity could not have been found for lifting himself above the associations and companions with whom he was surrounded. He has improved and has so well succeeded that I think he will never return to them.

January 19, 1862

Pickets being posted and all arranged, Captain and I took quarters at our old house again. It was quite late in the afternoon when the men were posted but they fell to work with a will to build shantles. There was a fence opposite a part of them and they very soon had comfortable places.

Some others found a deserted house and by taking the doors and all the boards they could tear loose, soon made themselves good shelters.

There was an attack apprehended, owing to our advance and the men were on the alert. I started on the rounds at 10 p. m. When I was near the further end of our Company's pickets I heard a gun farther down the road. I gave the men their instructions in case of attack to deploy a little to each side of their posts, lie down on the ground, behind trees if possible, and wait till they came near enough so that they could be sure of them and not back from their posts till they were forced to it.

I then went along Company H's line toward where the gun was fired. As I came near their fourth post, whang! went another gun about 10 rods ahead of me. I snatched my pistol, stepped behind a pine tree of which there were a plenty nearby, and waited to see what would be the result.

After about 2 minutes, not seeing or hearing anything more, I went up to the post. It seemed they had heard something and thought they saw a man lurking among the pine trees, and fired. They were excited, and as I supposed, fired hastily. They had a sergeant with them who is reputed a cool, discreet man but on this occasion he did not do the best.

When he had notice of the noise, he should have silently got his men out into safe positions where they could see without being seen and then have crept cautiously toward the spot either alone or with one man. In this way if there was any one there he would have been pretty sure of a good shot at them, and if not he would have saved a false alarm, the occurrence of which is always more or less injurious to the reputation of all connected with it as well as to the safety of the line.

It has been raining now for several hours. There was no further disturbance during the night.

Eighty-sixth Installment

January 25, 1862

It is an ill wind that blows no where. Now that we have finally settled down on the facts that we can't go into the Artillery and that we are on bad terms with Gen. R., Heintzelman has taken a wonderful fancy for us. He and Col. Poe agree remarkably. Gen. H. tells him to take no further notice of Gen. R. on his staff but to draw all our stores and supplies direct from headquarters.

This chance of showing our independence is not lost. Gen. R. has been down twice lately looking through our camp, as he used to, but I could not see that he spoke to any one or that anyone took any notice of him. I could never have believed that regimental pride ran so high with us as it does if I had not seen it. The likes and dislikes, more especially the latter, of soldiers are very strong.

I don't believe there is a private in the regiment who would not go ½ mile out of his way to get rid of saluting Gen. R. A month ago there was hardly one who would not have laid down his life for him. Our men would today rather shoot or bayonet one of the 5th Michigan than a Secesh.

The other regiments of the brigade have all new Austrian rifles. They sent up Minie muskets for us but they were not new. The men would not touch them till they were assured by Col. P. that they were better guns (which is indeed true) than the Austrian rifles. They are an excellent gun. They carry flush up 40 rods with level sights and have a raise sight which brings the ball with a good degree of accuracy up to 165 rods.

January 26, 1862

A lovely morning. Company inspection by myself. All in good order. Company looks well. Guard mounting was well done this morning for the first time in a good while. The ground is so bad that we never can have a good guard here.

The Quartermaster's wife came out to see guard mounting. She took post on the hill back of our quarters. I thought the men would go crazy at the sight of her ankles. She is a very pretty lady and has indeed as pretty a pair of ankles as I ever looked upon. They are a great deal too nice to exhibit in that way to the aggravation of soldiers. I swore when I saw them that if I ever got out of the war I would seize on the first pair I came to if they were half as enticing as hers. I don't know whether she knew what a sensation she created. She would be pleasd to know it though she would pout over it in company.

This is a joyful life-like spring day, full of hope, energy and aspirations.

One feels full of confidence, courage and enterprise on such days. Everything is exhilerating strength-giving, no blues, no sad thoughts of the past nor forebodings of future ills. No thought of troubles, difficulties, hopes or misfortunes. All low, mean thoughts are laid aside. The soul wild with enthusiasm, grasps at nothing, sees nothing save unalloyed pleasure and perfect success in life. Amid the sweetest of surroundings every thing moves with a flood tide toward victory.

This soldiering at time is the gayest life in the world—what a pity so many fine fellows must needs be killed by means of it. Or as North used to say get their "toes turned up."

We have now a most excellent company of men. I have worked long to make them what they are and am doing something every day to improve them.

There is the best lot of non-commissioned officers in the regiment, two of them all fitted for commission. Yet I would not be surprised if before another year is past I should see half of them with legs or arms off or without heads or with bodies in two pieces or torn or mutilated even worse than that. Then my good soldiers will hear no more reveilles, the perfect Sergeants will go to commissions, my handy work is lost and mourning is in many a home.

The hands which were strong in their country's cause are motionless. Their pale calm features turned to heavenward, the blue jacket faultless in its neatness is drabbled with life blood—the heart but full of gay hopes, love, hate and the wild, patriotis zeal of the battlefield has ceased to beat, and the faithful soldier (there is not a truer man on earth) has joined his many millions of comrades who have gone before him. God grant their many toils and hardships may find some kind reward and at last not only for them but for those who have given their all to a sacred cause.

Eighty-seventh Installment.

January 27, 1862

A long skirmish and bayonet drill.

January 29, 1862

The 37th are on picket. They had two men killed and four wounded this morning. They stood to it well, brought off two prisoners and it is reported killed and wounded several of the enemy. The weather has been fine today. We had a most glorious skirmish drill. The men are enthusiastic, and very eager for anything new in the line of drill.

We fired at a mark yesterday p. m. with good success. We shall drill actively every hour when the weather will permit until the time comes for moving. I have been drilling the non-commissioned officers on bayonet exercise today and Benson tonight. I fear the weather will be bad tomorrow.

There was a great deal of heavy firing down the river last night. This for some reason is almost invariably followed by rain within 24 hours. I have noticed it in many cases and have never known it to fail. Whether it be caused by the great concussion of the air or by some quality of the gas engendered by burning large quantities of powder, I cannot say.

It seems for the last few days as if I never wanted a better business than soldiering. One gets such eagerness and enthusiasm after a while as makes him half wiid. A good officer on the battlefield will take no more notice of the bullets than a man all absorbed in a game will of the idle talk of others whom he does not even hear. He is as eager and watchful of every move and chance as an ardent chess or checker player. He sees nothing and thinks of nothing but the best movements for the men before him.

I think a private soldier often needs a higher degree of courage to sustain him than an officer. He may have nothing to do but stand waiting while his officer's mind is so busily employed as to shut out every thought of danger.

The ladies are very kind to soldiers while they are present and some of them when they are absent. There seems however to be a pretty general disposition to "go back on" these 3 years soldiers. More than half our Company were engaged to be married when they left home. There are not more than 3 or 4 whose ladies have not already (to use one of Prentice's expressions) "soured on them." They, for the most part, take it with soldier-like fortitude. It goes very hard with some of them for a few days, but they soon, to all appearances, swear it off.

There are some reasons for all this. The soldiers are very free and easy with everything that comes in their way. It is a very discouraging thought to them no doubt. It is perhaps as well that they should look elsewhere. Many of them will never return and many more will forget them. It is as well that both should go where they please and seek their mates with freedom.

We, that is Capt. and I, have a boy 13 years old for waiter. He came from Detroit with the 5th. He had been employed there in the theatre for 3 years. He is a smart boy, but about the hardest case in some respects that I ever saw. He will not steal (i. e. from us) nor get drunk, but he will do almost anything else. He is well enough drilled for a Sergt., learns very rapidly, and spouts Shakespeare ad libitum, but he is the wickedest chap I ever saw.

January 30, 1862

It rains hard and did nearly all night. No drill today. It is very lonesome and tedious. I have been quite sad during the day for some reason—because I was so idle I presume.

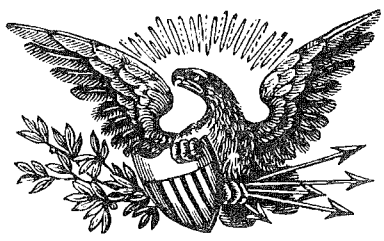
I finished reading "Great Expectations" today. It is a singular book. Like most of Dickens' works it requires great patience to get through the first two thirds of the story. He seldom gets beyond what is rational and credible. Such things might happen without an unreasonable stretch of imagination. The story amounts to a good deal in the end, but one must live on the wit and satire which are for the most part independent of it till he begins to think there is no story at all. I do not think there is that liveliness and vivacity about it that characterizes his earlier stories. His best days are past.

They are trying to reduce the pay of soldiers. It is a very bad policy. The pay was so low before that the army could not retain its best men. It is hardly supposable that, so long as the government can pay, such a class of men as the officers of the army are, or at least should be, will willingly incur all the dangers and hardships of the war for their mere subsistence.

It is now near 10 months since I enlisted. I have spent no money foolishly, and but little which was in any sense unnecessary. I have thus far barely $40.00 to fall back on in case I should leave the army minus legs or arms, or as many will with broken constitution and ruined health. I can live on less than I have.

When the country is poor and exhausted, I will serve it still for ¼ what I now get, or when the worst comes, for nothing, and do it willingly. The country is now rich. It can pay all that it does. It hurts me that it should begrudge the miserable pittance which can now be saved beyond bare subsistence.

There is another feature which displeases me still more, viz., that our pay is to be cut down by men who loll away more time in houses of public prostitution than they spend in legislative duties. Let them cut down their own pay to begin with or before they talk about reducing ours, let them lie out in the mud and rain a few days on picket.



Eighty-eighth Installment

January 31, 1862

We had a very energetic skirmish and bayonet drill today. Benson is on fatigue and there is no one but I to drill the Company. The men are eager for drill. I have never seen them so full of enthusiasm. They are getting vindictive and blood-thirsty, willing to drill the whole day long if they can thereby be made more sure of success. I stimulate these feelings by words and actions as much as possible. A word at the right time often fills a soldier with a zeal and ambition which will be lifelong. I miss no such chances.

This spring will open with great events. It will be such a summer as never was seen on this continent. I await its coming with high hopes. No one knows whether he will see its end. I hope to, but if I do not I have little doubt that there is some reward in store for the soldier who does his best in his country's cause. Meanwhile I will do all that lies within my limited sphere to ensure success. So far as those under me, and myself are concerned, I will leave no stone unturned which can contribute ought toward victory.

I received with much pleasure letters from Arthur and from home.

February 2, 1862

Corpl. Godfrey came in with the gloves from town today. The first pass we set two big 6 footers, stout as bulls, but who had never boxed a blow, to work with them. They went in with might and main, and in about 2 minutes one of them went over "capummux" onto his seat. He sprawled out both hands and stared around, the very picture of astonishment, a stream of blood as large as a pipe stem flowing from each nostril. They concluded to dispense with any further amusement of that kind. I nearly laughed myself to death. Seward is sick and can now take no part. There has been quite a general round. Corpl. Godfrey appears to be the champion of our Company. The weather is fair but it being Sunday we have no drill.

February 3, 1862

The snow is now 3 inches deep. This is the deepest of the winter. The weather is warm. It is very certain that we cannot leave here unless it be on a fleet for several weeks. I shall be glad to see Spring and activity. We are shut up in a little valley where we can neither see nor hear anything nor anybody.

February 5, 1862

I put on the gloves tonight for the first time with Capt. Handy. We went easy and he being a very weak opponent, I came off without being touched. There is a great deal of boxing in the Company and there is considerable talent in the crude state.

Corpl. Godfrey is the instructor. He has the genuine fighting build, a square solid head, a neck like a bull and though only 5 feet 7 inches high, word out of him nor will be let me He is French and cares no more for pounding than for the wind blowing in his face. He is one of the real old Detroit French, a nephew of the man who used for years to buy all the fur in our country.

The family at Detroit are wealthy and he is said to have some very pretty sisters. He is himself well educated, an excellent Corpl., but has heretofore led a very hard life. He has spent a great deal of time on the Mississippi river and in places generally where there was any prospect of a muss.

I have been drilling the non-commissioned officers on bayonet today. Benson is building a log guard house and must needs be excused, for when he has a log shanty in view it is useless to talk of anything else. I hope he will have it done soon.

Handy is disposed to have a little strife on whose Company will come out ahead on the bayonet drill. He has a Lt. to help him and as I have no one at present it goes much slower than it ought. He has become so jealous already that I cannot get a word out of him nor will he let me look at one of his books. I am glad to see that. It is a favorable indication. I can get all the books I want with ease and without his assistance. If Benson was one half as good on drill as on log houses, we could beat him to death.

February 6, 1862

Rainy. "E'en as a herd of bristling swine in Brentford town, a town of mud are pricked along." So do we wallow about in mud up to our knees. It is pretty dull business, but we can see the end of it I think. We shall have to go on picket once more at this place, but only once I think.

The health of the Regiment is remarkably good and that of our Company is almost all that could be asked. How in the world it is kept so good is more than I can tell. The men are in the mud all the time, feet wet a great deal, the ground in the shanties damp and often clear mud. Far less attention given to cleanliness than at home, beds frequently wet. They have little to eat save meat, bread, beans, rice and coffee, yet most of them are so fat they can hardly see out of their eyes.

Installment No. 108.

April 14, 1862

I have been engaged at the Court Martial today. Weather very warm and fine. We have lived well this day at least. Our light batteries have thrown about 100 shells today to keep the enemy off some new works which they are attempting to erect. The enemy succeeded during the night in cutting down a small piece of woods which obstructed the range of their batteries. We took 7 very ragged prisoners today. None of our men, so far as I can learn, have been hurt.

April 15, 1862

A light shower of rain in the morning, but the day was warm and fine. I was on Court Martial. There was considerable firing by light batteries on the left and by gun boats on the river. Regiment went on picket at dark and I got permission to go along.

April 16, 1862

Weather very warm and fine. Brisk firing by light batteries on the left to all of which the enemy replies. We cannot see the guns of either party but can very distinctly see the shells explode. One stray ball struck in the woods near us but did no harm.

About 9 a. m., we changed our position a short distance to be more out of the way. Soon after that a 12 lb. shell struck very near us (Cos. F and I on reserve) but did not burst.

At 1 p. m. there is little firing, though it had been brisk till after 12. About 11 a. m. Sergt. Bishop of Co. F was killed while standing near our battery. He thought himself too sick to go on picket last night but came out today in disobedience of orders to see the artillery practice. In consequence of going when and where he ought not, he was cut entirely in two by a ball from the enemy. Not a man about the battery has been hurt.

He was a fine young man and in most cases a good non-commissioned officer. He had long had a presentiment of his fate and though a young man, was tired of life and often expressed a wish that the appointed time would come. Yesterday morning he said he knew he should be killed soon and twice repeated the wish that the time was at hand. This morning he went out and was almost immediately killed. We wrapped all that could be found of him in his blanket and buried him under an old chestnut.

I saw one of the 3rd Michigan pickets with both legs shot off. No other accident occurred to the pickets. From about 8 a. m. till sundown from 150 to 200 shots per hour were fired on our part from light guns. Nearly all the barracks of the enemy on the left were burned by our shells, and several of their guns dismounted.

For more than one hour the shells dropped one after another into one of their forts just like clock work, not one missing. The men inside could be seen running, creeping on their hands and knees and crouching in every nook and corner trying to escape them. They flew around like a flock of chickens when a hawk pounces down among them.

Gen. Keyes engaged the enemy at the extreme left and toward night there was very heavy cannonading and great volleys of musketry. The battle must have been severe. A few heavy shells burst to the right of us probably thrown from mortars. They burst at the height of a 1000 feet and the fragments made a great whizzing.

Our balloon has hung all day like an evil spirit over their doomed works. It must be very aggravating to have a man just beyond their reach looking down on every move they make and telegraphing it as soon as made to Gen. McClellan. They have a balloon, but for some reason it will not stay up more than 2 minutes at a time and must be more vexatious than useful. Seward declared, when the shells began to fall near, that he longed for the peace and quiet of his Michigan home.

April 17, 1862

The cannonading which was continued at intervals during the night, opened vigorously at sunrise. It slackened about 8 a. m. but continued moderately all day. A heavy rifled gun which the enemy put up yesterday drove one of our light batteries off the field just in front of us in quick time.

A fatigue party of 600 men was detailed to work on the intrenchments. I went along. The enemy however shelled the spot where we intended to work in such a manner that it was thought best to keep off it during the day. There are all sorts of reports about yesterdays work but they are so uncertain that I will record nothing but what I know to be true.

9:30 p. m. It seems pretty certain that we lost 100 men killed and wounded yesterday. A work toward the left was taken by our men and nine guns spiked, but it could not be held. There is still some firing on the left. It sounds wonderfully distinct in the stillness of the night.

April 18, 1862

At 11 p. m. we were all waked up and ordered to be prepared to fall in on the shortest notice. Soon after midnight there was considerable musketry on the left and we all turned out in line. It lasted about 10 minutes and just before 1 a. m. we went back to quarters.

About 3 a. m. musketry again at same place and we turned out and in again as before.

Three men, Myers, Winnie and Drake concealed themselves in their tents and tried to escape going out. I don't know what the Capt. will do about it, but I would put them in a way at least to serve the balance of their enlistment in the District Prison.

One of our guns on the left (a 32, I think) has been firing at intervals of about 5 minutes since yesterday morning with remarkable regularity. No satisfactory account can be obtained of the fighting last night. The story of the battery and 9 guns is more likely to be something else.

There is no certainty that we were not badly repulsed. There are not a few things here which displease me. Many of our officers are tired of war and want to be home. They have not the right spirit.

The sight of those 3 rascals skulking away from duty exasperated me beyond all measure. It was hard indeed for me to keep from shooting one of them on the spot. Things move slowly and there are many vicissitudes. I learn also that there were some 3000 to 4000 skulking cowards at the battle of Pittsburgh. There is no way only to carry out the army regulations and shoot every one that can be identified.

April 19, 1862

The regiment went on fatigue today and I went along although I might have remained by reason of the court. We are building a military road along the bank of a small stream. The banks are high and by following them we approach near the enemy under cover.

There is an old military road built by Gen. Washington on the opposite side. Our road is 24 feet wide and costs not a little digging and chopping. It is to be level as a railroad and with its branches will be 4 or 5 miles long.

There were 3 old rusty cannon shot of the Revolution dug up to day. Four regiments were at work. We were at night within ½ mile of one of their batteries. Seward was wandering around and not knowing that we were already up to our pickets started to go to the enemies, supposing them to be ours. They were foolish enough to shoot at him before he came very near, and he made excellent time back to our lines. I am glad he got off but believe I should have laughed myself to death if he had been taken. They fired one shot over where we were at work, but not being able to see us could do no damage.

They also threw an 80 lb. shell over our camp to day. It struck a little beyond the camp and plowed a furrow in which a log 2 feet in diameter might have been concealed. They may give us trouble here with that gun. There was no cannonading last night and but a few straggling shots from pickets.. There have been but few cannon shots today. It is pretty certain that in the musketry affair of the 16th, we got by far the worst of it. It rains hard tonight.

Installment No. 109.

April 20, 1862

Sunday. The Regiment has not been on duty today. . Weather moist. The firing of small arms has been pretty brisk along the lines. Our Regiment goes on picket at 4 tomorrow morning. I am on Court Martial and shall not be able to get out with them.

I have read an account of the battle of Pittsburgh which is in many ways very disgraceful — no pickets — camp full of women—5,000 cowards—etc. The whole affair shows a most disgraceful ignorance or neglect of duty and great want of discipline in one part of the army.

April 21, 1862

Court Martial was adjourned sine die. It was a dark rainy morning. The Regiment barely succeeded in getting into line at the appointed hour, 4 a. m., and in consequence Capt. B. and Seward as well as all the rest went off without breakfast. As a punishment for not getting up earlier the Colonel would let them have nothing to eat till 3 p. m. It is no small job to get a Regiment out at that time where no drums or bugles are allowed to sound except for alarms.

April 22, 1862

I rather verdantly, the weather being fine, concluded to join the Company. I did so. It rained horribly nearly all night. I got well drenched, was very cold toward morning and never but one more unpleasant night on picket. There was not a gun fired and nothing relieved the monotony of rain and darkness from dark till daylight. At four several times I sat down on a rail, leaned up against a tree and patiently waited for sleep. I each time got an uncertain doze of about 15 minutes and to pay for it had to walk industriously for an hour to get the chills and cramps out of my legs. I had only my overcoat. With a blanket I could have slept very well.. We were within 200 rods of a rebel fort and fires of course were not to be thought of except in fireplaces at home and other places equally distant. I had to laugh over Seward's lamentation, still I was sorry for the poor fellow. He says he has no desire to be distinguished in war or anything connected with it.

Our men with their usual desire for conversation opened on the rebel pickets yesterday and soon found them to be from a Georgia Regiment, which they often met at Munson's Hill. They talked for more than an hour and finally some of them laid down their arms, met and shook hands on middle ground. They before parting, agreed, that being old acquaintances and in as much as each knew the other could shoot if he was a mind to, they would mutually refrain from hostilities while opposite each other. . I don't like such meetings for various reasons. They take all the spirit out of war. The weather has been showery all day.. At 12 noon today I had been one year in the service.

April 23, 1862

We went on fatigue at 7 a. m. building another road. Then men worked well. A few shots were fired at us when we were returning. A 6 lb. rifle shot and a heavy shell struck near us but no one was injured.

A raw recruit in Co. F rushed up and down the line several times in great trepidation not knowing exactly what ought to be done but evidently of the opinion that it was no time to be idle. We have two luckless fellows who have come down to take their first lessons in soldiering. We have not taken them out yet. Yesterday was the anniversary of my enlistment. I cannot say that matters with me have during the past year been very adverse. Many things have been different—from what I expected.

Nothing was more remote from my thoughts a year ago than becoming a soldier by profession. I then looked forward only to 3 months in the service—now I rarely attempt to look through the uncertainty of my future. The army has so soon become a home to me. I often think, 'tis true, of friends and other scenes but cannot determine when, if ever, I shall see them again. That tremulousness and quick beating of the heart which I once felt, at the sound of bullets, has gone. I feel as though the destined one is pretty sure to come soner or later and have no more anxiety about the particular approach of death by any other time than I used to have about the source. When it comes I will try to meet it decently and till that time I will indulge in no grave fears or idle speculations.

April 24, 1862

For some reason unknown to me we were all called up at 3 a. m. and stood in line till after daylight. Such things are becoming far more common than pleasant. I met my quondam friend Dave Briggs today. His Regiment came up last night. . He wears a very doleful, disconsolate look which he attributes to hard crackers but I more than half suspect that the peculiar music of shells which he hears in close proximity for the first time is a far more fruitful cause of his melancholy.. He declared he would much rather be back in Michigan again at work for the Squire.

I went on fatigue at noon with 80 men. Gen. McClellan came where we were at work. We were engaged in throwing up a redoubt within about ¾ of a mile of two of the enemy's forts. They neglected to cut down the woods and under their cover we work unseen. Five hundred men will work day and night till it is completed. Shells have been falling hap-hazard over the country round about in small numbers, but no one was hurt so far as I could see though there were several narrow escapes. The paymaster, a very welcome visitor, tonight handed over the nedful for January and February—I was reduced to $2.00..

April 25, 1862

Weather cold and unpleasant. Nothing in particular has happened except that we have lived a little better than usual. Seward is detailed to go on fatigue at 11 p. m. to remain till morning. He was a little tight at the time and repeated emphatically that he was devoid of ambition in all warlike affairs.

April 26, 1862

Seward had a rainy night but returned in very good spirits. He was just near enough to a smart little skirmish to hear and see all that was doing without being in any danger himself. He had very glowing accounts to give of his narrow escape.

A Mass. Regiment took 15 prisoners with a loss to themselves of 3 killed and 9 wounded.. The Monitor and Merrimac I see are making a great stir in the world. The latter gives the army here much more trouble than we would willingly acknowledge.

The fear of it creates not a little uneasiness. If it was outside the Roads our communications at Ship Point would be destroyed and our operations much embarrassed. This is a cold, dismal, rainy day. All the occupants of our tent save I have rolled themselves in their blankets and gone to bed to keep warm. I have not tried that way but find it very cold sitting up.

April 27, 1862

Sunday was spent on picket. It was about the old story, a little musketry, some solid shot, shells, all of which produced no effect, so far as I know on our side. Some heavy shells from the gun boats made a great scattering at their works.

Our first parallel is nearly completed and a general bombardment cannot be far off.

April 28, 1862

The night was cold and damp but the morning is fair. The lines were quiet except a few shots from our gunboats. The rebels threw several shells at the working parties this morning, but without effect. A shell burst near my "Contraband" yesterday when he was bringing out a pail of coffee and frightened him terribly. "Can't stan dat zur, can't stan dat zur—didn't want a drap de pail but if any more dem fellers come I hab to fling him." I don't dislike the animals so bad as I used to. They are very convenient to have around and I have more hearty laughs out of mine than from all other sources.

(To be continued.)

GOOD SECRETARY

X: "I've been trying to see you all week. When may I have an appointment?"

Y: "Make a date with my secretary."

X: "I did, and we had a swell time, but I still want to see you."

"Sculpture is very easy, isn't it?" asked the sweet young lady.

"Very, very easy," answered the sculptor, "and very, very simple. You just take a block of marble and a chisel and knock off all the marble you don't want."

Alexander Bennett Copley

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE FOUNDER OF THE FIRST STATE BANK OF DECATUR WHICH CELEBRATES ITS SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY THIS YEAR

Written for the Republican by His Niece,
Helen Hathaway, 1240 Ferdon Road, Ann Arbor, Michigan

First Installment

Our Editor's request for a sketch, or biography of Alexander Bennett Copley, one of Decatur's ablest and most public spirited citizens of a few generations ago, has led the writer to gather together fragments of the early history of a portion of Cass and Van Buren Counties. The sources used in this work were the Copley papers in the Michigan Historical Collections of the University of Michigan, also Rogers' "History of Cass County," and Rowland's "History of Van Buren County." The writer has made use of a special study of the Copley papers, with particular emphasis upon an account of the career of Alexander Bennett Copley, written by Geneva M. Johnston, of Royal Oak, Michigan, a summer school student working under the direction of Professor L. G. VanderVelde, of the University's History Department, in the summer of 1943.

Also, of great assistance in this work, has been a very readable story, or genealogical sketch of the Copley and Buell families, written by Miss Bertha C. Buell for the benefit of the younger generations of those families.

Besides these sources, the writer is indebted to various members of the family for information taken from their records, or incidents recalled by them, as well as some of her own recollections of the earlier days, and in particular, of her Uncle Bennett Copley.

Settled In New York

The A. B. Copley we knew was descended from a pioneer family whose early home was New York State. His father, Alexander Copley, who was the youngest of nine children of Thomas and Mary Copley, was born in 1790 in Granby, Hartford County, Connecticut. What brought this young cabinet maker to Champion, Jefferson County, New York, we do not know; but the records tells us that, in 1814, at the age of twenty-four years, Alexander took for his wife Esther Nott, a girl of twenty, then living in Jefferson County. The story goes that the marriage took place at Champion.

Alexander's diary giving an account of his journey from Watertown to LeRoy, New York, to bring home his bride, gives us a side light on the thrift, combined with the simple living of that day. He had been promised horses and a wagon to get his wife; but when he went to get them, he was unable to do so, greatly to his distress. However, he was fortunate enough to make arrangements with another neighbor, who furnished him with horses and wagon for the trip.

He arrived at his destination at about 7 o'clock in the evening, "loaded up and took his wife and started for Watertown." They stopped at Gardner's Inn, where he bargained for 500 feet of clean stuff pine boards, stopping later at Brown's Inn. From there he went to a mill near by, where he had agreed for some wheat, but found there was none to be had at the time. They went on, arriving at Watertown at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Both were much fatigued after riding "in such very bad going." The diary covering this part of the story stops with the entry on Monday (evidently a day or two after the return), "Finished my choring ready to go to work tomorrow."

Established Home In Watertown

Alexander and Esther established their first home in Watertown, New York, although they did not remain there many years. By 1818, they had moved to Champion, presumably to locate in the same town where Alexander's brother William lived. William was something of a rover and sometimes influenced Alexander to follow him in his moves. While the Copleys were living at Watertown, and later at Champion, five of their children were born, two of whom died early.

Some interesting details appear in the letters of William B. Copley to his brother, Alexander, showing the difficulties of himself and others engaged in the cotton manufacturing business of that early day. Evidently William, who was also a cabinet maker, was what might be called a hustler, and must have possessed considerable mechanical ingenuity, as he speaks in one letter of having placed himself in a position to "make some of the most complicated machinery that has ever been made in this country." His location then was Whitesboro, New York,—in Oneida County near the town of Utica.

Knowing the interest which William took in his brother, Alexander, it need not surprise us to know that Alexander and Esther moved from Champion to Whitesboro in 1823. At that time the family consisted of Charlotte, eight years old, her brother, Almon, six, and Baby Alexander Bennett, who had been born at Champion March 11, 1822, and was the fifth of the thirteen children born to Alexander and Esther Copley.

Much Moving

Whitesboro in the Mohawk Valley did not long remain the home of the Copleys. For, in due time, William moved to Walden, New York, and from there wrote Alexander as follows:

> I commenced work this day. There is plenty of it to do but I am at present very poorly supplied with tools to do it with. I am first to put into operation some looms for flannel and some spinning jennies which they have on hand.

His letter written in April, 1824, brought out the following information regarding the tariff:—

> If the tariff does not go into operation, I am afraid we should be put to it for a livelihood here; in which case it would be better for only one of us to be here. . . . Since writing the above, I hear that the tariff has passed the House of Representative; we believe it will pass the Senate this session.

This evidently influenced Alexander and Esther to move from Oneida County to Walden. For, in William's letter dated May 16, 1824, he gave Alexander explicit directions in regard to landing in a sloop at Crawford's dock, adding the following details regarding his own moving expenses:—

> If I could know when you would be at Newburgh, I could manage it so as to save you considerable expense, but that is probably out of the question. I am well acquainted with Mr. Joseph Treck on Terry dock,—he brought my family out from Newburgh; but he charged me three dollars for my family alone, which is too much. It cost me $9 to get my family and effects up from Newburgh, but you will get up for much less.

Leave New York

By the time the family settled in Walden, near the southern edge of the Catskills, Almon was getting to be a big boy, and little Bennett must have been a toddler of three. Meantime, a new baby, Esther Evoline, had arrived. However, it was not long before Alexander and Esther and their four children were moving again—this time across the Hudson to Mattewan in Duchess County. There only two years passed before the restless cabinet maker, driven by hard luck or ambition, or a mixture of both, began the longest trek yet. It took him and his wife and five children (four others had died) to Dayton, in Southwestern Ohio, in 1829. There two more daughters were born. In 1830, as superintendent, he started in operation the first cotton mill at Dayton.

William had finally moved to Philarelphia, and his letter to Alexander, dated March 20, 1835, mentions the type of fabrics woven there:—

> Thousands—and I don't know but I may say millions—of yards of jane twilled goods of various figures are woven in this city and its suburbs. ..... The woolen factories are mostly making Cassimeres and Satinettes.

In the same letter, the following comments give us a hint as to the progress of benevolent institutions at that time:—

> I began to hear distinctly the voices of a multitude of children and when I got in front of the yard I stopped, and looking through the poling I beheld, sure enough, a multitude of boys from 4 to 8 years of age in groups, all neatly dressed alike, not bawling and yelling—or quarreling, but innocently engaged in talk and mirth, apparently happy as heaven. This place is the Orphans' Asylum—all poor children that have no parents are taken here; fed, clothed, and educated at the public expense—so humane an institution certainly does credit to Philadelphia. I hardly expected to find so much humanity on earth.

Arrives in Michigan

What led Alexander Copley to make his first visit to Michigan, is not entirely clear; but, presumably, it was the adventurous spirit of the pioneer. Rowland's "History of Van Buren County" tells us that, in 1832, he made a journey on horse-back from Dayton, Ohio, to that part of Michigan Territory called the St. Joseph Country, reaching the home of Dolphin Morris on September 4th of that year.

It appears that, up to that time, there had been entered at the land office sixteen eighty-acre lots in the township of Decatur, four in Waverly, and five in La Fayette (now Paw Paw). For nearly two years, Mr. Morris and his wife had been the only settlers in Van Buren County; but, at the time of Mr. Copley's arrival, there were six families in the county, namely: Dolphin Morris, his brother, Samuel H. Morris, H. D. Swift, George Tittle, David Curry and LeGrand Anderson.

Evidently the new country met with Alexander's approval, for, in the following summer, he, with his wife and family of five children, made the journey from Dayton, Ohio, to Little Prairie Ronde, by ox teams, covering eleven miles a day and camping out each night, reaching their destination on July 1st of that summer, which, as nearly as we can learn, was 1833. They bought land on the site of what is now the village of Nicholsville. Their first stock and farm implements consisted of two head of Durham cattle and three sizes of Wood's patent cast iron plows.

It so happened that at about that time, the Lawrences, another prominent Prairie family, came from Dayton, Ohio, to Michigan. Both families were first located on the picturesque site of the Nicholsville millpond; the Lawrences camped at the "Little Bridge" to the East between the mill-pond and Finch Lake, while the Copleys settled and built their first home on the north side of the Mill-pond, at the point where the road enters the causeway crossing the bridge and leading south into Nicholsville. This site later became the home of Joe and Maria Haight Rigles, and is more recently known as the Chamberlain place.

First School and Tools

Evidently, Alexander Copley was not lacking in enterprise; for we learn that it was he who built the first saw mill (in 1833) in Volinia township, locating it on the little stream running from Nicholsville into what later became known as Bunker Lake. At that time, the boys, Almon and Bennett, were both old enough to help their father with the mill, and also to assist him in a cabinet shop which was run in connection with the sawmill.

For a while, Alexander Bennett's older sister, Charlotte, taught school at home. Then a schoolhouse was built and was used by the first school district organized in that township, until it burned.

A glance into the history of Van Buren County in the early 30's gives us the following inside information about the construction of the first settlers' homes:—

> At the time of which I am writing (the early thirties), it is doubtful if there is a cabin with rafters and board gable in either Cass or Van Buren County, and for years thereafter one could distinguish the eastern settler at the corners, and the chimney built on the inside without jams and supported on the curved timbers of a natural crook.

Anyone who wishes to pause in this busy machine age to recall what kind of tools the farmers used in the early day, may be interested in reading the following paragraph, quoted directly from Mrs. Johnston's article:—

> The farming tools of the pioneer were of the simplest kind, hardly differing from those of their ancestors of fifty to a hundred years before. An ax, iron wedge, bar share plow (which was a plow with share and landside combined) to which a wood-end mould board was attached, shovel plow (sometimes iron barrow teeth, more often wooden ones), a heavy hoe, and a sickle for cutting grain, which after being cut was stacked around a circular threshing floor of dirt, upon which it was tramped out by horses and winnowed by one man throwing it into the air, while two men flopped a sheet to fan it.

The fanning mill was not introduced into the settlement until 1831. The wheat was necessarily in poor condition for flour because of the presence of smut and dirt which the rude mills of that day did not have the appliances to remove.

Some of our older residents will recall stories about the primitive style of dress of the early settlers. The following quotation from Mrs. Johnston's article gives us rather a vivid picture of the type of clothing the farmers wore in the early '30's:—

> The dress of the settlers was of the most primitive style, both as to fashion and material. With the men the old time hunting shirt had given away to a garment called a "wamus," a loose blouse with a narrow binding at the top and a single button at the throat, the shirt reaching to the hips when loose, or to the waist when tied by the corners as it was usually worn. The material was linsey, a homespun cloth of cotton and wool woven plain. Pantaloons were of jeans, blue or butternut, with different shades of color as the different skeins of yarn took on a light or dark hue in the dyeing.

(Second Installment.)

Seven Days to Market

In the '30's, various considerations governed the choice of farm land, one of which seems to have been the securing of land that was easy to work. The early settler chose the level prairie because it was easier to work than the rich lands near the St. Joseph River, even though this stream was navigable to Lake Michigan.

According to some of our older settlers, however, there were cases in which the hilly lands in the southern part of Volinia township, were selected before the prairie lands, because the wooden plow points in use at that time would not scour on the heavy prairie loam, but would do for the sandy soil of the hillsides.

Some readers of our Decatur Republican may recall tales of marketing with oxen and horses and wagons in those days. One such trip was made by John Shaw, a prominent Volinia settler. On the 21st day of September, 1834, he started from Little Prairie Ronde for St. Joseph with a wagon and a three-horse team, accompanied by a hired man from the Copley farm with a wagon and two yokes of oxen. Quoting from "Pioneer Pictures," by Alexander B. Copley, in the "History of Van Buren County," the story reads as follows:

> The first day they reached Paw Paw; the second day, Prospect Lake; the third day, camped in the woods, and the fourth day reached St. Joseph, the fifth day they sold their loads, made their purchases, started home, and reached Rulo's, a French settler ten miles from St. Joseph; the sixth day they got to Paw Paw, and the next day they reached home, having camped out every night except two nights at Dodge's tavern, Paw Paw, which at that time was little more than a shanty, he having just commenced building his hotel.

An interesting side-light on how far the farmer's products would go at that time in exchange for other commodities, may be had from the account book of Alexander Copley:—

> 36 bushels of wheat at 60 cents, 21.60; one barrel of salt, $2.50; expenses $1.94, cash brought home, $1.82; the rest in sundries."

Further information along this line from "Pioneer Pictures" by Alexander B. Copley may also be of interest:—

> This year (1834) was the first opening up of trade and business between the prairie and Paw Paw. The next year, the winter of 1835 I accompanied my father on a trip to St. Joseph, with a load of oats to be exchanged for salt. The oats sold for 37½ cents a bushel and the salt cost $2.62½ per barrel. We accomplished the round trip in six days.

How true were the words of Will Carleton that "Neighborhoods meant counties in those days," may be seen from the fact that a Frenchman (the John B. Rulo mentioned above), who lived in the township of Bainbridge, Berrien County, was the only settler between Paw Paw and St. Joseph. A log barn at Prospect Lake, and a log house with no roof a little farther west, were the only other evidences of attempts to settle the country. However, as soon as the snows of winter vanished (in the spring of 1835), the road which had been so desolate, became an artery of life and the on-rush of civilization in Van Buren county began.

The Copley Family

While the Copley family still lived at Nicholsville, the youngest son was born, in '34,—Napoleon Eugene. How did he happen to have two French names? Bringing in a little European history, it was only a few years earlier that Napoleon the Great had been defeated and exiled to St. Helena. Other members of his family were also exiled from France; and one of them, at least, his brother Joseph, had come to the United States, for many years a place of refuge for Europeans in trouble. He or some other member of the family had obtained considerable land in New York state. So it happened that in St. Lawrence county, New York, a lake was given the name, "Bonaparte," on whose shores stands a fine and spacious house known as the "Castle." Bonaparte Lake was only twenty-five or thirty miles from Champion; and no doubt, Alexander Copley knew of this lake, and possibly had even visited it. In 1834, the Bonapartes were again stirring in France, and Louis Napoleon, a nephew of the first emperor and destined later to become Emperor Napoleon III, made an unsuccessful effort to get control of the French Government. This may have aroused memories of the grand mansion on Bonaparte Lake and led Alexander and Esther to name their youngest son Napoleon. This does not explain the "Eugene"; but perhaps the parents thought it harmonized with the name, "Napoleon."

The youngest child in the family was born in '36—a girl, sandy-haired, blue-eyed Harriett Chestina. When she was a year old, the last move was made, this time to a farm a mile or more north of the village of Nicholsville. There they occupied the house which Alexander himself built, and which continued for many years to be the Copley home.

The Copley Homestead

The farm, consisting eventually of 273 acres, all in Cass county, was bounded on the North by the Van Buren county line and extended to a point nearly opposite the old Henry Morris home. The house, like the Morris home, was far back from the road. It was a half mile south and a half mile west of the Rosewarne corner, and the road leading to it left the "East Prairie Road" near the Elias Morris place.

The frame house in which they lived was built of lumber cut at the mill, and was sometimes known as the "Glass House", because it had so many sash windows filled with glass, —not common in those days in frontier Michigan. The trees planted about the new home grew and later led to giving the place the name, "Locust Grove." Inside the house was a big fireplace, with andirons and crane, and above them on the mantel-place was displayed some of the family pewter ware. A winding stair-case led to the second story.

In the early days, the house and yard were enclosed by a fence, and inside this fenced enclosure were five family graves, which many years later were removed by Bennett Copley to the Nicholsville cemetery at the time the Copley monument was erected.

This house was later restored by Ward Copley (A. B. Copley's second son), who made it his home for a time. According to the writer's memory, it was occupied in 1905 (and perhaps longer) by Cass Rosewarne. Still later it became the home of the Gale family from Illinois, and in the days of his young manhood, was the home of our well known and respected hardware merchant, Raymond Gale.

Here the Copley children, including our own Bennett, grew to young manhood and womanhood, and from here scattered to their homes.

It was no doubt during the early days of the Copley family's residence in the home just described, that Alexander Bennett wrote a letter to a cousin, in which he gave the following description:—

> The place where we now live is very near the centre of Little Prairie Ronde but for fear you might not know where that it, I will tell you the exact spot we live on and if you will take the pains to look on the Farmers Map of Michigan, you will find it just eighty rods east of the centre of section two in Volinia township, Cass county, Michigan. I am going to school this winter to a Mr. Smith. The schoolhouse is situated about a mile and a half off in a direction bearing a little east of south. It is fine sporting here, there is game of all sorts in abundance, small game in particular; rabbits and quails are not very plenty at present but if they continue to increase as fast as they have within a few years past, we shall soon have plenty. Squirrels are so numerous and bold that in the fall they run all over the prairie and are easily caught.

This sounds very much as if the location of the school that Bennett attended at that time was that of the present "Huycktown" School.

Alexander, the father, passed from this life on January 6, 1842, at the age of fifty-one years. It then devolved upon Bennett and his older brother, Almon, to care for the farm home and the family of five children.

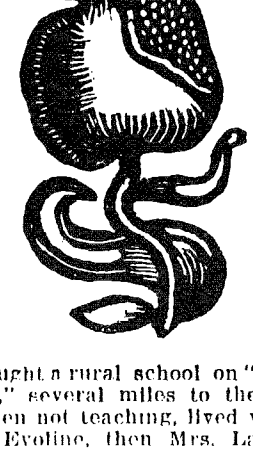
Settlement on Little Prairie Ronde

It was evident that in 1849 Bennett was contemplating marriage; for in that year a new house was built,—the one which Decatur residents have known for many years as the Copley farmhouse. It was located a little north and west of the "Locust Grove" home and faced the county line road. Only the low east wing of the house was built at that time. The upright was added a few years later.

It was to this home in 1850 that Bennett took his bride,—Jane Helen Hathaway, who was one of a family of pioneers that came to Michigan from Cayuga County, New York, in 1838. She was a sister of Benjamin Hathaway, who will be remembered as a forester, nurseryman, practical farmer, and a poet, the author of "The League of the Iroquois" and other poetical works, as well as a contributor to various periodicals along agricultural lines.

In the meantime, Mother Esther had also passed on. The daughter Evoline had married Levi Lawrence, one of the Lawrence family previously mentioned, and they lived in the big brick house a little way down the "East Prairie Road," a short distance north of the Huycktown corner, where three sons were born,—Linneus, Archie and Austin.

There were then left only the three youngest of the Copley family to divide the possessions and close the doors. One daughter, Euphemia, went to Oswego Normal School in New York to prepare for teaching. Harriett taught a rural school on "Young's Prairie," several miles to the South, and when not teaching, lived with her sister, Evoline, then Mrs. Lawrence.



Napoleon Copley

Something more should be said of Napoleon, whose adventurous spirit fitted his name. He left an interesting diary, now preserved in the Mich. Historical Collection of the University of Michigan. This diary mentions something of interest, among other matters,—namely, that he helped his brother Alexander Bennett build the shop (at the new farm home occupied by Bennett and Helen) in 1854.

The diary also recites with a flourish how Napoleon with three other young men, set off with a wagon and four horses in the fall of '56 for the country across the Mississippi to "turn new sod and found homes." They, like many others, must have been obeying the injunction of Horace Greely, "Go West, young man."

Settlers were then pouring into Kansas, partly to win that territory for slavery or for free labor, and partly because the western prairies offered an excellent opportunity to take up new land. Napoleon staked out claims in the new town of Emporia. Unfortunately, the high hopes and restless ambition of Napoleon were doomed to disappointment, as, somehow in that western country, he contracted tuberculosis. The journey of his sisters, Euphemia (or "Phim") and "Hattie" to Kansas, part of the way by canal and stage-coach to bring him home, is another story, but one which reveals their love and devotion to their brother. Napoleon's career was thus terminated in 1857, at the age of twenty-three years.

The sisters Olivia and Flora also died young. Almon married Anne, the sister of Redmond Anderson. The couple located first in Missouri, and later in Paola, Kansas. They had a son LeGrand, whose grandson, Frank Copley, is now instructing in the Latin Department of the University of Michigan, and who is on the Board of the International Center maintained for the benefit of the University foreign students.

Prairie Neighbors

Now to go back to the year 1814, let us see how events shaped themselves in the East to bring another interesting family to Little Prairie Ronde. In that year a young widower in the little town of Newport, New Hampshire, Chalker Buell by name, took for his wife Sarah (Bascom) Noyes. Their family of six children consisted of Amos-Noyes; Sarah-Noyes; Emmons; Barber Grinnell; followed by two daughters, Eunice and Experience ("Spedie"). In 1829, when Barber Grinnell was six, the Buells moved to Oakfield, near Batavia, in western New York, thus crossing the trail of the Copley family. In 1854, Emmons and Barber bought in Little Prairie Ronde, Mich., a farm whose northern "40" cornered at Locust Grove, and whose northern and eastern boundaries were the Copley and the Lawrence farms. On the West lay the holdings of the Hathaway family, where Bennett had already found his wife, Helen.

At about that time, Little Prairie Ronde became a rather outstanding country community, with its moral and intellectual standards, in which plain living and high thinking were blended. The families who may perhaps be best remembered by some of our readers were the Copleys, the Lawrences, the Hathaways, the Morrises, the Rosewarnes, the Huycks, the Kerns and the Morlans. The Thorps of Nicholsville might also be mentioned, since Mrs. Charles (Amanda) Thorp will be remembered along with the Little Prairie ladies, and her sister, Catherine, or Kittie Richmond, who later became the wife of Benjamin Hathaway.

Enter the Buells

In this neighborhood the Buells took their place. The family consisted at that time of Emmons; his young wife, Hannah; his mother; his sister, Eunice; and Barber, a tall, slender bachelor of 31. It was in 1862 that Barber G. Buell, as he always signed himself, married Harriett Chestina Copley, and their home just across the fields from the Copley home, was the well known and loved "Greenwood."

Those were the days when the Little Prairie Ronde ladies, of whom Mrs. Buell was one, took their Chautauqua courses and received diplomas in them.

From the Buell family came Lincoln, for many years State Y. M. C. A. Secretary; Jennie, prominent for fifty years in the work of the State Grange; Bertha, who for many years held a professorship in History in the State Normal College at Ypsilanti; Harry, who has for many years been located in Spokane, Washington; Frank, who was especially popular with his circle of friends, and who passed on some years ago; and Flora, whose vocation was teaching, and whose phenomenal success as a teacher of the Lyle School still lingers in the memory of those who were her pupils in that district.

The Subject of Our Sketch

From this point, our interest centers in the life and career of Alexander Bennett Copley himself. He continued for a number of years to reside on the farm, about four miles south and east of Decatur, and his mail reached him through the Decatur post-office. On August 8, 1854, the son Eddie Bennett was born. The only other child of Bennett and Helen was Alexander Ward, born in 1868.

Bennett Copley was not a politician in the ordinary sense of the word; but he was something far greater; he was civic-minded and took the keenest interest in public affairs in his town, county and state. He filled various positions of public trust, the first of which seems to have been that of Supervisor of Volinia township.

The Civil War days must have held a challenge for Bennett Copley; for at that time he went about the state, delivering speeches regarding the bravery of Michigan soldiers, the purpose of which was, evidently, to acquaint the state of Michigan with what our Boys in Blue were doing to help preserve the Union.

In fact, his ability as a public speaker was early recognized as a strong factor in the success of his career. He made use of this ability in many good causes, not the least of which was the journeys he made up and down the state, speaking in the interest of Prohibition when the issue became a live one.

A Leading Legislator

He was first elected to the State Legislature as a Representative of Cass County, while Henry H. Crapo was Governor. He seems to have served continuously from 1866 to 1874; and it is recalled that he was also in the Legislature as late as 1881. An incident that occurred during the time he was in the Legislature, is recalled by his niece, Mrs. Lillian Eddy, now of Douglas, Michigan.

At that time, each member of the Legislature had the privilege of appointing two pupils, free of tuition, to the State Normal School at Ypsilanti, then the only Normal School in Michigan. Mrs. Eddy, who may be remembered as "Lillian Grimes" at that time, wrote her Uncle Bennett to see if he would appoint her as one of these pupils. He replied, however, that, while appointments were often made by members from any place in the state, he felt that it was intended that they should be made only from the member's district, and he never appointed any one out of his district. He sent her the name and address of the member from her district, to whom she wrote, receiving the appointment. She believed it quite likely that her uncle had helped her a little by writing the other member about her. This incident serves to show the straight-forward, conscientious type of man that Bennett Copley was.

Becomes a Banker

In the year 1870 a new field of activity opened for Mr. Copley, which had a definite bearing upon his later years. It was in the business world, and meant that Bennett Copley became a banker. He was from then on connected with what later became the First State Bank of Decatur, and he was the first of four generations of the Copley family to direct the affairs of that bank. A. B. Copley became the first president of the bank; his son E. D. (Eddie) Copley, succeeded him; followed by his son, E. E. Copley (Earl), its present president; while Earl's son, Allan B. Copley, had attained the rank of Vice-President when he stepped out to enter the service of his country, which has taken him to the islands of the South Pacific.

In Rowland's "History of Van Buren County," Volume I, pages 348-9, the following paragraph gives us the beginning of the bank's history:—

> "On the 15th day of October of that year (1870) the First National Bank of Decatur was chartered with a capital of $75,000 which was afterward reduced to $50,000. The first Board of Directors was composed of Charles Duncombe, Charles W. Fish, Alexander B. Copley, Levi B. Lawrence, E. Parker Hill, Q. S. Abbott and H. S. Hathaway. Mr. Copley was chosen President and Mr. Hill, cashier. This bank was afterward reorganized under the general banking law of Michigan and has since been a state institution. The present officers are as follows: Pres. E. B. Copley; Vice-Pres. Arthur W. Haydon; Cashier, L. Dana Hill."

Active in State Affairs

In 1871, Mr. Copley's conscientious nature began to feel the pressure of public affairs. In the early part of that year, he received a letter from R. C. Kedzie, Professor of Chemistry at the Michigan Agricultural College at Lansing, concerning a matter in connection with the expansion of that department. The need was urgent, for the laboratory would accommodate only sixteen students, while almost forty were expected for the fall term. This was a problem to present to the State Legislature. During the same term, the question arose as to tur swamps and the old swamp roads, to improve their condition. Mr. Copley was the leader in getting legislation passed to drain the big swamp.

With this increasing activity in public life, Mr. Copley began to turn over more and more responsibility for the farm to his elder son, Eddie. Eddie's marriage occurred in 1873, and at that time, Mr. Copley, with his wife and younger son, Ward, moved to Decatur, and Eddie was given the management of the farm, which he then rented from his father. While Mr. Copley had formerly represented Cass County in the Legislature, he was now elected on the Republican ticket as Representative of Van Buren County.

In the correspondence of 1874, an announcement appears of "Our first annual meeting of the Pioneers of Cass county, and Mr. Copley received notice that he would probably be asked to speak at that meeting.

One of the most important of his duties during his last term as Representative for Van Buren County, was to participate in the choice of a United States Senator to succeed Zachariah Chandler, whose death had just occurred. Honorable Henry P. Baldwin was elected for the unexpired term, ending March 4, 1881. His successor, the Honorable O. D. Conger, was elected for six years, commencing March 4, 1881.

The committees upon which he served during this last term perhaps show his interest in both Agriculture and Welfare work—i. e., on the Standing Committee for Agriculture and the Committee for what was then called the "Reform School for Girls," now known as the "Girls' Training School" at Adrian.

Bank Changed From National To State

In 1889 or 1890, Mrs. Copley's health began to fail. Mr. Copley left no stone unturned in the way of providing medical attention and showing any kindnesses he could offer that might bring her relief or comfort.

In 1890, the bank's twenty-year charter expired; and it was typical of A. B. Copley's conscientious devotion to the best interests of the public of Decatur and Van Buren County, that he favored a change from a National to a State Bank, feeling that the latter would serve a rural community better, since a State Bank's charter permitted more loans to be made on real estate.

It is recalled by members of the family that, on the day the change was made in the charter and the bank became the First State Bank of Decatur, Mrs. Copley lay at the point of death, and did finally pass away; and Mr. Copley himself went back and forth between the home and the bank all the afternoon. No doubt, his hands and his heart were full that day. So on September 20, 1890, at the age of sixty-three years and eight months, Jane Helen Copley was taken to her Heavenly home.

A few years later, Mr. Copley married Mrs. Emma Pritchard, who was a younger sister of Helen, his first wife.

(Fourth and last Installment.)

Rest. Periods

Mr. Copley was accustomed to spend a portion of his summers at his cottage in Bay View, Michigan, and he continued this custom with the second Mrs. Copley. The writer has pleasant memories of the summer of which she spent a few weeks with her aunt and uncle at the Banner cottage, which was located on the topmost of Bay View's terrace, overlooking the green trees interspersed with cottages, and commanding a magnificent view of the Bay below. This was the summer of 1898 and was Mr. Copley's last summer on earth.

There is a variation in the recollection of different relatives, as to the period of time over which Mr. Copley and his wife spent their winters in Florida. One relative recalls that he bought a winter home somewhere in Florida and spent his winters there with the first Mrs. Copley. Another relative recalls that it was between the passing of the first Mrs. Copley and his second marriage, that he spent the winters in Florida, as Mrs. Emma Copley was so devoted to her club work at home that she preferred to spend the winters in Decatur.

A Public Speaker

Referring again to the subject of Mr. Copley's activities as a public speaker, there are still some of us who can well remember him as he appeared before audiences on various occasions. In this connection, his interest in education generally, and in the schools, particularly the Decatur school, was outstanding. He was sometimes called upon to act as a judge at high school debates.

It is unfortunate that more of his speeches were not preserved in writing. His last public speech of which a record was taken, was one given in 1895 at a school rally. It deserves a place in the History of Education and is worth quoting here, as nearly as can be gleaned from the record:—

"Of the time referred to, there were no schools in Michigan as we term them now. The mission school at Niles, a few at Detroit and the adjacent river settlements near, were all that could be termed such in name even . . . and as early as 1785, in laws regulating the settlement of the west they dedicated, and set apart for the support of schools every 36th section of land. Section 16 of every township is known as school lands.

In 1787 the ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory (consisting of all that region west of the Alleghanies, north of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi and south of the Great Lakes) gave the reason for the liberal bequest as follows: 'Religion, Morality and Knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.' How well posterity has kept the trust imposed on it sacred, let the continued interest and improvement of 108 years attest.

In 1826 the general government gave 2 townships of land for a university. In 1817, the territorial government and legislative Council passed an act to institute a university. In 1827 the Council passed an act requiring every township containing 50 inhabitants to have a school master to teach reading, writing and arithmetic and English and French languages as well as decent behavior (which might with propriety still be maintained with advantage) 6 months in the year under a penalty of 50 to 150 dollar assessed tax subject to the supervision of the supervisor of the township. Any township might annul its provisions however by a two-thirds vote. This was the law until 1833 when something like the present system commenced by having schools under the supervision of 3 commissioners and 10 inspectors. . . .

This part of Michigan was thus originally settled—Van Buren Co. first by Dolphin Morris, March 26, 1829. I mention this as in his log cabin the first school was taught in Van Buren Co., commencing in January 1835. . . . This school was taught by William Alexander, a Virginian who was visiting his relative Le Grand Anderson for the winter and was persuaded to teach. . . . In 1831 the population of Michigan territory (comprising Mich. and Wis.) was about 32,000. . . . In 1834 the population had increased to 87,000. . . . Stevens T. Mason was chosen first governor of the new state and Crary elected to Congress who was consulted by the Governor and recommended Mr. Pierce for Sup., who was appointed July 26, 1836.

Mr. Copley's continuing respect for education was illustrated by his life-long interest in the Decatur Alumni Association.

He was very fond of children, and it was his custom for years to give a Christmas party for the children in the family. Some of those occasions are still recalled with great pleasure on the part of those members of the family who were present.

His influence upon the children and young people of his day is no doubt greater than can be measured. The writer well remembers a call at the First State Bank sometime in her younger years, when a pile of coins of small denominations was placed before her at the window by the President, A. B. Copley, her uncle. She could not see at that time why she should count that money herself, but Mr. Copley insisted upon it, thus giving his young niece a lesson in business accuracy that she never forgot.

Church Affiliation

In the "80's", Mr. Copley's interest in the Little Prairie Ronde Sunday School still continued. He came to visit it from time to time, and on such occasions, usually gave a talk to the Sunday School, and he always had something interesting and inspiring to present.

In religion, Mr. Copley was a Swedenborgian, or New Church-man. His church was the Church of the New Jerusalem in Detroit, which was then located at the corner of Cass Avenue and High Street. This was also the church of the first Mrs. Copley. The younger son, Ward, who was at one time a member of the State Legislature from Detroit, sometimes attended the church, in memory of his father's interest in it. The present church, now given the name, "Church of the Holy City," is located on Forest Avenue, about a block from the First Congregational Church, near the corner of John R. Street.

Meets Death In Cuba

Mr. Copley's last visit to the South was to Havana, Cuba, in the winter of 1899. He and his wife were riding in a carriage, the driver of which rode in a box in front. Suddenly Mrs. Copley felt a jolt and became aware that Mr. Copley had fallen out of the carriage. With great difficulty, she finally attracted the attention of the driver and they returned to the spot where he lay. He was carried into a drug store, where an attempt was made to revive him; but he died in a few minutes, without regaining consciousness.

Bringing her husband home from a foreign land in a casket was a serious ordeal for Mrs. Copley, but it was accomplished. His last rites were held in the Decatur home, with a minister of the Church of the New Jerusalem officiating, who, as nearly as relatives can recall, was Reverend Henry Mercer, who was then preaching in Chicago. His text was, "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." All that was mortal of Bennett Copley was laid to rest in the Rose Hill Cemetery at Nicholsville, scarcely half a mile from the site of the first home to which he came as a pioneer from New York State.

In bringing to a close the life story of one who wrought so faithfully and well for his own and for future generations, it would seem fitting to quote the following lines from Longfellow's "Psalm of Life," in which we can well believe there is a lesson for us all:—

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecker brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.

DECATUR'S CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Decatur had a glorious Fourth of July celebration in 1876. Hon. J. C. Burrows was the orator of the day, and Hon. A. B. Copley delivered an historical address covering Michigan and the township and village of Decatur.

An effort is being made to make Michigan young people more familiar with the history of their state. It is commonly known that during the war, when the boys of the United States were located in distant places, one could ask a Texan something about his home state and learn its history, but the boys of other states knew but little about theirs. This was particularly true of Michigan boys, they knew but little about Michigan.

To help inform them the Republican will from time to time publish some interesting facts of Michigan history.

Following is the speech of Hon. A. B. Copley of Decatur delivered on the Fourth of July, 1876. It will be published in sections as there is available space: :

Address by Hon. A. B. Copley at the Fourth of July, 1876, Celebration in Decatur.

Two hundred and one years ago last May, in the year 1675, had any person been standing on the bluffs that line the northwestern boundary of Van Buren county, formed by Lake Michigan, they would have seen a novel sight for that period. A fragile birch bark canoe, propelled by two white men, a third reclining on a rude bed formed of blankets and skins, an invalid you would say at a glance at his wasted form and emaciated features, though you did not hear the racking cough and short, nervous breathing that marked him as a victim in the last stages of consumption; yet the lustre of his eyes, the intellectual brow, would have proclaimed him as the leader of that little band. The curling smoke of their camp-fire at night on the banks of Black river, was the first that ever ascended from a fire lighted by a white man within the confines of Van Buren county, of which we have any record. Father James Marquette—for he it was who led the little party — had founded Mackinaw in 1669, in furtherance of the ambitious designs of Louis XIV, of France, who sought to extend the power of that Kingdom throughout the hitherto unexplored region of the Northwestern country.

In 1673, Marquette and Joliet left Mackinaw with five men, founded a station at Green Bay, ascended Fox River, crossed the portage to the headwaters of the Wisconsin, followed that stream to the Mississippi, which they reached June 17th, 1673, following that noble stream to the mouth of the Arkansas, they retraced their route, ascended the Illinois, established friendly relations with the Indian tribes of that region, taught them the simple elements of Christianity, and left them only by promising a speedy return.

Following the Illinois to its source, they crossed the DesPlaines, descended that stream to its mouth, where the city of Chicago now stands, thence to Mackinaw by the western coast of the lake. In 1674, being sick at the time, Father Marquette started with two companions to visit the Illinois Indians, as promised—this trip going by way of Green Bay, to its head, thence across the portage back to Lake Michigan, following the western shore to the Chicago river; built a hut and wintered there, and early in the spring paid a short visit to the Indians, but becoming worse, he turned back again to the head of the lake and started for Mackinaw by the eastern shore of the lake, and on what proved his dying trip, made the first visit of any white man to our county. About ten days later he died on the banks of the river which bears his name, near Ludington, this state.

Four years later that indefatigable explorer, Chevalier LaSalle, built the Griffin, the first vessel on the lakes, at the outlet of Lake Erie, in which he reached Green Bay, started the Griffin back with a costly load of furs, and with fourteen men reached the Miami (St. Joseph River, called Miami by the tribe of Indians living there then) by way of the western shore. Nov. 1st, built a fort 40x80 feet, surrounded by palisades, spending a month in exploring the country, being reinforced by his lieutenant, Tonti, with nineteen men from Mackinaw. The Griffin was never more heard from and probably foundered on Lake Huron. There is not much doubt that Lieutenant Tonti landed on our borders, or that LaSalle's exploring parties passed up the Paw Paw river and examined the country. LaSalle's fort was vacated shortly after; still trading posts were started and maintained at St. Joseph, also at a place one mile above Niles, which were kept up with varying success until 1763, when they both fell under the conspiracy of the noted chieftain, Pontiac. The Indians holding the country at the time of the first visit of the white men were the Miamis, hence the name of the river and fort. About 1720 the Pottawatamies were displaced by the Menominees from the country around Green Bay, and they in turn drove the Miamis south and held the country in this portion of Michigan until the present white settlers took possession —so that we are no more carpet-baggers than the Pottawatamies before

In 1775 a trader by the name of Burnett started a trading post at St. Joseph, and a son of his kept it when the present settlers came. Fort Wayne, in Indiana, was established by the General who bore that name, in 1795, and was the advance station in the northwest to protect the white settlers. In 1820 Isaac McCoy, a Baptist missionary, started a school at that place, but his adventurous spirit was not satisfied and he made application to Gov. Cass in 1821 for permission to establish mission stations among the Indians in Michigan territory, and through the influence of Col. Trimble, of Ohio, and Ottawa and Pottawatomie each granted a mile square of land on condition that the Government would maintain a school and blacksmith shop thereon. In 1822 the agent for the Government, Chas. C. Trowbridge, selected for the Ottawa station the present site of the city of Grand Rapids, and for the Pottawatomie Station, the country on the St. Joseph river opposite the city of Niles. The boldness of the enterprise will be more fully comprehended when we recollect that it was barely ten years from the Chicago massacre, the battle of Tippecanoe and the disastrous defeat of our army at Brownstown. It was the first advance movement of emigration since the Indian war of Tecumseh and his brother the Prophet. The richness of the St. Joseph Valley tempted the daring pioneer, and the mission station formed the nucleus of the first real settlement of the State of Michigan outside of the French settlements that fringed the eastern border.

In 1825 the Chicago road was laid out and built as a military measure, leading from Detroit to Fort Dearborn, Chicago, by the U. S. Government at an expense of $250,000. The Erie Canal had just been completed, steamboat navigation had been successfully inaugurated on the great lakes, and the descendants of the Puritans and followers of Hendric Hudson, came hand in hand by aid of these improved facilities for migration. Landing at Detroit, they divided, one party following the Chicago road, peopled the southern tier of counties, the other stream went directly west on the line of the Territorial road, established about the year 1834, and settled the second tier of counties—but when they reached the counties of St. Joseph, Cass, Berrien, Kalamazoo and Van Buren, they found themselves preceded by the adventurous Daniel Boone and his coadjutors, who having crossed the Cumberland and Alleghany mountains, had spread themselves over Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and following in the track of Gen. Wayne, this advance army of civilization had established their pickets in these counties, picking out the choicest portions of the country. All honor to these daring spirits whose habits and disposition were such that they waited not for canals, steamboats or roads, saw-mills, gristmills or stores, hardly for the extinguishment of the Indian title, but came with their teams, stock and implements, with their wives and little ones, camping out by the wayside—no base of supplies to fall back on, their resources the forests around them—exchanging the comforts of civilized life for the privations of the wilderness; the security of towns and villages for the dangers of ravenous beasts of prey, venomous reptiles and the deadly miasma incident to the opening up of a new country. Instead of friends and neighbors, their companions were the descendants of the followers of Pontiac, the warriors of Tecumseh, whose heir-looms were perchance, the scalp locks of their ancestors. All honor again to these brave men and women who cut roads, built bridges, and spent weary days in toilsome marches to lay the foundations of our present prosperity.

"I'm going home to mother," sobbed the young wife. "I don't want to see you again."

"You're too late," replied the husband. "Yesterday your mother went home to your grandmother."

Forty-seven years ago (1829) an Indian hunter on his way on the Grand River trail from the Mission at the Rapids to Cary Mission, near Niles, might have been seen traveling leisurely along the banks of Swift's Lake, in this township, passing through the Indian corn fields on its southwestern border, the old stalks of the previous year's growth yet standing. As he came in sight of Little Prairie Ronde on the hill, the site of the old house on the Rosewarne farm, he was startled by the distant sound of an axe. He paused, Indian like, to look and listen. The beautiful prairie stretched out before him to the southwest three miles in length, carpeted with its bluish-green grass, here and there dotted with flowers; occasionally dark green spots crowned with pale white flowers marked the red-root shrub (better known as the Indian tea-plant). The blue smoke curled lazily upward that bright summer morning about one and a half miles distant west of south; but that was not an unusual sight, for it rose from the wigwams of his chief, Weesaw, located near the pond on the Buell farm, in Cass county. As he stopped his quick ear detected the sound of cow bells in the distance, larger than those that located the feeding ground of Indian ponies. Glancing nervously around, his sharp eye missed an apple tree, the pioneer tree of the county, had been dug up and removed. The apple from which it sprang had been brought from the Mission orchard at St. Joseph in his shot pouch as a rare treat for a favorite papoose, and his squaw had planted it by the big trail, where they would often see it, and their descendants partake of its fruit as enjoined by the good Father at the Mission. A French fur-trader was not an unusual occurrence; but the settler's cabin, his truck patch and little field of sod corn (i. e., seed dropped in every third furrow and let alone) the cowbells of his stock feeding on the rich native grass of the prairie, all marked a new departure, and it is no wonder that the hunter turned aside to have a closer view of this first innovation of his rights on the soil of Van Buren county.

This cabin was located near the centre of the southeast quarter of section 35, and no one familiar with the history of Van Buren county, need be told was the home of Dolphin Morris, the pioneer settler of Decatur township and Van Buren county. November 3, 1828, Mr. Morris with his family, left Deer Creek, Scotia county, Ohio, arriving at the residence of Joseph Gardner, Pokagon township, Cass county, where they wintered. During the winter he visited Little Prairie Ronde, and in the spring, in company with his father, H. D. Swift and Jacob Morlan, arrived at the Prairie on the evening of March 26, 1829, camped out at the outlet of Finch Lake, near Nicholsville, and on the 27th commenced cutting logs for a cabin, which work was suspended in a few days, by a heavy fall of snow, he in the meantime returning to Pokagon, bringing his family to their new home during the first week of April. Jacob Morlan built a shanty for temporary occupation until he built his own cabin in Volinia township.

H. D. Swift, father of A. B. Swift, of Decatur, worked for Mr. Morris, but did not bring his family or establish a claim at once. For two years nearly, Mr. Morris was the only settler in this county. His rude cabin not only sheltered the first white family resident in this now prosperous county, but under its roof the first school was taught by Wm. Alexander in the winter of '34-'35, a Virginian, a relative of LeGrande Anderson. Here was born the first white child in the county—Lewis Creighton Morris, Aug. 4, 1830, and here the little fellow left for his angel home, the pioneer of his race, Dec. 20, of the same year. Here was born May 11, 1832, Elias Morris, the oldest living white person in the county. Here it was that Daniel Alexander and Margaret Tittle (Peggy she was called then), the second married couple in the county, spent their honeymoon, or at least set up housekeeping. A building that served to shelter the first family, was the first hotel, church, school house, where the first birth and death occurred, where the first domestic altar in the county was set up, deserves more than a passing tribute, and its site should be marked as a reminder of our early history. In the fall of 1832 there were 16 80-acre lots sold to that time in Decatur township, 4 in Waverly, to R. Sherwood; 5 in Paw Paw, 1 to John S. Agard, 1 to S. Barber, 1 to P. Barber and 2 to Peter Gremps. Dolphin Morris, Samuel Morris, his brother, LeGrand Anderson, H. D. Swift, David Curry and George Tittle, were the only settlers in Decatur. A Mr. Van Dozen was the only settler in Porter, on what is now known as the Gibson farm.

The first marriage in the county was Elijah Goble to Miss Eliza Tittle, September 28, 1833, by John Shaw. In 1831 seed corn failed,and John Tittle, a boy of 15, and a Mr. Kirkendall, working for Mr. Morris, went to Fort Defiance, on the Maumee River, a distance of 100 miles, and got two bushels of seed corn, which the settlers turned out and planted on Sunday, being most of the corn raised that year in the settlement. In 1832 the Black Hawk or Soc war occurred, and though no one was hurt, or likely to be (as the Indians did not reach Chicago by at least 100 miles), yet every man was ordered out, and though telegraphs were not in use then, rumors were plenty, and visions of tomahawks, scalping knives and burning dwellings were not favorable to sleep.

About this time Dolphin Morris went to a mill near Niles; a severe snow storm came on, which, with the state of the roads, prolonged his absence 14 days, and then only with the fore wheels of his wagon, his team and a bag of flour. On the night of the 20th of June, 1835, a severe frost occurred, destroying most of the vegetables, corn and wheat unprotected by the vicinity of small lakes. In the fall of 1834 a railroad survey was made from Detroit to St. Joseph by Lieut. Berrien, of the United States engineer corps. This survey passed within a mile of Decatur to the east, entering the swamp from the east just south of the VanHise farm. The Territorial Road was laid out and partially completed the same year. An actual trip to St. Joseph with wheat from Little Prairie Ronde in the autumn of 1834 occupied seven days, as follows: 1st day to Paw Paw. Mr. Dodge had just put up a small house for a tavern, and the saw mill was in operation; 2nd day, to Emerson or Freeman, Christie's Lake; 3rd day, half way from there to St. Joseph; 4th day, reached the river and crossed; 5th day, load sold and back 10 miles to John B. Rulo's, a Frenchman living in the township of Bainbridge, about two miles northeast of Millburg, the only inhabitant of that time between Paw Paw and St. Joseph; the 6th day, back to Paw Paw, and the 7th home.

The spring of 1835 brought the first permanent settlers to Hamilton and Keeler—Sabina Stearns in the first named and Tobias Byers in the last named township, being the advance guard of the eastern hordes which spread over the entire county within the two following years. The earliest settler aside from those mentioned being Judge Monroe, at South Haven, in 1834.

Civil Government

April 12, 1827, all territory west of Lenawee county on lands to which the Indian title had been obtained by the treaty of Gen. Cass in 1820, at Chicago, were organized in one township called St. Joseph, and an election held at Timothy Smith's, who was supposed to live on White Pigeon Prairie, as the Lenawee records have since burned. Nov. 5, 1829, Cass county was organized in 4 townships, Pokagon, LaGrange, Ontwa and Penn. Van Buren county called one township Lafayette and attached to Penn and an election ordered for the last named township at Martin Shields in Penn township, sec. 20. It seems that no election was held until 1831, which was the first election in which citizens of Van Buren county participated. It may not be inappropriate to mention here that Ira Nash, a merchant of 20 years standing in this village, and one of the Directors who located and built the present Swamp Road to Lt. Prairie Ronde, was elected township Clerk at this first election, a position which he held for 11 consecutive years, during 8 of which he held the office of Justice of the Peace.

In 1832 Henry D. Swift was School Inspector at the Penn election, being the pioneer officeholder in Van Buren county. It is shrewdly surmised that there are a few persons yet in the county willing to follow his footsteps and sacrifice themselves for the public good. In 1833, Volinia township was organized and Van Buren county attached to it for judicial purposes. In 1834 a road district was formed consisting of the north half of Volinia, Decatur and Paw Paw townships. LeGrand Anderson, Overseer, and the whole settlement performed their road work on a swamp crossing a short distance west of Lawton, Job Davis, Hinkley and Agard from Paw Paw, Samuel Rich and Brookfield Gard, from near the Warner School House in Volinia, and all settlers intervening, working.

The first power exercised by Van Buren county, politically, of any importance, was in 1835; James O'Dell and Thomas Burk were elected representatives from Cass county, and received certificates as such; but when the returns came from Van Buren county it was found that Joseph Smith was elected over Burk. Armed with the returns, Smith went to Detroit and secured the position. In 1836 the records of Cass county show that at the October session Peter Gremps represented Lafayette township on the Board of Supervisors and that Edward Shults was collector (as the treasurers were then termed) for the same township. No other mention is made on the record in regard to Lafayette township. In 1837 the county was organized in seven townships—Decatur and Porter one, called Decatur. In '44, the last election while the townships of Decatur and Porter were united, there were 70 votes cast, S. Kinney being elected Supervisor. In 1845 Decatur township commenced her official existence alone, the elections being held in a log school house near the Greenman farm; Lyman Sanford was chosen Supervisor, 16 votes being cast. Sanford was chosen Supervisor in '46, 23 votes; '47, 23 votes; '48, 14 votes; '49, 40 votes. In 1850 A. N. Lefevre, 50 votes—the meeting probably held in the passenger house, as the bridge was done, and May 8th of the same year an election for delegates to constitutional convention was held there.

Village of Decatur

Previous to the building of the Michigan Central Railroad, there were no settlements near. As early as 1834 the site of the village was well known to the hunters of that time and used as a favorite camping ground. A lovely place in the state of nature almost surrounded by swamps, a beautiful level plain with but little timber and scarcely any underbrush, the annual fires recurring every spring destroying the shrubbery growth of the preceding year; beautiful flowers of varying hue from early spring to autumn, with occasional bunches of tall prairie grass intermixed, rendered it a welcome spot to the tired hunter, especially after one or more miles of tramping through the Big Swamp. In the fall of the year, during the running season, it was no uncommon occurrence for a party of from five to ten of Wayne or Volinia hunters to spend a week camping out on the hard land nearest Pickerel Lake, more famous 40 years ago for its fine fishing than now, hunting and fishing, with no other outfit than their fish lines, rifles, blankets, a dog or two for wounded deer, a loaf of bread, a lump of salt and several gallons of whiskey.

In 1847 a change came over Decatur. The M. C. R. R., owned by the State and built as far as Kalamazoo, was sold to the present company in 1846. Various surveys were made and the road located as at present. Grading was commenced in '47 and during '48 the depot buildings were erected, the iron laid and passenger trains which reached Lawton in the fall of '47, ran to Niles about October 1st, '48. An excursion train from Detroit to Niles celebrated the opening of the road to that place, October 2d. C. S. Tucker kept a boarding shanty a short distance south of the passenger depot, and in '49 kept boarders in a small building erected for an office by Beers and Sherwood, village proprietors, on the site of the Duncombe House. A. H. Dixon, Goss & Dixon, and T. E. Phelps were the earliest merchants, in the order named, being here in '49. Hiram Lee is, perhaps, the oldest settler here resident, having bought the first village lot in '48, previous to the laying out of the village in '49, designated as the third lot west of the Public Square, on the Railroad side, being the lot next to the livery barn. Still it was a town without a country. From east to west it was environed by an impassable swamp, and the Railroad Company and village-owners both knew that a road southeast across the swamp was an absolute necessity for the success of the town.

A road meeting was held Nov. 2, 1848, near the residence of Jacob Charles, at the school house mentioned as the place of holding the town meetings, to determine the site of the road. Two routes had been surveyed, one just east of Pickerel Lake, and the other nearly east, leaving the swamp at Mr. Charles' place. The lower route was chosen, and the road built of split puncheons 8 to 10 feet long, laid on pole stringers, except perhaps one-fifth of the distance, which had plank instead of split timbers, a saw mill having been erected by Beers & Sherwood just west of the village. This road had turnouts at intervals, it being but a single track and was rough and tedious passing over it. The road was completed so that teams crossed Saturday, November 3, '49, and was the connecting link that bound the townships together, as prominent citizens had seriously contemplated a change of boundaries, making the swamp a dividing line.

This first road was built under the supervision of A. N. Lefever, agent for Beers & Sherwood, at a cost of $2,000, the Railroad Company giving $500 and the citizens $300, L. Sanford acting as trustee for them. Miss Hathaway (Mrs. Copley now) came by boat and rail from Chicago, Nov. 6, '49, to Decatur, Mr. Godard, station agent, taking her home with horse and wagon, and she was probably the first passenger leaving for the south side of the swamp.

In 1855, the first road having become much worn, to project for a new one was instituted. Subscription papers were circulated and $1,000 was pledged from each side of the swamp from private means; the present route selected west of the lake and the road built under the supervision of three directors from each side of the swamp—Geo. Bennett, T. E. Phelps and Ira Nash from Decatur, and Abram Vought, Hubbel Warner and A. B. Copley from the south side, the township of Decatur building the bridge over the Dowagiac river. In 1865 the Legislature passed a special act authorizing the townships of Decatur and Volinia to raise by tax, for the improvement of the Decatur and Little Prairie Ronde road, a sum not exceeding one-half of one per cent on the previous year's valuation. Under this act $1,370 were voted in Volinia and $2,487 in Decatur.

The present road and the one it was substituted for, as near as can now be estimated, cost $15,000. In Decatur township there have been raised by tax for road purposes $18,056, besides $6,172 from other sources, making a total of $24,228 besides the regular labor assessments, a sum far in excess of any adjacent township. After the completion of the road across the swamp the village grew rapidly, its trade extending to Lake Michigan on the northwest and Inland 12 to 15 miles. The village was incorporated by the Board of Supervisors in '59 and by special act of the Legislature in '61, in which was this curious provision, deserving of mention at least: "The President and Trustees shall receive no compensation, but may once in each year provide for themselves and fellow officers a dinner or supper at the expense of the village." The officers never have taken advantage of this generous offer, but worked without pay and boarded themselves.

The first President of the village was E. Parker Hill; the first Recorder, Orrin S. Welch. The citizens of Decatur village and township, notwithstanding the great expense incurred in grading and graveling the beautiful streets of the village and building the splendid road across the swamp and other roads in the township, thereby providing for their financial interests, have not neglected their intellectual wants.

In 1862, School District No. 4 was organized as a graded school, and June 17 (the anniversary of Bunker Hill) 1863, ground was broken and the main building finished during the summer of 1864, at a cost of $12,000—school commencing in September following. H. A. Northrup, Esq., now President of the village, was Director of the District at its reorganization and for 4 years following. There were raised and expended during 1862 to 1875 inclusive, a period of 14 years, for school purposes in that district $64,754, and in the township from '66 to '75—ten years, for all districts, $68,338. In 1870 a Town Hall was built in the village of Decatur, of brick, costing over $11,000, an ornament to the village and a substantial evidence of the public spirit and liberality of the citizens of the township. Though our history does not reach back to the revolution, it includes revolutionary times. The State records do not show to what extent each township or county participated in the late civil war. A special township meeting was held Feb. 16, '64, to vote a $100 bounty to volunteers. 35 bonds were issued during the following 10 months. 113 persons voted, ten of whom said no bounty; a like bounty would scarce reveal their names today. Where all did well, it were wrong to make invidious comparisons. Enough remains to show that Decatur township and Van Buren county performed well their part. There was no draft in Decatur; her gallant volunteers were represented in Sickles' Brigade, at the east, and Douglas' at the west, and in almost every regiment of their own State, participating in nearly every battlefield from the firing on Sumpter to the capture of Jeff Davis, where Van Buren county soldiers won a coveted distinction.

In thousands of places over this broad land today historians are recounting the sacrifices, privations and hardships endured by ancestors from one to two hundred and fifty years ago; their struggles and progress and final triumph at last; and now they point with pride to their schools, colleges and other institutions of learning—to their mills, machine shops and manufactories in general; their canals, vessels, railroads, warehouses and other facilities of commerce, all evidences of their great progress in art, science, learning, agriculture, commerce and manufactories, monuments (and justly so) of the triumph of civilization over barbarism.

Van Buren county utters no word of disapproval, and would not pluck a single laurel from their brows, but would simply remind Plymouth Rock, with its history of 256 years, and other places of like age, that in progress and prosperity, she stands the peer of the proudest. Instead of tracing her great advance to the deeds of a long line of ancestors from one to two hundred years ago, she has the men and women in her own fruitful borders who in the forty-seven years from the first stroke of the pioneer's axe, have passed through all the toils, privations, struggles and hardships incident to the settlement of a new country, and today are enjoying the distinction of being the living witnesses of a march in civilization hitherto unparalleled in the history of the world's progress.

"OVER THE CREEK"

(This story was printed in the Decatur Republican April 15, 1872, known then as the Van Buren County Republican. E. A. Blackman was the editor. The story met with some criticism and a reply followed in the next issue, so look for the reply next week. The stories are taken from the scrapbook of Mrs. David Christie.)

"There is where there were two log shanties built by Indians for hunting camps; just the other side of the inlet to the Lake of the Woods." So said our informant, a lady.

She continued: There was no Decatur then, but a huckleberry swamp occupied the territory where now the village is located, when the old settlers of Hamilton came down to the Indian shanties to fish and hunt. In the spring of the year traps were set for the fish that came up from the St. Joseph river. These traps looked lake a crockery crate made of willows, and set near the mouth of the creek, while the fisherman rested nights in these rude shanties, frequently taking at different intervals the same night, a whole wagon box full of pickerel and bass and suckers.

Those were golden days for the lovers of sport and fresh fish, while now, the boys with spears and hook and line do well to catch a few pitiful perch and sunfish. The pickerel of the olden time with head resting on a tall boy's shoulder, while his tail dragged on the ground, made a meal for a large family, and there were no delicate appetites at that time with those who wielded the axe. The fishing and hunting were extras then thrown in between days work of more than ten hours each.

Caleb ———, then nicknamed "Kep" went down to the lake shore to shoot a deer, which he did at the first shot, and the poor deer fell bleeding, while "Kep" jumped astride of him to cut his throat, when the other hunters were astonished to see the wounded deer jumping with fearful strides toward the lake, and "Kep" on his back holding on for dear life, for there was no time then for reflection, nor for a "change of base," which would have been a frightful experiment among the brambles and logs. Fortunately, for "Kep", before reaching the lake the wounded deer became weakened and fell again beneath his uncouth burden.

Soon after, the now deserted old log tenement was built on the east side of the creek less than a mile from the present village of Decatur. The owner of this put in a conspicuous place his shingle bearing the interesting intelligence to the traveling public, in tar letters, that this was the "Halfway house." Half way from where to where, never was quite clear, for it was a long way to Prairie Ronde, the Egypt to which Van Buren County wended their way to buy corn, and the road, which never had scarcely a traveler, was as rough as the most up and down corduroy road that ever a Michigan Swamp boasted.

The "huckleberry patch" was only bounded by the inaccessible mudholes around the Lake of the Woods and Mud Lake, so the Hotel, alias the "Half way House" was not probably overburdened with travelers. When Decatur commenced building up, it was a very slow process, for there was almost no attraction to the place, until the Michigan Central Rail Road was surveyed through there. The construction of the depot building brought almost the first sounds of the saw and hammer, except the occasional buildings constructed one at a time in different interests in the scattered town.

The first hotel, on the same corner now occupied by the Duncombe House, kept the boarders who built the long Swamp road south of the village. This house, known then as the Barker House, kept the "O be Joyful" beverage, by the dozen barrels, and the work was done under its unnatural stimulus. From that time until the present, peace and happiness have been strangers to many an unfortunate household from that cause, and no other.

Since that starting point of the sale of intoxicating liquor in Decatur, six of the residents of the village, all men, who were heads of families, have come to violent deaths, all at different times, and all having their origin in the same traffic. All but one of these, met their untimely fate within five miles of that hotel, and three of them within a few rods. However worthless these lives might have been at the time, they owed their insignificance to the poisonous draught.
